It has become the fashion to think of Rheinberger as a manufacturer of "Kapellmeistermusick," artificial compositions in which skill takes the place of poetic inspiration; but the one little part-song. "The Stars are shining in Heaven," might prove abundantly that there was a romantic spot in the professorial heart.

To us this organ concerto was the gem of the concert. The forces were perfectly blended and there was such ease in the leading of the voices, such charm in the melodies and their development, that each movement became a delight, although the dignity of the Andante and the sprightly figure treatment of the Finale were the best portions of the work. In the Andante the horns again did excellent work. Altogether it was a display night for Organ, Horns and Oboes.

Mr. Goodrich was at his very best in the concerto. His registration, his manual and pedal work, the brilliancy of the cadenza, his absolute surety in ensemble effects, all call for hearty and sincere praise. He was recalled twice at the close of the work. Altogether it was the best organ performance we have yet had in Symphony Hall; may there be many more such in the future.

Cesar Franck had his foot upon his native heath in the treatment of the subject of the Redemption. His contrapuntal skill and his piety here went properly hand in hand with a very different result from that spun out of the same theme by the less sincere and less able Gounod. There was a most ingenious and yet unforced intertwining of figures in this and a lofty climax at the end, when trombones were added with mighty power to the culmination. Yet the work would be more attractive if it were shorter. The infinite learning of the composer leads him into prolixity; he squeezes the contrapuntal lemon to the very last drop, so that part of the piece becomes "musician's music" rather than a message to the entire concert public.

Possibly such a work would gain with the public if they could have the chief figures set forth before their eyes to follow. If the programme-book could add such figures in the case of many works it would be a gain. The Philadelphia Programme book does this a little, the Pittsburg book somewhat more, but the Cincinnati Symphony Programme Book is a model in this respect, giving only the most salient points, such as can readily be retained in mind by every reader, and printing every important figure and theme. The addition of [illegible] themes would not detract in the least degree from the present thoroughly readable character of the Boston Symphony Programme books.

The second of the concerts was given last night in aid of the Pension Fund. The printed list of works was of the shortest.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....Symphonic Pathetique
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in E flat, No. 5

Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Let no one suppose that this was a brief concert because of the brevity of the above list. In the first place the two works above mentioned are each of them long in themselves. In the next place Mr. Paderewski is generous in giving encores and sometimes gives a "Postscript Concert" which is in itself of considerable length. In this case it was devoted to Chopin's compositions.

As everybody, from Dr. Muck and Paderewski down to the cymbal player, volunteered, the concert is not to be reviewed as the regular ones are. Yet even were this not the case the spirit of animadversion would find not a peg to hang a comment upon. The great "Pathetic Symphony" was read and played in a manner that, as is usual with this work, carried the entire audience with its moods. It is a pity that this composition should be allowed to over-shadow some of the earlier symphonies of Tschaikowsky which are musically as great, but the clearness of the story told, and the peculiar sprightliness of the long 5-4 rhythm, will always cause the public to consider the "Pathetic" as the foremost of modern symphonies. The last two movements of this symphony were superbly played and aroused much enthusiasm.

It was noble of Paderewski to donate his valuable services to the aid of his humbler brother-musicians, in this concert, and undoubtedly the great audience present was due chiefly to the fact that this famous pianist was to be heard in his most fitting frame, with a great orchestra and in a musical masterpiece. He merited the laurel wreath which was presented to him amid enthusiastic applause.

After all one must pay constant tribute to the versatility of this artist. There is no pianist alive, but himself, who can give the utmost romance of Chopin, the greatest fire and brilliancy of Liszt, and yet interpret Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto as was done last night. In this work Paderewski never forgot that it was a symphony with a thread of solo running through it. It was ensemble first and foremost, not personal display. But when the work was successfully finished and the pianist recalled with fervor, he became the soloist once more, and added several numbers to the intense delight of the assembled multitude. So that the symphonic programme concluded with a greatly appreciated piano recital. Louis C. Elson.

TRAVELER, MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1907.

THE joint attraction of our Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Paderewski on the occasion of a concert in aid of the pension fund drew an audience to Symphony Hall last evening that literally packed the hall. The concert was really a concert and a piano recital, for while the orchestra played Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, the latter with Mr. Paderewski at the piano, in faultless manner, yet there seemed to be fully as much interest shown in the after piano recital which included no less than a half dozen numbers, and there would have been more had not Mr. Paderewski absolutely refused to keep on indefinitely.

It was an exceptionally enjoyable concert, one and all enjoying the joint appearance of one of the world's greatest pianists with an orchestra equally renowned. Very fittingly was the presentation to the pianist of that immense laurel wreath.

JOURNAL—TUESDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1907.

LONGY CLUB DELIGHTS VERY LARGE AUDIENCE

At the second concert of the eighth season of the Longy Club, which was held at Potter Hall last night, there was an unusually good audience.

The program consisted of three offerings. The first was an involved and extremely modern symphonic poem, "Der Spaziergang," by Gustav Bumcke; the second was the delightfully simple and melodic "Trio des Ismaelites," by Hector Berlioz; the last and most ambitious number on the program was the "Sinfonia da Camera," by E. Wolf-Ferrari. This was in four movements, the allegro, which to an untrained ear seemed rather incoherent; the adagio, which opened with a very delightful melody; the allegretto, a light, quick movement, and the finale, which was more beautifully rendered than the rest, and received with much enthusiasm.

The Longy Club is the wood-wind choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are: Flutes, Mesrs. D. Marquarre and A. Brooke; oboes, Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom; clarinets, Messrs. G. Grisey and P. Mimart; horns, Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer; bassoons, Messrs. P. Sardony and J. Helleberg; piano, Mr. A. De Voto.

They were assisted by H. Schuecker, harp; K. Keller, bass, and the Theodorowicz Quartet—Mr. Theodorowicz, first violin; A. Ribarsch, second violin; A. Gietzen, viola; J. Keller, 'cello.

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1907.

PADEREWSKI AT SYMPHONY HALL

BY OLIN DOWNES

Symphony Hall, yesterday evening, was packed to the limit of its seating and standing capacity on the occasion of the first pension fund concert of the season. Mr. Paderewski, in fulfilment of a promise made here two years ago, had proffered his services. The programme consisted of Tchaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," Beethoven's fifth piano concerto ("Emperor"), and Mr. Paderewski, after the concerto, added as encores a Chopin group consisting of the A flat ballade, a Mazurka, the G flat Etude, the Polonaise in A flat, and one of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words."

The performances of the evening, both by soloist and orchestra, were of unusual merit; the programme in itself furnished uncomfortably apt commentary upon the discriminative tastes of our carefully nurtured musical public. The endeavor has been, and appropriately so, in the past, to make the programmes of the Pension Fund concerts of a more "popular" description than those of the regular series. It was, therefore, doubtless in response to a demand that Dr. Muck, whose regard for coherency in such matters goes sometimes to extremes, so far acceded to "vox populi" as to include in the same concert, in immediate succession, such entirely incongruous compositions as the Tschaikowsky symphony and the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Paderewski is a law unto himself, and he could not have made a more fitting selection than he did for his concerto; but should Tschaikowsky's superbly eloquent symphony, with its gorgeous woe, open a general and festive occasion, affecting, as it must, the few who are truly sensitive, and for the rest furnishing a comfortable mattress to those who attend, either to stare at a popular idol or with the fixed intention of becoming sentimentally and luxuriously sad?

The "Symphony Pathetique" is a work that can hardly fail in making a strong appeal to a conductor or audience of today. It has received many excellent performances in this city, but never of late years, in our estimation, so remarkable a one as that of yesterday evening. The music never seemed so poignant, and throughout there was not a phrase that failed to speak with soul-searching import. After the third movement, that monstrous, colossal, sublime battle-march, which was given as few orchestras can give it, Dr. Muck had his men rise and acknowledge well-merited applause, and the artists were obliged to do so again at the conclusion of their performance.

Mr. Paderewski was evidently thoroughly in the vein. During the orchestral tuttis his attitude was tense and expectant; one who is pleasingly aware of his eagerness to play. Moreover, what does not always follow with great virtuosi, there was the utmost sympathy between himself and Dr. Muck, whom he watched very closely, with entire self-abnegation and the utmost care for perfection of ensemble.

His interpretations of Beethoven appear in a greater light each time we hear him. In other days he was perhaps over-romantic in his conception of the creations of the master. At present the qualities of the romanticist are by no means absent, as any one present at the performance of one of the sonatas when his first recital this season took place can testify; but they are now united with and balanced by the maturity and reserve strength of absolute mastery. Last night his playing was the essence of breadth and repose. In tonal beauty and variety of color he again asserted his place as one of the two or three greatest pianists of the day.

HERALD—TUESDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1907.

THE LUNGY CLUB'S SECOND CONCERT

New Works by Bumcke and Wolf-Ferrari Given Last Night in Potter Hall.

CHAMBER SYMPHONY OF LATTER SPECIALLY FINE

Mrs. Gerville-Reache Heard at Mrs. McAllister's Fifth Musicale.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club, assisted by Messrs. Schuecker, harp; K. Keller, doublebass, and the Theodorowicz quartet (Messrs. Theodorowicz, Ribarsch, Gietzen and J. Keller), gave its second concert of the season last night in Potter Hall. The programme included Gustav Bumcke's symphonic poem, "The Walk," op. 22, for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and harp; the trio for two flutes and harp from Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ," and Wolf-Ferrari's chamber symphony for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, doublebass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.

The pieces by Bumcke and Wolf-Ferrari were played here for the first time. Bumcke lives in Berlin. He is interested in wind instruments, which is commendable; he organizes concerts of wind instruments, which is praiseworthy; not content with this, he writes music for these concerts, a questionable procedure. Not long ago a sonata by him for clarinet and piano was published, and some of his countrymen wished that he would be satisfied with admiring wind instruments and organizing concerts of them.

His symphonic poem, "Der Spaziergang," played last night, is in five short movements which are interesting chiefly by reason of combination of timbres. Many of these combinations are ingenious, and some are new and striking. The purely musical contents of the movements do not seem to be of much worth. The melodic thought is for the most part labored and of very short breath. There is little sustained sentiment. The music is constantly broken rhythmically for the sake of effect, and as a result it is scrappy. The composer has a sense of color, and his decoration is now and then beautiful, but even in this he is apparently an experimenter.

Wolf-Ferrari an Improvement.

The Chamber Symphony of Wolf-Ferrari is a work of different character. The composer had much to say that was worth saying, and he said it in his own way. The music is original, it is individual, both in conception and expression. It has warmth and emotion; there is both southern sensuousness and German thoughtfulness. The wind choir, the piano and the strings are all used with a fine sense of relationship and proportion. The rhythmic effects and the color scheme are not things apart, for which the music was deliberately contrived. Each one of the four movements is interesting, but the third, an allegretto, has a special charm.

Mr. Longy directed this little symphony with marked elasticity in the interpretation and with great spirit. The performance of both this work and of Bumcke's symphonic poem was brilliant. The familiar trio of Berlioz, as played by Messrs. D. Maquarre, Brooke and Schuecker, gave much pleasure. An audience of good size applauded heartily.

GLOBE—TUESDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1907

MOST UNUSUAL CONCERT.

Given by the Longy Club of Wood Wind Players, Assisted by Schuecker, Keller and Quartet.

The Longy club of wood wind players, with the assistance of Heinrich Schuecker harpist, Karl Keller bass, and the Theodorowicz quartet, gave last night in Potter hall a most unusual concert of chamber music before an audience which, considering the weather, was astonishingly large.

A program of ultra-modern music was played, and was played with a great deal of spirit. It was by no means music which would appeal to the ordinary concert audience, for it began with Gustav Bumcke's strange symphonic poem, "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, english horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and a harp. The work is in five movements, descriptive or suggested by a morning saunter, dreams in the woods, evening out of doors, and so forth. It is full of most cunning, though apparently idle phrasing—a thing altogether of color and sensation, in some of its movements nearly formless. The dream movement carries steadily through, for instance, a dull booming note, persisting, never ceasing, forcing itself against the gray veil of embroidery flung hither and thither over it. A little intermezzo consists almost entirely of a tiny joke that the oboe flings to the clumsy bassoon, while the other voices chuckle at the hobbling, throaty imitation. The final movement is like a soft wind dying in sleep across half-seen landscapes, full of vague shapes against the sky. Perhaps one sees the picture better after reading the title of the movement, for a good imagination might make almost anything out of the piece.

In strong contrast to the other two works of the evening was the beautiful, melodious and simple trio from "The Childhood of Christ," the "trio of the Ismaelites" by Hector Berlioz, scored for two flutes and a harp. It is too little played, and would bear hearing much more often.

The third number was E. Wolf-Ferrari's chamber symphony, written for piano, two violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. This has much more melody than the Bumcke poem, though it makes often hard following. It is in four movements, and without program names. The chiefest characteristic is the angry, incoherent, broken phrasing, often repeated from voice to voice, like a "tu quoque" retort. A perverse and off-key thread rasped under beautiful melody, and in the tutti passages the instruments seemed screaming and chattering like an angry crowd. Yet there were haunting bits of discoursing melody, glimpsing through for a moment, only to bury themselves again in discord. Each movement had its characteristic, and doubtless, each has its impression to convey, its emotion to raise. Yet to most of the people in Potter hall last night the work was probably incomprehensible. It is altogether probable that it needs a second and a third hearing for appreciation of its beauty.

An interested listener was Mrs John L. Gardner, and here and there through the hall were a number of other prominent people.

DEC 9 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahm's melodious second in D major. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

Symphony Hall: Mr. Paderewski

an impressive performance. The ... of pianists in the emperor of pianoforte concertos, was the impression left by Mr. Paderewski's playing at the Pension Fund concert last night. He dominated the orchestra; again, he merged his instrument into its mass to emerge triumphantly after the flutes and the 'cellos had sung their themes. The Beethoven E-flat concerto, a symphony with a solo instrument, covers a range from heroics to lyrics. Its royalty is the magnificent unconcern of the composer in brushing aside all tinsel ornaments and letting it stand forth in its bold, stark outline; and the royalty of its performance last night was of the same spirit.

Restrained to the opening cadenza (furnished as an innovation in his time, by the composer for the express purpose of keeping it in restraint), lyric in the long passages where we look to hear the instrument sound wiry, thunderous in his climaxes, the pianist, as one Olympian understanding another. As far as possible where such a display of artistry and feeling was involved, the performance was almost impersonal in its merging of the player with the thing played. It was altogether the E-flat concerto receiving a full enunciation and little, if any, of the soloist exploiting his powers.

Following the orchestral concert on the printed program came the informal pianoforte recital, which, by appearances, the pianist gracefully consented to carry off at a sitting. The first of the five encore numbers, the Chopin Ballade in A-flat, was a piece of creative imagination taking the Chopin music for a text. To be sure, it had all of the composer in it, but it had considerably more. The same was true of the waltz, the familiar octave étude (which suffered metamorphosis into something rich and strange) and the A-flat polonaise which brought this part of the programme to a climax.

The concert opened with the ever-popular and ever-appealing "Symphony Pathetique" of Tschaikovski, which never fails to throw the web of its Slavic discontent over the more placid Anglo-Saxon, rousing him to wonder whether, after all, things are for the best. At all events, he has to acknowledge that its tempests, its defiance, and its protests are superpersonal.

Once more last night the playing of Mr. Paderewski raised the question of an artist dissatisfied with his medium, whose mastery of it only serves to remind him of its limitations. Is dissatisfaction, the sense of limitation, the price that must be paid for complete mastery of an art? To be worthy of the thing desired, we must be able to despise it, are the words of the sage. And what is the case with the pianist?

The Symphony Concert

Mr. Goodrich is too well known in Boston for his manifest abilities as an organizer, as a conductor of orchestras, as the sustainer of so significant an institution as the Choral Art Society, as well as a solid and able teacher to need any characterization of his services to music in Boston and elsewhere. It is doubtful whether in his versatile activity many in the public at large are fully acquainted with his conspicuous skill as a concert organist of serious ideals. Furthermore, those who know his work as organist and choirmaster at Trinity Church have limited opportunity to know the scope and variety of his attainments as an organist in concert pieces. Few also know of the warm and unqualified praise which Charles Marie Widor, himself among the foremost organists of the world and sparing in his commendation, bestowed upon his brilliant pupil. The appearance of Mr. Goodrich, therefore, as soloist at these concerts is in the nature of a welcome treat. The toccata and fugue by Bach, which began the programme, is well known to the frequenters of piano recitals, for it is a favorite opening number in a transcription by Tausig. While one must admire the extreme skill with which its effects are transferred in dazzling brilliance to the specialized technique of the piano, one must at the same time deplore the manifest injury to specific organ effects. It was doubly welcome, therefore, to hear it in its original version. Mr. Goodrich played this classic with dignity, restrained and yet adequate registration, a majestic and implacable rhythm that was a rare pleasure to hear. The superb outlines and the firm architectural structure stood out in clear relief, and the brilliant cadenzas assumed a legitimate and fitting climax which is not always felt in the ingenious transcription by Tausig.

In considering any combination of orchestra and organ, one is always tempted to recall Berlioz's memorable and witty comparison that the relation between the two is that of emperor and pope, each supreme in his field but bound to clash sooner or later. Berlioz, of course, refers to the complete orchestra, and modern composers recognizing the justice of his criticism have limited the orchestra in such a way that it may offer the minimum of antagonizing sonority. Accordingly Rheinberger has wisely scored his accompaniment for strings and three horns. The organ assumes the burden of replacing the customary wind instruments, while the horns for the most part sustain and enrich the sonority of the strings. The time was when Rheinberger was thought to be the coming composer, destined to neutralize the baneful and growing influence of Wagner. His orchestral pieces were given a place upon our programmes, his pianoforte concerto was played by zealous enthusiasts, his chamber music works were eagerly produced as novelties of interest. Little by little his compositions have disappeared from the sheer pressure of more important works. It seems as if his works for organ contain the best of his individuality, the most significant portions of his message. This concerto in F major is contrived with uncommon skill as regards relation between orchestra and organ. One almost forgets Berlioz's aphorism in the rich contrast of sonorities that never seem to jar, the opposition of organ and orchestra is always grateful, frequently ingenious and full of harmonious and often brilliant effect. As regards the composition itself the first movement contains the most abstract beauty in its ... and attractive ... times ... ment the ... what, ... the ... thoughtful poetry and the coda is distinct in its charm. If on a single hearing the finale seems to approach triviality, an unfitting end for a work of such definite elevation of sentiment, it is brilliant and effective in its workmanship, and the thematic treatment is full of resource. Mr. Goodrich played the concerto with reverent interpretation of the composer's intentions. he built up his climaxes with skilful command of registration; the cadenza lent an appropriate atmosphere of imposing brilliancy befitting a solo instrument. As in the toccata his command of rhythm, his willingness to let the organ speak for itself without attempting a velocity foreign to the nature of the instrument, his delicate intermixture of sonorities with the orchestra, all justify unquestionably the reputation which he has steadily earned as organist. Moreover the choice of this concerto serves to recall to notice a concerto that is a notable addition to a literature that is all too scanty, as well as to convince students and audience alike of the claims which Rheinberger may still have upon the future. It only remains to add that Mr. Goodrich was cordially and appreciatively recalled by an enthusiastic audience.

E. B. H.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD

DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahms' melodious second in D major. The other

MME. TERESA CARRENO,
The pianist who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on January 8.

number on the programme will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

TIMES,
... D.C
DEC 29 1907

Mme. Teresa Carreno to Play With Boston Symphony

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor.

The symphony will be Brahm's melodious second in D major, and the other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
...SHINGTON, D. C
DEC 29 1907

Boston Symphony and Carreno.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist. She will play MacDowell's "Concerto in D Minor." The symphony will be Brahm's melodious "Second in D Major," and the other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

POST
...SHINGTON, D. C
...
DEC 29 1907

Under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, Mme. Olga Samaroff will give a piano recital at the National Monday afternoon, January 20, at 4:30. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, and Mme. Samaroff, the month of January at the National will be the center of attraction for all local music lovers.

PROGRAMME.

Gustav Bumcke. "Der Spaziergang," Symphonic Poem.
Berlioz. Trio des Ismaelites from "L'Enfance du Christ".
Wolf-Ferrari. Sinfonia da Camera. Op. 8.

Again an interesting and unusual programme. Almost every number at these concerts excites the interest or piques the curiosity. Bumcke is a name that has not yet made its way into the biographical dictionaries, but judging by the titles of the movements and their contemplative character, he is a German of the new school.

Bumcke's work is scored for Flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinettes, Two Bassoons and Harp. The Longy Club furnished all the performers except the harpist who was our symphony virtuoso, Mr. Schuecker. One can scarcely translate the word "Spaziergang" into English; perhaps a "Stroll" would come as close to it as any word our language possesses. One would scarcely think that a pleasure stroll would afford material enough for a work of this character, when one thinks of the Mazeppas, the Amphales, the Hercules, the Macabre Dances, that have been subjects for this kind of composition, nevertheless we are obliged to Mr. Bumcke for leading the symphonic poem into pleasanter and less exciting paths.

But the composition was far more of a Suite than a symphonic poem. There was a degree of sameness in the five short movements, although one could find matin bells, and song birds of all kinds, including our old friend, the Cuckoo. The fourth movement, marked "Little Intermezzo" was an entire nest of birds, and became a rather pretty Scherzo. We could not find much of eventide in the finale, although it was labelled "Abend." The work was finely played and greatly applauded.

Hector Berlioz's trio was quaint and archaic, as the whole of his "Infancy of Christ" is. The number is not as wonderful as "Le Repos de la Sainte Famille" in the same Oratorio, which combines woodwind and strings in a peculiarly attractive manner, but it is beautiful nevertheless. The old story that Berlioz deceived all Paris by this work and caused the critics to believe that it was the composition of a mythical monk, named Pere Ducre, may be discredited, but he certainly fooled a select Paris audience about the "Choeur Mystique" in this work ("O mon Ame") which they all believed to be mediaeval in origin.

All through the oratorio, however, there is a studied brevity and simplicity, and this is apparent in the present trio as well. It is an odd combination, flutes and harp, and one which has seldom been very successful. Mozart united one flute and harp in his concerto, but that work is but seldom taken from the shelf nowadays. Mr. Schuecker played most delicately and the brilliancy of the two flutes was a good foil to the pizzicato tones.

The persistent rhythm of the Orient was present on the harp, at first, with an occasional flat seventh thrown in to make it more Egyptian. Yet the result was not as truly Oriental as some of the music of that other Frenchman, F. David.

There were some strong contrasts made in the number, which was certainly given a perfect performance by Messrs. Maquarre, Brooke and Schuecker, and there was more musical beauty in its measures than in ten modern Parisian symphonies.

Wolf-Ferrari has won abundant success in Europe, yet his works are but slightly known in America. This young Venetian has made two decisive operatic successes, his most recent one, "Curious Women", being still a great favorite abroad. In this chamber symphony he employs a string quartette, a contra-bass, a piano, flute, oboe, clarinette and bassoon. The forces, it will be seen, are not of symphonic size, neither is the length of full symphonic proportion. It is a concise and pleasing composition not unlike an orchestral Suite. The epic style and the skilful figure development of the symphony are not found in the measures of this "Sinfonia da Camera", except in the first movement, but there is a graceful leading of the voices and melodic invention, and originality too.

It is pleasant to notice how the new Italian composers are tending towards orchestral forms. Bossi, Sgambati, D'Ambrosio, Franchetti, Wolf-Ferrari, all of them are using the symphonic forms, and all of them are avoiding the ascetic style planted in the new French school by Cesar Franck. It is possible that Italy and Russia may yet lead us back to pleasant paths in classical instrumental forms.

We heartily admired this Italian work. M. Longy conducted it excellently, bringing out all its best points, and Mr. De Voto filled out the tonal volume finely at the piano, a most important factor here. The Theodorowicz string quartette and Mr. Keller, contra-bass, added the string parts.

The effect, in the small Potter Hall was exquisite. The first movement had something of the Liszt vein of dramatic contrasts. There was some splendid bassoon work in the second movement and the themes were portentous and "big with fate." The Allegretto gave good opportunities to the flute and was delightfully melodic. The finale was again most dramatic. A fine work altogether which we wish we might hear again.

Louis C. Elson.

POST
...SHINGTON, D. C
DEC 29 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 7, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahms' melodious second in D major, and the other number on the programme will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

TELEGRAPH.
...s PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 23 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the programme is a symphony in D major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performance coming in Boston January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the Orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
...ess PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 28 1907

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carenno, probably the greatest living woman pianist. She will play MacDowell's Concerto in D-minor. The most important item on the program will be a symphony in E-major, by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, the first performance coming in Boston this evening. It is a composition of tremendous proportions, and Dr. Muck and his orchestra have devoted three weeks to its rehearsal.

...Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...on PUBLIC LEDGER
...ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 29 ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The third concert given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an occasion of especial importance, offering concert-goers a new symphonic work, the rare opportunity of hearing the D minor concerto by Edward McDowell, one of the few composers of eminence this country has yet produced, and the reappearance of Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. The date of the concert is January 6. The symphony by Hermann Bischoff has yet to be played in America, its first performance being scheduled for the Boston concerts on January 3 and 4. It is a work of great dimensions, upon the preparation of which Doctor Muck and his men have been devoting weeks of labor. It is one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature which the last three years have witnessed. The remaining number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana, played in this city a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Damrosch.

...rom ...
...ddress ...
...ate DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston, January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

...om RECORD
...HILADELPHIA, PA
...ress ...
...e DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week will present Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston on January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

Symphony Hall: Mr. Paderewski

An authoritative performance, the emperor of pianists in the emperor of pianoforte concertos, was the impression left by Mr. Paderewski's playing at the Pension Fund concert last night. He dominated the orchestra; again, he merged his instrument into its mass to emerge triumphantly after the flutes and the 'cellos had sung their themes. The Beethoven E-flat concerto, a symphony with a solo instrument, covers a range from heroics to lyrics. Its royalty is the magnificent unconcern of the composer in brushing aside all tinsel ornaments and letting it stand forth in its bold, stark outline; and the royalty of its performance last night was of the same spirit.

Restrained to the opening cadenza (furnished as an innovation in his time, by the composer for the express purpose of keeping it in restraint), lyric in the long passages where we look to hear the instrument sound wiry, thunderous in his climaxes, the pianist, as one Olympian understanding another. As far as possible where such a display of artistry and feeling was involved, the performance was almost impersonal in its merging of the player with the thing played. It was altogether the E-flat concerto receiving a full enunciation and little, if any, of the soloist exploiting his powers.

Following the orchestral concert on the printed program came the informal pianoforte recital, which, by appearances, the pianist gracefully consented to carry off at a sitting. The first of the five encore numbers, the Chopin Ballade in A-flat, was a piece of creative imagination taking the Chopin music for a text. To be sure, it had all of the composer in it, but it had considerably more. The same was true of the waltz, the familiar octave étude (which suffered metamorphosis into something rich and strange) and the A-flat polonaise which brought this part of the programme to a climax.

The concert opened with the ever-popular and ever-appealing "Symphony Pathetique" of Tschaikovski, which never fails to throw the web of its Slavic discontent over the more placid Anglo-Saxon, rousing him to wonder whether, after all, things are for the best. At all events, he has to acknowledge that its tempests, its defiance, and its protests are superpersonal.

Once more last night the playing of Mr. Paderewski raised the question of an artist dissatisfied with his medium, whose mastery of it only serves to remind him of its limitations. Is dissatisfaction, the sense of limitation, the price that must be paid for complete mastery of an art? To be worthy of the thing desired, we must be able to despise it, are the words of the sage. And what is the case with the pianist?

The Symphony Concert

Mr. Goodrich is too well known in Boston for his manifest abilities as an organizer, as a conductor of orchestras, as the sustainer of so significant an institution as the Choral Art Society, as well as a solid and able teacher to need any characterization of his services to music in Boston and elsewhere. It is doubtful whether in his versatile activity many in the public at large are fully acquainted with his conspicuous skill as a concert organist of serious ideals. Furthermore, those who know his work as organist and choirmaster at Trinity Church have limited opportunity to know the scope and variety of his attainments as an organist in concert pieces. Few also know of the warm and unqualified praise which Charles Marie Widor, himself among the foremost organists of the world and sparing in his commendation, bestowed upon his brilliant pupil. The appearance of Mr. Goodrich, therefore, as soloist at these concerts is in the nature of a welcome treat. The toccata and fugue by Bach, which began the programme, is well known to the frequenters of piano recitals, for it is a favorite opening number in a transcription by Tausig. While one must admire the extreme skill with which its effects are transferred in dazzling brilliance to the specialized technique of the piano, one must at the same time deplore the manifest injury to specific organ effects. It was doubly welcome, therefore, to hear it in its original version. Mr. Goodrich played this classic with dignity, restrained and yet adequate registration, a majestic and implacable rhythm that was a rare pleasure to hear. The superb outlines and the firm architectural structure stood out in clear relief, and the brilliant cadenzas assumed a legitimate and fitting climax which is not always felt in the ingenious transcription by Tausig.

In considering any combination of orchestra and organ, one is always tempted to recall Berlioz's memorable and witty comparison that the relation between the two is that of emperor and pope, each supreme in his field but bound to clash sooner or later. Berlioz, of course, refers to the complete orchestra, and modern composers recognizing the justice of his criticism have limited the orchestra in such a way that it may offer the minimum of antagonizing sonority. Accordingly Rheinberger has wisely scored his accompaniment for strings and three horns. The organ assumes the burden of replacing the customary wind instruments, while the horns for the most part sustain and enrich the sonority of the strings. The time was when Rheinberger was thought to be the coming composer, destined to neutralize the baneful and growing influence of Wagner. His orchestral pieces were given a place upon our programmes, his pianoforte concerto was played by zealous enthusiasts, his chamber music works were eagerly produced as novelties of interest. Little by little his compositions have disappeared from the sheer pressure of more important works. It seems as if his works for organ contain the best of his individuality, the most significant portions of his message. This concerto in F major is contrived with uncommon skill as regards relation between orchestra and organ. One almost forgets Berlioz's aphorism in the rich contrast of sonorities that never seem to jar, the opposition of organ and orchestra is always grateful, frequently ingenious and full of harmonious and often brilliant effect. As regards the composition itself the first movement contains the most abstract beauty in its [illegible] and [illegible] times grave [illegible] mood. In the slow movement the inspiration seems to flag somewhat, although the opening is full of thoughtful poetry and the coda is distinct in its charm. If on a single hearing the finale seems to approach triviality, an unfitting end for a work of such definite elevation of sentiment, it is brilliant and effective in its workmanship, and the thematic treatment is full of resource. Mr. Goodrich played the concerto with reverent interpretation of the composer's intentions, he built up his climaxes with skilful command of registration; the cadenza lent an appropriate atmosphere of imposing brilliancy befitting a solo instrument. As in the toccata his command of rhythm, his willingness to let the organ speak for itself without attempting a velocity foreign to the nature of the instrument, his delicate intermixture of sonorities with the orchestra, all justify unquestionably the reputation which he has steadily earned as organist. Moreover the choice of this concerto serves to recall to notice a concerto that is a notable addition to a literature that is all too scanty, as well as to convince students and audience alike of the claims which Rheinberger may still have upon the future. It only remains to add that Mr. Goodrich was cordially and appreciatively recalled by an enthusiastic audience.

E. B. H.

DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahms' melodious second in D major. The other number on the programme will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

MME. TERESA CARRENO,
The pianist who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on January 8.

TIMES,

DEC 29 1907

Mme. Teresa Carreno to Play With Boston Symphony

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor.

The symphony will be Brahm's melodious second in D major, and the other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR.

WASH. D. C.

DEC 29 1907

Boston Symphony and Carreno.

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist. She will play MacDowell's "Concerto in D Minor." The symphony will be Brahm's melodious "Second in D Major," and the other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

POST

DEC 29 1907

Under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, Mme. Olga Samaroff will give a piano recital at the National Monday afternoon, January 20, at 4:30. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, and Mme. Samaroff, the month of January at the National will be the center of attraction for all local music lovers.

[98]

DECEMBER [illegible] 1907

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Gustav Bumcke. "Der Spaziergang," Symphonic Poem.
Berlioz. Trio des Ismaelites from "L'Enfance du Christ".
Wolf-Ferrari. Sinfonia da Camera. Op. 8.

Again an interesting and unusual programme. Almost every number at these concerts excites the interest or piques the curiosity. Bumcke is a name that has not yet made its way into the biographical dictionaries, but judging by the titles of the movements and their contemplative character, he is a German of the new school.

Bumcke's work is scored for Flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinettes, Two Bassoons and Harp. The Longy Club furnished all the performers except the harpist who was our symphony virtuoso, Mr. Schuecker. One can scarcely translate the word "Spaziergang" into English; perhaps a "Stroll" would come as close to it as any word our language possesses. One would scarcely think that a pleasure stroll would afford material enough for a work of this character, when one thinks of the Mazeppas, the Amphales, the Hercules, the Macabre Dances, that have been subjects for this kind of composition, nevertheless we are obliged to Mr. Bumcke for leading the symphonic poem into pleasanter and less exciting paths.

But the composition was far more of a Suite than a symphonic poem. There was a degree of sameness in the five short movements, although one could find matin bells, and song birds of all kinds, including our old friend, the Cuckoo. The fourth movement, marked "Little Intermezzo" was an entire nest of birds, and became a rather pretty Scherzo. We could not find much of eventide in the finale, although it was labelled "Abend." The work was finely played and greatly applauded.

Hector Berlioz's trio was quaint and archaic, as the whole of his "Infancy of Christ" is. The number is not as wonderful as "Le Repos de la Sainte Famille" in the same Oratorio, which combines woodwind and strings in a peculiarly attractive manner, but it is beautiful nevertheless. The old story that Berlioz deceived all Paris by this work and caused the critics to believe that it was the composition of a mythical monk, named Pere Ducre, may be discredited, but he certainly fooled a select Paris audience about the "Choeur Mystique" in this work ("O mon Ame") which they all believed to be mediaeval in origin.

All through the oratorio, however, there is a studied brevity and simplicity, and this is apparent in the present trio as well. It is an odd combination, flutes and harp, and one which has seldom been very successful. Mozart united one flute and harp in his concerto, but that work is but seldom taken from the shelf nowadays. Mr. Schuecker played most delicately and the brilliancy of the two flutes was a good foil to the pizzicato tones.

The persistent rhythm of the Orient was present on the harp, at first, with an occasional flat seventh thrown in to make it more Egyptian. Yet the result was not as truly Oriental as some of the music of that other Frenchman, F. David.

There were some strong contrasts made in the number, which was certainly given a perfect performance by Messrs. Maquarre, Brooke and Schuecker, and there was more musical beauty in its measures than in ten modern Parisian symphonies.

Wolf-Ferrari has won abundant success in Europe, yet his works are but slightly known in America. This young Venetian has made two decisive operatic successes, his most recent one, "Curious Women", being still a great favorite abroad. In this chamber symphony he employs a string quartette, a contra-bass, a piano, flute, oboe, clarinette and bassoon. The forces, it will be seen, are not of symphonic size, neither is the length of full symphonic proportion. It is a concise and pleasing composition not unlike an orchestral Suite. The epic style and the skilful figure development of the symphony are not found in the measures of this "Sinfonia da Camera", except in the first movement, but there is a graceful leading of the voices and melodic invention, and originality too.

It is pleasant to notice how the new Italian composers are tending towards orchestral forms. Bossi, Sgambati, D'Ambrosio, Franchetti, Wolf-Ferrari, all of them are using the symphonic forms, and all of them are avoiding the ascetic style planted in the new French school by Cesar Franck. It is possible that Italy and Russia may yet lead us back to pleasant paths in classical instrumental forms.

We heartily admired this Italian work. M. Longy conducted it excellently, bringing out all its best points, and Mr. De Voto filled out the tonal volume finely at the piano, a most important factor here. The Theodorowicz string quartette and Mr. Keller, contra-bass, added the string parts.

The effect, in the small Potter Hall was exquisite. The first movement had something of the Liszt vein of dramatic contrasts. There was some splendid bassoon work in the second movement and the themes were portentous and "big with fate." The Allegretto gave good opportunities to the flute and was delightfully melodic. The finale was again most dramatic. A fine work altogether which we wish we might hear again.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 7, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahms' melodious second in D major, and the other number on the programme will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

TELEGRAPH.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the programme is a symphony in D major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performance coming in Boston January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the Orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEC 28 1907

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carenno, probably the greatest living woman pianist. She will play MacDowell's Concerto in D-minor. The most important item on the program will be a symphony in E-major, by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, the first performance coming in Boston this evening. It is a composition of tremendous proportions, and Dr. Much and his orchestra have devoted three weeks to its rehearsal.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LEDGER

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEC 28 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The third concert given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be an occasion of especial importance, offering concert-goers a new symphonic work, the rare opportunity of hearing the D minor concerto by Edward McDowell, one of the few composers of eminence this country has yet produced, and the reappearance of Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. The date of the concert is January 6. The symphony by Hermann Bischoff has yet to be played in America, its first performance being scheduled for the Boston concerts on January 3 and 4. It is a work of great dimensions, upon the preparation of which Doctor Muck and his men have been devoting weeks of labor. It is one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature which the last three years have witnessed. The remaining number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana, played in this city a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Damrosch.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston, January 3 and 4. It is a work of enoromus dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week will present Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston on January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

* * *

om NORTH AMERICAN
ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA
ate DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carrena as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work of enormous dimensions, which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing for the last three weeks. It is heralded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody

rk, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om ENQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
ddress DEC 29 1907
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston January 8 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that have been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Es-

k, 1

Daily Times,
ss Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 10th, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

Daily Citizen,
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 10, will present Madame Teresa Carreno, as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D major. The symphony will be the second of Brahm's in D major, and the other numbers will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

k,

n Daily Eagle,
ress Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 28 1907
e

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 10, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahm's in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

18

Standard Union,
rom Brooklyn, N. Y.
ddress
ate DEC 28 1907

At the Hippodrome to-morrow night Madame Teresa Carreno, who is making a big hit on her tour, will give a concert. The Hippodrome orchestra will assist the famous pianist.

Madame Carreno will appear at the Baptist Temple on Jan. 10, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

k,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Union
Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 10, will present Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahm's in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

rk, 1

NEW YORK TIMES
ss DEC 29 1907

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on Jan. 8 and 4. It is a work of huge dimensions, something in the style of Richard Strauss, and an idea of its technical difficulties may be had from the fact that Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been working at it for the past three weeks. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Händel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Götz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK WORLD
ss DEC 29 1907

chestra will play several selections.

Fine Programme Promised.

The next of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important composition on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Herrmann Bischoff. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Gotz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

is

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
ddress
ate DEC 29 1907

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on January 8 and 4. Madame Carreno will play McDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two Wind Choirs and String Orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Götz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

18

ss
20

The next two Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on January 8 and 4. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overtures. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, N. 5, and Hermann Gotz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

RECORD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908

Seats are selling at Symphony hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony hall on next Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 8.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY JANUARY 2, 1908

Two concerts will be given by Sousa and his band at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon and evening. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano; Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, cornetist, and he also promises a new march of his own.

[99]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau (in the World)
N. Y. EVG SUN
ss
JAN 2 - 1908

All the symphony bands are taking heart of grace to reappear after their holidays. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concert in Carnegie Hall, one week from to-night, will score its "century and a half" in Gotham, as it will be the 150th New York concert, and incidentally the 2,555th performance, of the Hub players.

"So you see we have loaned our orchestra to New York," says one of its active agents, "on a very fair percentage of the gross."

As Mme. Carreño will play MacDowell's second concerto for piano, Mrs. MacDowell will have a box.

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important novelties of the season outside of oratorio or opera. It is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America at Boston to-morrow.

Mr. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head. This particular symphony had its first performance at the Ton Künstler Versammlung in Essen in the spring of 1900, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work, it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time. It is said to be a most interesting examp e of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future."

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS

The third popular price Sunday concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 5, at 3.30 o'clock, will present a varied program of more than usual excellence, the chief figure in which will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Conried Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. More than usual interest is the coming of Miss Abott to Boston, because of the disappointment caused earlier in the season, when by sickness she was compelled to abandon her concert, which was to have been given in Jordan Hall. Miss Abott is down for three numbers on the program and the other artists will be Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox at the piano.

Seats are selling at Symphony Hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon and evening. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano, and Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, the skilled cornetist, who is well and favorably known here. He also brings a new march, entitled "Powhatan's Daughter." In the afternoon the principal numbers will be Liszt's "Les Preludes," Sousa's Suite, entitled "Three Quotations," and "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." In the evening Grieg's "Peer Gynt" and Sousa's Suite "The Last Days of Pompeii" will be played among other things. Of course there will be ample encore numbers made up of the popular music.

TRAVELER, THURSDAY. JANUARY 2. 1908

Musical Events

THE third popular price Sunday concert which will be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, at 3:30 o'clock, will present a varied programme of more than usual excellence, the chief figure in which will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Conried Metropolitan Grand Opera Company of New York. More than usual interest is the coming of Miss Abott to Boston, because of the disappointment caused earlier in the season when, by sickness, she was compelled to abandon her concert, which was to have been given in Jordan Hall. Miss Abott is down for three numbers on the programme, and the other artists will be Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox at the piano.

SOUSA COMING.

Seats are selling at Symphony Hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony Hall on next Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 8. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano, and Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, the skilled cornetist, who is well and favorably known here. The also brings a new march, entitled "Powhatan's Daughter." In the afternoon the principal numbers will be Liszt's "Les Preludes"; Sousa's Suite, entitled "Three Quotations," and "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." In the evening Grieg's "Peer Gynt" and Sousa's Suite "The Last Days of Pompeii" will be played among other things. Of course there will be ample encore numbers made up of the popular

om JOURNAL
dress PROVIDENCE,
DEC 28 1907
te

FAMOUS VIOLINIST IS DEAD.

Carl Meisel Was Original Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Carl Meisel, a master of the violin, widely known as a soloist and teacher in many parts of the country, and one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at his home here yesterday of heart failure, aged 80 years.

He was

The First Established Press Clipping Bureau
Newspaper Cutting Bureau
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address
Date DEC 28
Estab

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert will be the concert-master of the Orchestra, Mr. Wendling. Mr. Wendling is one of the most interesting of the new members. He is the concert-master of the Court Theatre and Court Orchestra of Stuttgart, the capital of the kingdom of Wurtemberg, and is in Boston for this season on leave of absence, taking the place of Professor Willy Hess, who is spending the year abroad. Mr. Wendling is the fifth to have held the position of concert-master with the Boston Symphony. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second was Franz Kneisel, the third was Fernandez Arbos, and the fourth was Hess. Mr. Wendling is an unusually young man to hold such a place, as he is only 32 years old, but he has held similar positions for the past eight years. He was born in Strassburg and went through the conservatory there. Then he went to Berlin and spent three years and a half with Joachim. A year was given to teaching in his old conservatory, when he was called to Mehlingen, to be concert-master of this celebrated orchestra under Fritz Steinbach. He held that place for four years, and then he went to Stuttgart where he has been for the past four years. In the spring of 1903 he was called to London by Hans Richter of the German performances at Covent Garden, and he held this post for three successive seasons. In the summer of the same year Dr. Muck took him to Bayreuth to be concert-master of the Wagner festival performances, and he has held that position at all succeeding festivals. It was Dr. Muck who called him to Boston for this season, and his success, both as a concert-master and as a soloist has been most gratifying to him and to the friends of the orchestra. He will play a rarely heard concerto by Mozart, the fifth in A major.

The other works on the program will be Humperdinck's overture "Heirath Wider Willen;" Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The overture belongs to Humperdinck's last opera, although it was in a sense an afterthought, and was written some time after the opera was produced, which occurred in Germany about 18 months ago. It shows all the skill and melodic charms that characterizes Humperdinck's famous little opera Haensel and Gretel.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony has been probably the most discussed symphonic work of our times. Although the biography of the Russian composer written by his brother Modeste, has destroyed the favorite legend that grew up about the symphony, that in it Tschaikowsky consciously prefigured his approaching death, the symphony itself with its marvelous expression of grief and despair will always lend color to such a theory. Although Tschaikowsky had every expectation of living for years when he wrote it, the fact still remains that the most gifted man of his time died suddenly of cholera a short time after his first performance, and that had he wished to give musical voice to his approaching end, he could not have done it more eloquently than he has in this symphony. One of the great musical moments in last year's season in Boston was Dr. Muck's tremendously highly wrought and tense reading of this symphony, and Providence may deem itself fortunate in having an opportunity to hear it.

LILLIE PERRY,
With "The Cherry Blossoms" Company at the Imperial Next Week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
ss PROVIDENCE, R. I.
DEC 29 1907

GOODSON RECITAL.

Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, who on the occasion of her American debut last January with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Boston, made such an extraordinary impression upon musicians, public and critics, is now touring the United States and will appear in Providence at the Churchill House on Angell street on Jan. 17, under the direction of George W. Macmillan.

Miss Goodson studied for four years with the great Leschetizky, is of Englis[h] birth in her own land, and somewhat [...]

om NORTE AMERICANO
Idress
ate

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carrena as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work of enormous dimensions, which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing for the last three weeks. It is heralded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that has been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om
dress
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6, will present Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The most important item on the program is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. This is a work that has yet to be played in America, its first performances coming in Boston January 3 and 4. It is a work of enormous dimensions, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been rehearsing it for the last three weeks. It is regarded as one of the most important contributions to symphonic literature that have been made in the last three years. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 10th, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 10, will present Madame Teresa Carreno, as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D major. The symphony will be the second of Brahm's in D major, and the other numbers will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 28 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening, January 10, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahm's in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck"s overture, "The Forced Marriage."

Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 28 1907

At the Hippodrome to-morrow night Madame Teresa Carreno, who is making a big hit on her tour, will give a concert. The Hippodrome orchestra will assist the famous pianist.

Madame Carreno will appear at the Baptist Temple on Jan. 10, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Union
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 10, will present Mme. Teresa Carreno as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be the second of Brahms in D major, and the other number will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

NEW YORK TIMES
ss
DEC 29 1907

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on Jan. 3 and 4. It is a work of huge dimensions, something in the style of Richard Strauss, and an idea of its technical difficulties may be had from the fact that Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been working at it for the past three weeks. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Händel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Götz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

ss
907

chestra will play several selections.

Fine Programme Promised.

The next of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important composition on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Herrmann Bischoff. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Gotz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om
ldress
ite

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4. Madame Carreno will play McDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two Wind Choirs and String Orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5, and Hermann Gotz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

ss

The next two Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. At the evening concert the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and at the afternoon concert Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who will make his first appearance in New York as a solo violinist. The most important item on Thursday evening's programme will be a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4. Mme. Carreno will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor, and the other number on the evening programme will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overtures. For Saturday afternoon the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, N. 5, and Hermann Gotz's symphony in F major, No. 9.

RECORD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908

Seats are selling at Symphony hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony hall on next Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 8.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908

Two concerts will be given by Sousa and his band at Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon and evening. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano; Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, cornetist, and he also promises a new march of his own.

[99]

vspaper Cutting Bureau in the N. Y. EVG SUN
ss
JAN 2 1908

All the symphony bands are taking heart of grace to reappear after their holidays. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concert in Carnegie Hall, one week from to-night, will score its "century and a half" in Gotham, as it will be the 150th New York concert, and incidentally the 2,555th performance, of the Hub players.

"So you see we have loaned our orchestra to New York," says one of its active agents, "on a very fair percentage of the gross."

As Mme. Carreño will play MacDowell's second concerto for piano, Mrs. MacDowell will have a box.

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important novelties of the season outside of oratorio or opera. It is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, which has its first performances in America at Boston to-morrow.

Mr. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head. This particular symphony had its first performance at the Ton Künstler Versammlung in Essen in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work, it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time. I is said to be a most interesting examp e of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future."

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS

The third popular price Sunday concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Jan. 5, at 3.30 o'clock, will present a varied program of more than usual excellence, the chief figure in which will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Conried Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. More than usual interest is the coming of Miss Abott to Boston, because of the disappointment caused earlier in the season, when by sickness she was compelled to abandon her concert, which was to have been given in Jordan Hall. Miss Abott is down for three numbers on the program and the other artists will be Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox at the piano.

Seats are selling at Symphony Hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon and evening. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano, and Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, the skilled cornetist, who is well and favorably known here. He also brings a new march, entitled "Powhatan's Daughter." In the afternoon the principal numbers will be Liszt's "Les Preludes," Sousa's Suite, entitled "Three Quotations," and "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." In the evening Grieg's "Peer Gynt" and Sousa's Suite "The Last Days of Pompeii" will be played among other things. Of course there will be ample encore numbers made up of the popular music.

TRAVELER, THURSDAY. JANUARY 2. 1908

Musical Events

THE third popular price Sunday concert which will be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, at 3:30 o'clock, will present a varied programme of more than usual excellence, the chief figure in which will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Conried Metropolitan Grand Opera Company of New York. More than usual interest is the coming of Miss Abott to Boston, because of the disappointment caused earlier in the season when, by sickness, she was compelled to abandon her concert, which was to have been given in Jordan Hall. Miss Abott is down for three numbers on the programme, and the other artists will be Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox at the piano.

SOUSA COMING.

Seats are selling at Symphony Hall for the two concerts that Sousa and his band will give in Symphony Hall on next Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 8. Mr. Sousa brings three soloists, Miss Lucy Allen, soprano, and Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, the skilled cornetist, who is well and favorably known here. The also brings a new march, entitled "Powhatan's Daughter." In the afternoon the principal numbers will be Liszt's "Les Preludes"; Sousa's Suite, entitled "Three Quotations," and "Jubilee" fro Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." I the evening Grieg's "Peer Gynt" and Sousa's Suite "The Last Days of Pompeii" will be played among other things. Of course there will be ample encore numbers made up of the popular

om JOURNAL
dress PROVIDENCE,
te

FAMOUS VIOLINIST IS DEAD.

Carl Meisel Was Original Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Carl Meisel, a master of the violin, widely known as a soloist and teacher in many parts of the country, and one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at his home here yesterday of heart failure, aged 80 years.

He was born in Germany and came to Boston wher

ROMEIKE NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert will be the concert-master of the Orchestra, Mr. Wendling. Mr. Wendling is one of the most interesting of the new members. He is the concert-master of the Court Theatre and Court Orchestra of Stuttgart, the capital of the kingdom of Wurtemberg, and is in Boston for this season on leave of absence, taking the place of Professor Willy Hess, who is spending the year abroad. Mr. Wendling is the fifth to have held the position of concert-master with the Boston Symphony. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second was Franz Kneisel, the third was Fernandez-Arbos, and the fourth was Hess. Mr. Wendling is an unusually young man to hold such a place, as he is only 32 years old, but he has held similar positions for the past eight years. He was born in Strassburg and went through the conservatory there. Then he went to Berlin and spent three years and a half with Joachim. A year was given to teaching in his old conservatory, when he was called to Meiningen, to be concert-master of this celebrated orchestra under Fritz Steinbach. He held that place for four years, and then he went to Stuttgart where he has been for the past four years. In the spring of 1903 he was called to London by Hans Richter of the German performances at Covent Garden, and he held this post for three successive seasons. In the summer of the same year, Dr. Muck took him to Bayreuth to be concert-master of the Wagner festival performances, and he has held that position at all succeeding festivals. It was Dr. Muck who called him to Boston for this season, and his success, both as a concert-master and as a soloist has been most gratifying to him and to the friends of the orchestra. He will play a rarely heard concerto by Mozart, the fifth in A major.

The other works on the program will be Humperdinck's overture "Heirath Wider Willen;" Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. The overture belongs to Humperdinck's last opera, although it was in a sense an afterthought, and was written some time after the opera was produced, which occurred in Germany about 18 months ago. It shows all the skill and melodic charms that characterizes Humperdinck's famous little opera Haensel and Gretel.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony has been probably the most discussed symphonic work of our times. Although the biography of the Russian composer written by his brother Modeste, has destroyed the favorite legend that grew up about the symphony, that in it Tschaikowsky consciously prefigured his approaching death, the symphony itself with its marvelous expression of grief and despair will always lend color to such a theory. Although Tschaikowsky had every expectation of living for years when he wrote it, the fact still remains that the most gifted man of his time died suddenly of cholera a short time after his first performance, and that had he wished to give musical voice to his approaching end, he could not have done it more eloquently than he has in this symphony. One of the great musical moments in last year's season in Boston was Dr. Muck's tremendously highly wrought and tense reading of this symphony, and Providence may deem itself fortunate in having an opportunity to hear it.

LILLIE PERRY,
With "The Cherry Blossoms" Company at the Imperial Next Week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

GOODSON RECITAL

Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, who on the occasion of her American debut last January with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Boston, made such an extraordinary impression upon musicians, public and critics, is now touring the United States and will appear in Providence at the Churchill House on Angell street on Jan. 17, under the direction of George W. MacMillan.

Miss Goodson, studied for four years with the great Leschetizky, is of high repute in her own land, and somewhat widely known in various countries of Europe. Her appearance in this city is awaited with

LUCY ALLEN, WHO SINGS WITH SOUSA A JOLLY JACK TAR OFF THE STAGE

Is an Enthusiastic Yachtswoman—Has Ordered a Cruiser That Is Speedy.

Miss Lucy Allen,
Boston soprano who sings with Sousa's band.

MISS LUCY ALLEN, the Boston soprano, who will sing in two concerts with Sousa's Band at Symphony Hall on Wednesday, is a very enthusiastic yachtswoman and as thoroughly understands nautical terms and laws as many a hardened sea-going navigator. During frequent periods of her six years' course of study in foreign cities this clever Bostonian made numerous cruises in European waters in company with a party of friends.

Miss Allen has placed an order with a very successful boatbuilder on the St. Lawrence for a yacht cruiser which is to be at her disposal in this city in the spring. She has invited a party of close acquaintances to join her in a cruise of the Great Lakes and expects to leave Boston just previous to Independence day for the delights of a water journey to Duluth. On the return some time will be spent at Mackinac islands—the Newport of Northern Michigan.

Ample room for comfort and living accommodations will be the principal features of the craft, though speed requirements have not been overlooked, as the equipment calls for a 200-horse power engine for motive power. It is expected to develop speed results. An able crew will be in charge, so that all the time of those on the passenger list will be devoted to entertainment research.

Miss Allen was a keen observer of all the water events and flotillas at the Jamestown Exposition last summer and made the two different all-water routes

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
DEC 29 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the hour for beginning the concert being 8:15. The soloist will be the concert master of the orchestra, Mr. Wendling. Mr. Wendling is one of the most interesting of new members. He is the concert master of the Court Theatre and Court Orchestra of Stuttgart, the capital of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, and is in Boston for this season on leave of absence, taking the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who is spending the year abroad. Mr. Wendling is the fifth to have held the position of concert master with the Boston Symphony. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second was Franz Kneisel, the third was Fernandez-Arbos, and the fourth was Hess.

Mr. Wendling is an unusually young man to hold such a place, as he is only 32 years old, but he has held similar positions for the past eight years. He was born in Strassburg, and went through the Conservatory there. Then he went to Berlin and spent three years and a half with Joachim. A year was given to teaching in his old Conservatory when he was called to Meiningen, to be concert master of this celebrated orchestra under Fritz Steinbach, where he has been for the past four years. In the spring of 1903 he was called to London by Hans Richter of the German performances at Covent Garden, and he held this post for three successive seasons. In the summer of the same year Dr. Muck took him to Bayreuth to be concert master of the Wagner festival performances, and he has held that position at all succeeding festivals. It was Dr. Muck who called him to Boston for this season, and his success, both as a concert master and as a soloist has been most gratifying to him and to the friends of the orchestra. He will play a rarely heard concerto by Mozart, the fifth in A-major.

The other works on the programme will be Humperdinck's Overture, "Heirath Wilder Willen;" and Brahm's Symphony No. 2. The overture belongs to Humperdinck's last opera, although it was in a sense an afterthought, and was written some time after the opera was produced, which occurred in German months ago. It shows all the

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908.

SOUSA IN BOSTON

The mere announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next week is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. He brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for so many years. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist, who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano.

Sousa's programs show the same skill that have characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and on the printed program a majority of the works presented are serious or semi-serious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores, which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of Sousa's coming will be a new march which is entitled "Powhatan's Daughter."

POPULAR SUNDAY CONCERT

The fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30. The particular star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York. Miss Abott was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming to the disappointment of the many who wished to hear her sing. The desire to hear her now is therefore all the greater.

The other artists on the program are well known in this city: Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a very high standard at these Sunday concerts and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them.

The accompanist will be Mr. Rosenstein of New York, and Charles North of this city will play the flute obbligato in the mad scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
DEMO NEW YOR
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
NEWS
From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
JAN 1 - 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Another delightful concert was given at Infantry Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra before a good sized audience. Special interest attached to the concert in the appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, who has come from Stuttgart to act as concert master of the orchestra during the year's leave of absence given to Prof. Willy Hess. There was considerable disappointment over the substitution of a Brahms symphony for the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which was announced originally. Moreover, a promise of the "Pathetic" for the next concert accompanied the announcement of the change on a slip inserted in the program book.

The order of the program was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for violin in A-major, No. 5, ... Mozart
1. Allegro aperto.
2. Adagio.
3. Tempo di menuetto.
Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, ... Brahms
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Adagio non troppo.
3. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4. Allegro con spirito.

Quite a novelty was afforded by the overture to Humperdinck's, comic opera, "Die Hierat wider Willen," a work based on a comedy by Alexandre Dumas, and which had its first presentation less than two years ago in Berlin. The thematic material for the overture is taken largely from the opera itself. The overture was a bit disappointing. It was not without the charm of orchestral color nor the evidence of a skillful workmanship. The hearty round of applause which followed, however, was plainly due to the finale, which works up to a brilliant and exciting close.

Dr. Muck's reading was careful and sympathetic, and the orchestra played it with fine energy and discrimination.

Mr. Wendling's choice of a solo number was one of the half-dozen concertos which Mozart wrote for the violin, music which requires a musician to play it, as it calls for delicacy rather than power, for both agility and the clearest legato, and, above all, for tonal and rhythmical perfection. All these qualities Mr. Wendling possesses abundantly.

The last concert of the Symphony series for the present season will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address
JAN 5- 1908

Mme. Theresa Carreno will be the assisting soloist for the third Boston Symphony concert this season in Brooklyn on Friday [illegible] at the Temple. [illegible] will be the other

Standard Union,
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
DEC 29 1907

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE

San Carlo Co. To Give Opera Lovers A Treat Next Week.

FAMOUS SOLOISTS IN CASTS

German Opera Co. At Lyric Friday. Prof. Emmanuel Wad To Resume Recitals At Peabody.

What is expected to prove an unusually brilliant and successful season of grand opera here will begin at the Lyric a week from tomorrow evening, when the members of the San Carlo Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. Henry Russell, will give a week's performance of the greatest operatic works now before the public. The company, which numbers among its personnel several of the greatest lyric stars of Europe and America, will present the series in their original languages—Italian, French and German. Performances will be given each evening, except Wednesday, when a performance will be given in Wilmington, Del. On the same evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Lyric.

One of the most important features in connection with the engagement is that it will give Baltimore music lovers an opportunity to hear the masterpieces of the lyric drama excellently given at an expense within the reach of practically everyone, as the price of the best seats is $2.50 and there are some good seats for 75 cents. Here is the list of Director Russell's artists, which includes some of the best singers of two hemispheres: Mme. Lillian Nordica, who has not been seen in Baltimore for at least five years and who is believed to be one of the greatest dramatic sopranos of this century; Miss Alice Nielsen, who captivated the hearts of American audiences when she appeared in light opera and who has met with exceptional success in grand opera; Mme. Jane Noria, the America soprano, a beauty of international fame; Milly Bramonia, Tina Desana and Annita Perego, sopranos; Mlle. Rosa Olitzka, the famous Polish mezzo soprano, whose characterization of Ortrud in "Lohengrin" made her famous the world over; Guglielmina Marchi, the Italian, and Marie Claessens, the Belgian contralto; Florencio Constantino, the great Spanish tenor, who has few equals and no superiors; Carlo Albani, the Italian tenor, who for two years was the idol of Viennese music lovers; Carlo Dani, Ernesto Giaccone and Giuseppe Oppezzo, tenors. Victor Maurel, the unique Rigoletto, one of the greatest lyric artists of the age; Ramon Blanchart, Rodolfo Fornari, Adamo Galperin and Attilio Pucini, baritones; A. P. de Segurola, Giulio Rossi and Luigi Tavecchia, bassos, will also be in the casts. Signor Arnaldo Conti will conduct the orchestra during the week.

MISS ALICE NIELSEN

Baltimore's series of performances will be as follows:

Monday Night—"La Giaconda" (in Italian).
Tuesday Night—"Rigoletto" (in Italian).
Thursday Matinee—"Carmen" (in French).
Thursday Night—"Faust" (in French).
Friday Night—"Lohengrin" (in German).
Saturday Matinee—"Rigoletto."
Saturday Night—Verdi's "Aida" (in Italian).

World-Famed Soloist Coming.

Of the list of lyric celebrities who are to visit this city with the San Carlo company the most interesting is probably Senor Florencio Constantino, the leading tenor. He made his debut a few years ago in Buenos Ayres. So great was his triumph that engagements soon followed at the royal opera houses at Madrid and Covent Garden, and the Imperial opera houses in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw and Berlin. He created the role of Cavaradossi in "La Tosca" at Nice under the direction of the composer Puccini and of Turiddo in "Cavalleria Rusticana" under the direction of Mascagni.

It is said that his voice is perfectly produced and of finest timbre throughout its entire compass. It is exquisite in quality and clarity, resonant, ringing and abundant in scope and power. In his earlier career in Spain Constantino was a civil engineer, and is said to have figured considerably in the politics of his country.

Those who admired Alice Nielsen when she was one of the queens of light opera in this country continue to be interested in her career in her new and more serious field. She could always sing—she never had to learn. She was born in America, grew to girlhood here and sang herself into American favor. Her first professional engagement was made when she was 8 years old. At 15 she made her debut as the prima donna in "The Mikado" in Oakland, Cal. It was at the advice of Mr. Russell, then in London, that she determined to prepare herself for the grand opera stage. Her debut in grand opera was made several months later in Queen's Hall, London. Then she went to Italy for a further study of the Romance languages, and four months later appeared in Rome in "The Daughter of the Regiment" in the old Bellini Theatre, the same theatre at which Enrico Caruso made his debut, and where Constantino first appeared.

MISS JANE NORIA

To Present The "Gypsy Baron."

An interesting Baltimore musical event of the coming week will be the performance of Johann Strauss' beautiful little operetta, "The Gypsy Baron," at the Lyric, Friday evening by the members of the German Opera Company, of Philadelphia. Arrangements for the performance, which will be the first of a series to be given here during the winter, have been practically completed. The coming of the German company has met with the hearty indorsement of local Germans, several of the larger German societies having passed resolutions to that effect. There is, therefore, practically every assurance that the initial performance will prove a decided success.

The visiting artists will bring with them their own orchestra, composed of 50 pieces, and the performance will be given under the direction of Herr August Rodemann, a musical conductor of note both in this country and in Germany. Fraulein Emilie Schoenfeld will appear in the prima donna role as Saffi, while the leading male part will be sung by Herr Paul Neiva, as Sandor Barnskay, the Gypsy Baron. Others in the cast will be Fraulein Johanna Wagner, as Czipra; Fraulein Paula Blenna, as Arsena, and Herman Gerold, as Zsupan. The same company will give Von Suppe's "Boccaccio" at the Lyric on the evening of January 13.

FLORENCIO CONSTANTINO
Tenor.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8, when Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will appear as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahm's melodious second in D major. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody [illegible]"

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908

The mere announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next Wednesday is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. Sousa comes to Boston after a tour of the Pacific coast, which was the most successful of any that he has ever made, and he leaves Boston to go through the south, and the chances are that he will not give another concert in this city during the present season.

[100]

LUCY ALLEN, WHO SINGS WITH SOUSA A JOLLY JACK TAR OFF THE STAGE

Is an Enthusiastic Yachtswoman—Has Ordered a Cruiser That Is Speedy.

Miss Lucy Allen,
Boston soprano who sings with Sousa's band.

MISS LUCY ALLEN, the Boston soprano, who will sing in two concerts with Sousa's Band at Symphony Hall on Wednesday, is a very enthusiastic yachtswoman and as thoroughly understands nautical terms and laws as many a hardened sea-going navigator. During frequent periods of her six years' course of study in foreign cities this clever Bostonian made numerous cruises in European waters in company with a party of friends.

Miss Allen has placed an order with a very successful boatbuilder on the St. Lawrence for a yacht cruiser which is to be at her disposal in this city in the spring. She has invited a party of close acquaintances to join her in a cruise of the Great Lakes and expects to leave Boston just previous to Independence day for the delights of a water journey to Duluth. On the return, some time will be spent at Mackinac islands—the Newport of Northern Michigan.

Ample room for comfort and living accommodations will be the principal features of the craft, though speed requirements have not been overlooked, as the equipment calls for a 200-horse power engine for motive power. It is expected to develop speed results. An able crew will be in charge, so that all the time of those on the passenger list will be devoted to entertainment research.

Miss Allen was a keen observer of all the water events and flotillas at the Jamestown Exposition last summer and made the two different all-water routes to and from Norfolk.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YOR

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ldress .....

JAN 1 1908

st .....

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the hour for beginning the concert being 8:15. The soloist will be the concert master of the orchestra, Mr. Wendling, Mr. Wendling is one of the most interesting of new members. He is the concert master of the Court Theatre and Court Orchestra of Stuttgart, the capital of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, and is in Boston for this season on leave of absence, taking the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who is spending the year abroad. Mr. Wendling is the fifth to have held the position of concert master with the Boston Symphony. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second was Franz Kneisel, the third was Fernandez-Arbos, and the fourth was Hess.

Mr. Wendling is an unusually young man to hold such a place, as he is only 32 years old, but he has held similar positions for the past eight years. He was born in Strassburg, and went through the Conservatory there. Then he went to Berlin and spent three years and a half with Joachim. A year was given to teaching in his old Conservatory when he was called to Meiningen, to be concert master of this celebrated orchestra under Fritz Steinbach, where he has been for the past four years. In the spring of 1903 he was called to London by Hans Richter of the German performances at Covent Garden, and he held this post for three successive seasons. In the summer of the same year Dr. Muck took him to Bayreuth to be concert master of the Wagner festival performances, and he has held that position at all succeeding festivals. It was Dr. Muck who called him to Boston for this season, and his success, both as a concert master and as a soloist has been most gratifying to him and to the friends of the orchestra. He will play a rarely heard concerto by Mozart, the fifth in A-major.

The other works on the programme will be Humperdinck's Overture, "Heirath Wilder Willen;" and Brahm's Symphony No. 2. The overture belongs to Humperdinck's last opera, although it was in a sense an afterthought, and was written some time after the opera was produced, which occurred in Germany about 18 months ago. It shows all the skill and melodic charm that characterizes Humperdinck's famous little opera "Hansel und Gretel."

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908.

SOUSA IN BOSTON

The mere announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next week is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. He brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for so many years. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist, who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano.

Sousa's programs show the same skill that have characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and on the printed program a majority of the works presented are serious or semi-serious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores, which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of Sousa's coming will be a new march which is entitled "Powhatan's Daughter."

POPULAR SUNDAY CONCERT

The fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.30. The particular star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York. Miss Abott was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming to the disappointment of the many who wished to hear her sing. The desire to hear her now is therefore all the greater.

The other artists on the program are well known in this city: Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a very high standard at these Sunday concerts and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them.

The accompanist will be Mr. Rosenstein of New York, and Charles North of this city will play the flute obbligato in the mad scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

Address .....

Date .....

JAN 5 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Another delightful concert was given at Infantry Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra before a good sized audience. Special interest attached to the concert in the appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, who has come from Stuttgart to act as concert master of the orchestra during the year's leave of absence given to Prof. Willy Hess. There was considerable disappointment over the substitution of a Brahms symphony for the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which was announced originally. Moreover, a promise of the "Pathetic" for the next concert accompanied the announcement of the change on a slip inserted in the program book.

The order of the program was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage".....Humperdinck

Concerto for violin in A-major, No. 5, ...Mozart

1. Allegro aperto.
2. Adagio.
3. Tempo di menuetto.

Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, ...Brahms

1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Adagio non troppo.
3. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4. Allegro con spirito.

Quite a novelty was afforded by the overture to Humperdinck's comic opera, "Die Hierat wider Willen," a work based on a comedy by Alexandre Dumas, and which had its first presentation less than two years ago in Berlin. The thematic material for the overture is taken largely from the opera itself. The overture was a bit disappointing. It was not without the charm of orchestral color nor the evidence of a skillful workmanship. The hearty round of applause which followed, however, was plainly due to the finale, which works up to a brilliant and exciting close.

Dr. Muck's reading was careful and sympathetic, and the orchestra played it with fine energy and discrimination.

Mr. Wendling's choice of a solo number was one of the half-dozen concertos which Mozart wrote for the violin, music which requires a musician to play it, as it calls for delicacy rather than power, for both agility and the clearest legato, and, above all, for tonal and rhythmical perfection. All these qualities Mr. Wendling possesses abundantly.

The last concert of the Symphony series for the present season will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

Mme. Theresa Carreno will be the assisting soloist for the third Boston Symphony concert this season in Brooklyn on Friday night at the Baptist Temple. Brahms' Symphony No. 2 will be the chief orchestral number.

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908

The mere announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next Wednesday is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. Sousa comes to Boston after a tour of the Pacific coast, which was the most successful of any that he has ever made, and he leaves Boston to go through the south, and the chances are that he will not give another concert in this city during the present season.

[100]

...dard Union,

BALTIMORE MD

DEC 29 1907

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE

San Carlo Co. To Give Opera Lovers A Treat Next Week.

FAMOUS SOLOISTS IN CASTS

German Opera Co. At Lyric Friday. Prof. Emmanuel Wad To Resume Recitals At Peabody.

What is expected to prove an unusually brilliant and successful season of grand opera here will begin at the Lyric a week from tomorrow evening, when the members of the San Carlo Opera Company, under the direction of Mr. Henry Russell, will give a week's performance of the greatest operatic works now before the public. The company, which numbers among its personnel several of the greatest lyric stars of Europe and America, will present the series in their original languages—Italian, French and German. Performances will be given each evening, except Wednesday, when a performance will be given in Wilmington, Del. On the same evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Lyric.

One of the most important features in connection with the engagement is that it will give Baltimore music lovers an opportunity to hear the masterpieces of the lyric drama excellently given at an expense within the reach of practically everyone, as the price of the best seats is $2.50 and there are some good seats for 75 cents. Here is the list of Director Russell's artists, which includes some of the best singers of two hemispheres: Mme. Lillian Nordica, who has not been seen in Baltimore for at least five years and who is believed to be one of the greatest dramatic sopranos of this century; Miss Alice Nielsen, who captivated the hearts of American audiences when she appeared in light opera and who has met with exceptional success in grand opera; Mme. Jane Noria, the America soprano, a beauty of international fame; Milly Bramonia, Tina Desana and Annita Perego, sopranos; Mlle. Rosa Olitzka, the famous Polish mezzo soprano, whose characterization of Ortrud in "Lohengrin" made her famous the world over; Guglielmina Marchi, the Italian, and Marie Claessens, the Belgian contralto; Florencio Constantino, the great Spanish tenor, who has few equals and no superiors; Carlo Albani, the Italian tenor, who for two years was the idol of Viennese music lovers; Carlo Dani, Ernesto Giaccone and Giuseppe Oppezzo, tenors. Victor Maurel, the unique Rigoletto, one of the greatest lyric artists of the age; Ramon Blanchart, Rodolfo Fornari, Adamo Galperin and Attilio Pucini, baritones; A. P. de Segurola, Giulio Rossi and Luigi Tavecchia, bassos, will also be in the casts. Signor Arnaldo Conti will conduct the orchestra during the week.

MISS ALICE NIELSEN

Baltimore's series of performances will be as follows:

Monday Night—"La Giaconda" (in Italian).
Tuesday Night—"Rigoletto" (in Italian).
Thursday Matinee—"Carmen" (in French).
Thursday Night—"Faust" (in French).
Friday Night—"Lohengrin" (in German).
Saturday Matinee—"Rigoletto."
Saturday Night—Verdi's "Aida" (in Italian).

World-Famed Soloist Coming.

Of the list of lyric celebrities who are to visit this city with the San Carlo company the most interesting is probably Senor Florencio Constantino, the leading tenor. He made his debut a few years ago in Buenos Ayres. So great was his triumph that engagements soon followed at the royal opera houses at Madrid and Covent Garden, and the Imperial opera houses in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw and Berlin. He created the role of Cavaradossi in "La Tosca" at Nice under the direction of the composer Puccini and of Turiddo in "Cavalleria Rusticana" under the direction of Mascagni.

It is said that his voice is perfectly produced and of finest timbre throughout its entire compass. It is exquisite in quality and clarity, resonant, ringing and abundant in scope and power. In his earlier career in Spain Constantino was a civil engineer, and is said to have figured considerably in the politics of his country.

Those who admired Alice Nielsen when she was one of the queens of light opera in this country continue to be interested in her career in her new and more serious field. She could always sing—she never had to learn. She was born in America, grew to girlhood here and sang herself into American favor. Her first professional engagement was made when she was 8 years old. At 15 she made her debut as the prima donna in "The Mikado" in Oakland, Cal. It was at the advice of Mr. Russell, then in London, that she determined to prepare herself for the grand opera stage. Her debut in grand opera was made several months later in Queen's Hall, London, when she went to Italy for a further study of the Romance languages, and four months later appeared in Rome in "The Daughter of the Regiment" in the old Bellini Theatre, the same theatre at which Enrico Caruso made his debut, and where Constantino first appeared.

MISS JANE NORIA

To Present The "Gypsy Baron."

An interesting Baltimore musical event of the coming week will be the performance of Johann Strauss' beautiful little operetta, "The Gypsy Baron," at the Lyric Friday evening by the members of the German Opera Company, of Philadelphia. Arrangements for the performance, which will be the first of a series to be given here during the winter, have been practically completed. The coming of the German company has met with the hearty indorsement of local Germans, several of the larger German societies having passed resolutions to that effect. There is, therefore, practically every assurance that the initial performance will prove a decided success.

The visiting artists will bring with them their own orchestra, composed of 50 pieces, and the performance will be given under the direction of Herr August Rodemann, a musical conductor of note both in this country and in Germany. Fraulein Emilie Schoenfeld will appear in the prima donna role as Saffi, while the leading male part will be sung by Herr Paul Nelva, as Sandor Barnskay, the Gypsy Baron. Others in the cast will be Fraulein Johanna Wagner, as Czipra; Fraulein Paula Blenna, as Arsena, and Herman Gerold, as Zsupan. The same company will give Von Suppe's "Boccaccio" at the Lyric on the evening of January 13.

FLORENCIO CONSTANTINO
Tenor.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8, when Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will appear as soloist. She will play MacDowell's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Brahm's melodious second in D major. The other number on the program will be Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

HARPERS WEEKLY
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 4- 1908

Music and the Opera

IN VARIOUS KEYS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

MR. WALTER DAMROSCH, in his interesting lecture-recital the other day on Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," observed—I repeat the substance of his thought—that Germany, so far as its creative musical art is concerned, has given us nothing fundamentally new since Wagner. Richard Strauss, he felt, had patterned after Liszt in his symphonic poems and after Wagner in his lyric dramas. It is to the revolutionary and wholly novel music of such Frenchmen as Debussy and d'Indy, and such kindred temperaments as Loeffler, that we must look for authentically new developments, for a quality of music genuinely self-sprung. Without committing one's self at the moment upon so delicate and perilous a question, it may nevertheless be said that Mr. Damrosch's dictum occurs to the mind in rather a beguiling way when one reflects upon so highly typical a product of contemporary Teutonic music as the symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played upon its second New York visit the other day, at Carnegie Hall. Boehe calls his work simply "Taormina: Tone-poem for grand orchestra." There is no other superscription, no motto, programme, or other guide to the composer's intentions. There is on the score a picture of Taormina, the historic Sicilian town on the eastern shore of the island, on the Ionian Sea. Yet it has been truly said that, so far as any suggestion of local characteristics is concerned, the tone-poem "might as well have been called Dortmund or Schenectady." As a piece of tonal delineation, therefore, it is not effective; it remains to be considered as sheer music.

Boehe—who is one of the very young Germans (he was born at Munich in 1880)—wrote "Taormina" in his twenty-fifth year, and there is no question at all that he accomplished in so doing a rather extraordinary feat. It is a large score, and an elaborate one, and it is sumptuously orchestrated—that, indeed, is its chief virtue. But it is notorious that, in our day, a mastery of scoring is not only expected, but is praised a little too complacently by contemporary observers. Mr. Boehe exhibits an indisputable command of the art, and he deserves emphatic praise for it; but aside from this, it is difficult to understand how "Taormina" can have commended itself to Dr. Muck. One grows weary of finding the same delinquencies in an immense proportion of the creative music of our day—the inescapable faults of emptiness, of poverty of idea, allied with the extreme of elaboration in the manner of presentation. Mr. Boehe is a striking exemplar of these characteristics. He is most deliberate and determined in address—you would think that the message about to be delivered was of the utmost consequence, the deepest moment; the pose and the manner of the utterer of great things are admirably simulated. Yet how futile and dull, how pathetically meagre, is the actual deliverance! How often must we remind ourselves that it is as impossible to achieve salient or distinguished or noble music without salient, distinguished, and noble ideas as it is to create fire without flame? How often is it to be said that no genius for construction, no deftness or mastery of form, no diligence in contrivance, no subtlety of craft, can possibly avail when the inner flame is absent? Surely a trite and, it would seem, a superfluous thing to insist upon; yet how deeply and commonly is it realized: how often are we made aware that the end has even been perceived? How often is contemporary music that is known and honored, for that matter,—praised or misliked in accordance with this requirement? Concerning our particular text, Mr. Boehe's tone-poem, it is necessary to express one's conviction of its superfluousness. Of ideas—and by ideas one means pregnant melodic, harmonic, or rhythmic conceptions—it is as devoid as it is rich and gleaming in outer investiture. But let this not be understood to imply the smallest disapproval of the performance of such music by Dr. Muck and the brilliant virtuosi from Boston. How should we be sure that "Taormina" is somewhat less than a masterpiece if we had not had the opportunity of hearing it? Better the disclosure of a hundred banalities than the ignoring, through lack of adventurous liberality, of even a minor masterpiece.

Luisa Tetrazzini, who has been secured for the Manhattan

Gustav Mahler, who has just come to America

From LIFE New York
Address N. Y.
Date JAN 4- 1908

A NUMBER of exceptionally interesting events is scheduled to take place at the Barnard Club within the next few weeks, the first of these being the illustrated lecture which Mr. T. J. Cobden-Sanderson is to give on Monday evening of next week on "The Book Beautiful." Mr. Cobden-Sanderson is connected with the famous Doves Bindery of London and his talk will be on the history of bookbinding and the libraries containing famous volumes. Mrs. Cobden-Sanderson and her attractive daughter will also be present as guests of the club. On the following Friday evening, after the Philharmonic concert at the Baptist Temple, a reception will be given in honor of Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck and Mr. Carl Vendling, the last named being concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Muck, who is a very charming woman, is studying for a degree at Radcliffe. A little later in the season a series of informal evening at-homes, with cards and dancing, may be given at the club. There will, of course, be the usual luncheon on Washington's Birthday. The committee in charge tried to secure Governor Hughes for this date but he was to speak in the West at that time.

From NEW YORK MAIL
Address
Date JAN 4 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its third monthly visit Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season. It is a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, which had its first performances in America yesterday and to-day in Boston. The soloist will be Mme. Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. Dvorak's Carnival overture will complete the programme. Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling will be the assisting soloist.

The concert master will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major. The orchestral numbers will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, in which there are nine movements. Dr. Muck, however, will only play five at this concert. The symphony will also be a novelty by Herman Goetz. Mme. Carreno will be the soloist at the Brooklyn concert, which occurs Friday evening at the Baptist temple.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 4- 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third pair of concerts take place at Carnegie Hall next week. On Thursday night Dr. Muck will present a novelty in a symphony in E major by Herrmann Bisshoff, a young composer of the Munich school, which got its first presentation in America at Boston yesterday. It is so difficult to play, it is said, that even with his splendid musicians Dr. Muck was driven to give it half a dozen extra rehearsals before he let the public hear it. Teresa Carreno will play the piano part in MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will be heard in Mozart's violin concerto in A major, which is the fifth of the set of six he wrote at Salzburg. The symphony will be Herrmann Goetz's in F major.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 4 1908

Next Friday evening will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra again for the third concert of its series, at the Baptist Temple. The principal orchestral work of the programme will be Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2, a work in quite a different and much more gracious mood than his First Symphony, in which Dr. Muck introduced himself to Brooklyn as a conductor last season. The soloist for this concert will be Mme. Carreno, whose recent appearance here was a pleasant incident of the season thus far. She will play MacDowell's Second Concerto, in D minor. The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense, an after-thought, having been written after the performance in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of "Haensel and Gretel."

MME. CARRENO.

Soloist For Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date JAN 1 - 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

New Concertmaster of Boston Orchestra Appears as Soloist in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night in Infantry Hall. There was a good attendance and an interesting programme, and a special interest attached to the concert in the appearance, as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, who has come from Stuttgart to act as concertmaster of the orchestra during the year's leave of absence given to Prof. Willy Hess. There was considerable disappointment over the substitution of a Brahms symphony for the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which was announced originally. The feeling was not very poignant, however, for the Brahms work held the interest of the audience well. Moreover, a promise of the "Pathetic" for the next concert accompanied the announcement of the change on a slip inserted in the programme book. The order of the programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for violin in A major, No. 5....Mozart
1. Allegro aperto.
2. Adagio.
3. Tempo di menuetto.
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73....Brahms
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Adagio non troppo.
3. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4. Allegro con spirito.

The overture to Humperdinck's comic opera, "Die Hierat wider Willen," a work based on a comedy by Alexandre Dumas and which had its first presentation less than two years ago in Berlin, was a novelty here. The thematic material for the overture is taken largely from the opera itself, a custom generally followed nowadays. The overture was a bit disappointing. It seemed to lack in considerable measure the brightness, spontaneity and melodic charm of the author's well-known "Hansel and Gretel." Still, it was not without the charm of orchestral color nor the evidence of skilful workmanship. The hearty round of applause which followed, however, was plainly due to the finale, which works up to a brilliant and exciting close.

The second symphony of Brahms presents four well-balanced and thoroughly worked-out movements, and while none is really of absorbing interest it is a strong and symmetrical composition. The themes are well chosen and melodious, their handling less intricate and involved than is sometimes the case with Brahms, nor does he often indulge in the rhythmical involutions that render so much of his music unintelligible to the average hearer. Dr. Muck's reading was careful and sympathetic, and the orchestra played it with fine energy and discrimination.

Mr. Wendling's choice of a solo number was quite out of the ordinary course. It is seldom enough that one hears nowadays one of the half-dozen concertos which Mozart wrote for the violin. The reason is not far to seek. There is nothing sensational here, no opportunity for making the bourgeois sit up by display of dazzling technical feats. Nevertheless, this music requires a musician to play it. It calls for delicacy rather than power, for both agility and the clearest legato, and, above all, for tonal and rhythmical perfection. All these qualities Mr. Wendling seems to possess abundantly. His playing was musicianly in the best sense, and the hearty recalls he received were fairly earned.

Only one concert of the symphony series for the present season remains to be given. This will take place on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

Among those present were: Mrs. William Binney, Mr. Edward F. Child, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Emma A. Taft, Mrs. Thomas Burrage, Miss Anna J. Dyer, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Miss Harriet Hazard, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor Green, Mr. William O. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Manie, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Louis L. Angell, Miss Edith Angell, Master Louis Angell, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Mary T. Peck, Miss Mary Talbot, Miss Harriet Talbot, Miss Harriet Johnson, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mrs. I. Gifford Ladd, Dr. Ellen A. Stone, Mr. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marion Brown, Col. Harvey A. Baker, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Loraine P. Bucklin, Mrs. Alexander M. Atherton, Miss Baker, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Edwin Barrows, Miss Mary Barrows, Mr. John Sargent, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. William Wager Weeden, Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Miss Charlotte R. Vose, Miss Elizabeth E. Vose, Mr. and Mrs. Almon K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Martha Potter, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mr. William P. Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Miss Perkins, Miss Harriet C. Richards, Miss Isabel H. Pegram, Miss Edith Nichols, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. Alfred L. Lustig, Miss Ida Sawin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Miss Lucile Jacobs, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. Harold B. Cranshaw, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Miss M. Helen Potter, Mr. and Mrs. James O. Yatman, Mrs. Jane B. Jones, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Miss Helen Emerson, Dr. P. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Steinert, Miss Alzada J. Sprague, Mrs. Steere, Miss Rebecca Steere, Mrs. Ward Beecher Chace, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Miss Evelyn Staples, Mr. and Mrs. Bertram S. Blaisdell, Mrs. Charles A. Russell, Miss Charlotte Russell, Miss Annie Cooke Cushing, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford G. King, Mrs. Mercer, Mr. Henry Prew, Mrs. Philip L. Perkins, Mr. David P. Moulton, Miss Mabel Moulton, Mr. and Mrs. Fred S. Walcott, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Mr. Edward H. Mason, the Misses Mason, Mrs. George C. Arnold and Mr. Louis T. Capron.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Date JAN 4 1908

Music and the Opera

IN VARIOUS KEYS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

MR. WALTER DAMROSCH, in his interesting lecture-recital the other day on Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," observed—I repeat the substance of his thought—that Germany, so far as its creative musical art is concerned, has given us nothing fundamentally new since Wagner. Richard Strauss, he felt, had patterned after Liszt in his symphonic poems and after Wagner in his lyric dramas. It is to the revolutionary and wholly novel music of such Frenchmen as Debussy and d'Indy, and such kindred temperaments as Loeffler, that we must look for authentically new developments, for a quality of music genuinely self-sprung. Without committing one's self at the moment upon so delicate and perilous a question, it may nevertheless be said that Mr. Damrosch's dictum occurs to the mind in rather a beguiling way when one reflects upon so highly typical a product of contemporary Teutonic music as the symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played upon its second New York visit the other day, at Carnegie Hall. Boehe calls his work simply "Taormina: Tone-poem for grand orchestra." There is no other superscription, no motto, programme, or other guide to the composer's intentions. There is on the score a picture of Taormina, the historic Sicilian town on the eastern shore of the island, on the Ionian Sea. Yet it has been truly said that, so far as any suggestion of local characteristics is concerned, the tone-poem "might as well have been called Dortmund or Schenectady." As a piece of tonal delineation, therefore, it is not effective; it remains to be considered as sheer music.

Boehe—who is one of the very young Germans (he was born at Munich in 1880)—wrote "Taormina" in his twenty-fifth year, and there is no question at all that he accomplished in so doing a rather extraordinary feat. It is a large score, and an elaborate one, and it is sumptuously orchestrated—that, indeed, is its chief virtue. But it is notorious that, in our day, a mastery of scoring is not only expected, but is praised a little too complacently by contemporary observers. Mr. Boehe exhibits an indisputable command of the art, and he deserves emphatic praise for it; but aside from this, it is difficult to understand how "Taormina" can have commended itself to Dr. Muck. One grows weary of finding the same delinquencies in an immense proportion of the creative music of our day—the inescapable faults of emptiness, of poverty of idea, allied with the extreme of elaboration in the manner of presentation. Mr. Boehe is a striking exemplar of these characteristics. He is most deliberate and determined in address—you would think that the message about to be delivered was of the utmost consequence, the deepest moment; the pose and the manner of the utterer of great things are admirably simulated. Yet how futile and dull, how pathetically meagre, is the actual deliverance! How often must we remind ourselves that it is as impossible to achieve salient or distinguished or noble music without salient, distinguished, and noble ideas as it is to create fire without flame? How often is it to be said that no genius for construction, no deftness or mastery of form, no diligence in contrivance, no subtlety of craft, can possibly avail when the inner flame is absent? Surely a trite and, it would seem, a superfluous thing to insist upon; yet how deeply and commonly is it realized: how often are we made aware that the need has even been perceived? How often is contemporary music that is known and honored, for that matter, praised or misliked in accordance with this requirement? Concerning our particular text, Mr. Boehe's tone-poem, it is necessary to express one's conviction of its superfluousness. Of ideas—and by ideas one means pregnant melodic, harmonic, or rhythmic conceptions—it is as devoid as it is rich and gleaming in outer investiture. But let this not be understood to imply the smallest disapproval of the performance of such music by Dr. Muck and the brilliant virtuosi from Boston. How should we be sure that "Taormina" is somewhat less than a masterpiece if we had not had the opportunity of hearing it? Better the disclosure of a hundred banalities than the ignoring, through lack of adventurous liberality, of even a minor masterpiece.

Luisa Tetrazzini, who has been secured for the Manhattan

Gustav Mahler, who has just come to America

From The World
Address N. Y.
Date JAN 4- 1908

A NUMBER of exceptionally interesting events is scheduled to take place at the Barnard Club within the next few weeks, the first of these being the illustrated lecture which Mr. T. J. Cobden-Sanderson is to give on Monday evening of next week on "The Book Beautiful." Mr. Cobden-Sanderson is connected with the famous Doves Bindery of London and his talk will be on the history of bookbinding and the libraries containing famous volumes. Mrs. Cobden-Sanderson and her attractive daughter will also be present as guests of the club. On the following Friday evening, after the Philharmonic concert at the Baptist Temple, a reception will be given in honor of Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck and Mr. Carl Vendling, the last named being concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Muck, who is a very charming woman, is studying for a degree at Radcliffe. A little later in the season a series of informal evening at-homes, with cards and dancing, may be given at the club. There will, of course, be the usual luncheon on Washington's Birthday. The committee in charge tried to secure Governor Hughes for this date but he was to speak in the West at that time.

From NEW YORK HERALD
Address
Date JAN 4 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its third monthly visit Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season. It is a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, which had its first performances in America yesterday and to-day in Boston. The soloist will be Mme. Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. Dvorak's Carnival overture will complete the programme. Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling will be the assisting soloist.

The concert master will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major. The orchestral numbers will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, in which there are nine movements. Dr. Muck, however, will only play five at this concert. The symphony will also be a novelty by Herman Goetz. Mme. Carreno will be the soloist at the Brooklyn concert, which occurs Friday evening at the Baptist temple.

[101]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third pair of concerts take place at Carnegie Hall next week. On Thursday night Dr. Muck will present a novelty in a symphony in E major by Herrmann Bisshoff, a young composer of the Munich school, which got its first presentation in America at Boston yesterday. It is so difficult to play, it is said, that even with his splendid musicians Dr. Muck was driven to give a half a dozen extra rehearsals before he let the public hear it. Teresa Carreno will play the piano part in MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will be heard in Mozart's violin concerto in A major, which is the fifth of the set of six he wrote at Salsburg. The symphony will be Hermann Goetz's in F major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Next Friday evening will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra again for the third concert of its series, at the Baptist Temple. The principal orchestral work of the programme will be Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2, a work in quite a different and much more gracious mood than his First Symphony, in which Dr. Muck introduced himself to Brooklyn as a conductor last season. The soloist for this concert will be Mme. Carreno, whose recent appearance here was a pleasant incident of the season thus far. She will play MacDowell's Second Concerto, in D minor. The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense, an after-thought, having been written after the performance in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of "Haensel and Gretel."

MME. CARRENO.

Soloist For Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN - 4 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

New Concertmaster of Boston Orchestra Appears as Soloist in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night in Infantry Hall. There was a good attendance and an interesting programme, and a special interest attached to the concert in the appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, who has come from Stuttgart to act as concert-master of the orchestra during the year's leave of absence given to Prof. Willy Hess. There was considerable disappointment over the substitution of a Brahms symphony for the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which was announced originally. The feeling was not very poignant, however, for the Brahms work held the interest of the audience well. Moreover, a promise of the "Pathetic" for the next concert accompanied the announcement of the change on a slip inserted in the programme book. The order of the programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for violin in A-major, No. 5....Mozart
1. Allegro aperto.
2. Adagio.
3. Tempo di menuetto.
Symphony No. 2, in D-major, op. 73....Brahms
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Adagio non troppo.
3. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4. Allegro con spirito.

The overture to Humperdinck's comic opera, "Die Hierat wider Willen," a work based on a comedy by Alexandre Dumas and which had its first presentation less than two years ago in Berlin, was a novelty here. The thematic material for the overture is taken largely from the opera itself, a custom generally followed nowadays. The overture was a bit disappointing. It seemed to lack in considerable measure the brightness, spontaneity and melodic charm of the author's well-known "Hansel and Gretel." Still, it was not without the charm of orchestral color nor the evidence of skilful workmanship. The hearty round of applause which followed, however, was plainly due to the finale, which works up to a brilliant and exciting close.

The second symphony of Brahms presents four well-balanced and thoroughly worked-out movements, and while none is really of absorbing interest it is a strong and symmetrical composition. The themes are well chosen and melodious, their handling less intricate and involved than is sometimes the case with Brahms, nor does he often indulge in the rhythmical involutions that render so much of his music unintelligible to the average hearer. Dr. Muck's reading was careful and sympathetic, and the orchestra played it with fine energy and discrimination.

Mr. Wendling's choice of a solo number was quite out of the ordinary course. It is seldom enough that one hears nowadays one of the half-dozen concertos which Mozart wrote for the violin. The reason is not far to seek. There is nothing sensational here, no opportunity for making the bourgeois sit up by display of dazzling technical feats. Nevertheless, this music requires a musician to play it. It calls for delicacy rather than power, for both agility and the clearest legato, and, above all, for tonal and rhythmical perfection. All these qualities Mr. Wendling seems to possess abundantly. His playing was musicianly in the best sense, and the hearty recalls he received were fairly earned.

Only one concert of the symphony series for the present season remains to be given. This will take place on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

Among those present were: Mrs. William Binney, Mr. Edward F. Child, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Emma A. Taft, Mrs. Thomas Burrage, Miss Anna J. Dyer, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Miss Harriet Hazard, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor Green, Mr. William O. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Manie, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Louis L. Angell, Miss Edith Angell, Master Louis Angell, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Miss Mary T. Peck, Miss Mary Talbot, Miss Harriet Talbot, Miss Harriet Johnson, Miss Mary A. Brownell, Mrs. I. Gifford Ladd, Dr. Ellen A. Stone, Mr. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marion Brown, Col. Harvey A. Baker, Mrs. Edgar B. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Loraine P. Bucklin, Mrs. Alexander M. Atherton, Miss Baker, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Edwin Barrows, Miss Mary Barrows, Mr. John Sargent, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. William Wager Weeden, Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Miss Charlotte R. Vose, Miss Elizabeth E. Vose, Mr. and Mrs. Almon K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Martha Potter, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mr. William P. Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. George H. Fowler, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary F. Patterson, Miss Perkins, Miss Harriet C. Richards, Miss Isabel H. Pegram, Miss Edith Nichols, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Mr. Alfred L. Lustig, Miss Ida Sawin, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Miss Lucile Jacobs, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. Harold B. Cranshaw, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Miss M. Helen Potter, Mr. and Mrs. James O. Yatman, Mrs. Jane B. Jones, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mrs. James A. Nealey, Miss Helen Emerson, Dr. P. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Albert M. Steinert, Miss Alzada J. Sprague, Mrs. Steere, Miss Rebecca Steere, Mrs. Ward Beecher Chace, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Miss Evelyn Staples, Mr. and Mrs. Bertram S. Blaisdell, Mrs. Charles A. Russell, Miss Charlotte Russell, Miss Annie Cooke Cushing, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford G. King, Mrs. Mercer, Mr. Henry Prew, Mrs. Philip L. Perkins, Mr. David P. Moulton, Miss Mabel Moulton, Mr. and Mrs. Fred S. Walcott, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Mr. Edward H. Mason, the Misses Mason, Mrs. George C. Arnold and Mr. Louis T. Capron.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.
TRIBUNE
JAN 1 - 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPRESENTATIVE AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL.

Programme of Second Concert of Series of Three, Though Short, Was Most Satisfactory and Exceedingly Well Rendered.

Work of Carl Wendling.

A representative audience of Providence music lovers comfortably filled Infantry Hall last evening for the second of the three Boston Symphony Orchestra concert sarranged for presentation in Providence. Barring the substitution of Brahm's Symphony, No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, in place of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74, the latter being now scheduled for presentation at the final concert, Feb. 12, the programme, if short, at least proved most satisfavtory and was exceedingly well rendered. It was as follows:

Overture to the Opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Providence), Humperdinck; Concerto for Violin in A-major, No. 5 (K. 219), 1, Allegro aperto; 2, adagio; 3, tempo di menuetto, Mozart; Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, 1, allegro non troppo; 2, adagio non troppo; 3, adagietto grazioso, quasi andantimo; 8, allegro con spirito, Brahms.

In a city where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives but three concerts a season it might be well to leave out such works as Humperdinck's overture. The composer has but little to say and as it is a legitimate overture and made up from motives of the main work it can give but little pleasure, especially as it does not rise above the niveau of what Wagner so well termed "Kapellmeistermusik."

Humperdinck wrote the overture to "The Forced Marriage," a comic opera based on a play by Alexandre Dumas, "Les Demoiselles de Saint Cyr," and it was first played at Munich in May, 1906. The story is a simple one, the thematic material being taken from the opera itself and having little that is of musical importance. It is a careful and deliberate piece of composition, with hints at times in the main body of romantic pages, but after all is not at all exceptional among other works of the composer.

VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The violin soloist of the evening was Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. He is in command of a clear and sure technique and a beautiful tone, both of which were used to bring out the charm of Mozart's concerto to the fullest extent. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Wendling in a composition of more pretentious character and larger scope.

No doubt Tschaikowski's "Pathetic" symphony would have been welcomed by many people and it is hard to find a reason for so late, and at the same time so radical, a change in a programme. Especially is this to be deplored as many people had looked forward to hearing the Russian's symphony, which is much nearer to the heart of the majority of concertgoers than the Brahms composition, to whom in some cases this pleasure may be denied through inability to attend the final concert on Feb. 12.

Of all theBrahms symphonies the second is, perhaps, the most pleasant one to listen to, for we miss here the mystic Brahms who occasionally wraps himself up in a veil of syncopated rhythm which often makes his larger works of but little pleasure to the untrained part of the audience. Again, Brahms shows in this symphony the ability to develop a splendid movement out of very scanty material through his ingenuity and theoretical skill; the motif of the first part of the symphony is a striking example of his art. In spite of his often rough outside, so well portrayed in his works, he was yet a man of deep poetic sentiment, and the slow movement of this symphony, as well as of others, gives ample proof of it.

It might be well if the management would see to it that the few concerts we have here are made as interesting as possible, and it would do no harm if there was a little more generosity displayed in the programme. An overture, a concerto and a symphony make a splendid conservative menu for one who dines that way every week, but with an almost starved guest an extra dish would really not bring on indigestion.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 4 1908

Notes of Interest In Music World.

Brahms' lovely symphony in D major, No. 2, will be the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, January 10. It is the one symphonic work by Brahms which even his bitterest enemies have been compelled to accept and to praise, and Dr. Muck's reading of it has merely confirmed the profound impression made a year ago by his performance of the first symphony. It shows conclusively that he has penetrated into the heart of Brahms' music as none of his predecessors in this country has ever done.

The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who from all accounts has returned to America even a greater artist than she was in the past. She will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor.

The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense an afterthought, having been written after the first performance in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of "Haensel and Gretel."

NEW YORK EV'G POST
JAN - 4 1908

Teresa Carreño is to be the soloist at next Thursday evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; she will play MacDowell's second concerto, of which she has made a specialty, and with which she has won admiration for American music in the capitals of Europe. The concerto will be followed by Dvorák's "Carnaval" overture and preceded by a symphony by Hermann Bischoff, who is described as "a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is the head." The Saturday afternoon programme will include a Handel concerto in five parts for two wind choirs and strings, Goetz's F major symphony, and a Mozart concerto, to be played by the concert master of the Boston orchestra, Carl Wendling.

884

N. Y. TRIBUNE
From
Address
Date JAN 5 1908

ORCHESTRAL DOINGS.

Dr. Muck will present one of the considerable novelties of his series at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Mr. Philip Hale, annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower to some extent of Richard Strauss, and an active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head.

This symphony had its first performance at the Tonkünstler Versammlung in Essen in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not expected to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreño, who will play MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorák's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six, written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and they were probably written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto, recently discovered, is regarded as a work of a considerably later period.

The first number on the Saturday programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and the string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Kogel. There are nine movements, all told, to this work, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. Two movements were played here last week by the New York Symphony Society. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been warmly praised.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert there will be a novelty, a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's concerto in A major.

...will give a piano recital in Mendelssohn ... of January 11.

...New York, 1884

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which had its first performance in America in Boston on January 3 and 4. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower, more or less, of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement led by Strauss. This symphony had its first performance at the "Ton Kunstler Versammlung," in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety. It is said to be a most interesting example of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future." The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and probably was written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto recently discovered is unquestionably a work of a much later period. The first number on the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Cogen. There are nine movements, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been extravagantly praised, and if it is not one of the giants of symphonic literature it has qualities which make it worthy of more frequent hearings than it has.

NEW YORK WORLD
JAN 5 1908

ished:

Important New Symphony.

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which had its first performance in America in Boston on Jan. 3 and 4. Bischoff is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head. This particular symphony had its first performance at the Ton Kunstler Versammlung, in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time. It is said to be a most interesting example of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future." The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, will present Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and they were probably written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto, recently discovered, is unquestionably a work of a much later period.

The first number on the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and the string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Cogen. There are nine movements all told to this work, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been extravagantly praised, and if it is not one of the giants of symphonic literature, it has qualities which make it worthy of more frequent hearings than it has had.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 5 1908

Brahms' lovely symphony in D major, No. 2, will be the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, Jan. 10. It is the one symphonic work by Brahms which even his bitterest enemies have been compelled to accept and to praise, and Dr. Muck's reading of it has merely confirmed the profound impression made a year ago by his performance of the first symphony. It shows conclusively that he has penetrated into the heart of Brahms' music as none of his predecessors in this country has ever done. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carrena, who, from all accounts, has returned to America even a greater artist than she was in the past. She will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense an afterthought, having been written after the first performance in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of Haensel and Gretel.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address
Date JAN 5- 1908

Hermann Bischoff's new symphony in E major, upon which Dr. Carl Muck and his men have been working for several weeks, will be heard here for the first time on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new symphony, the work of a young disciple of Richard Strauss, is said to present technical difficulties of so unusual a character that many extra rehearsals were required. It is in more or less the style of Strauss and will interest all lovers of the strenuous and the bizarre. Mme. Carreno will be the soloist, playing MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor. The other orchestral number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For the Saturday afternoon concert by the Boston Orchestra, in the same hall, the programme will be Händel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major and Hermann Goetz's symphony in F major. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Wendling, the violinist and concert-master of the orchestra.

From
Address
Date

Kommende Konzerte.

Dr. Muck wird in den nächsten beiden Konzerten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am kommenden Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag bedeutende Novitäten vorführen. Vor Allem die E-dur-Symphonie von Hermann Bischoff, welche ihre Erstaufführung am 3. Januar in Boston erlebt hat, und zwar mit bedeutendem Erfolg. Ferner spielt das Orchester am Donnerstag Dvorak's „Karneval"-Ouverture, und die Solistin Frau Teresa Carreño wird MacDowell's zweites Violin-Konzert in D-moll zur Wiedergabe bringen. In dem Konzert am Samstag Nachmittag wirkt der Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Herr Carl Wendling, als Solist mit, und zwar wird er Mozart's Violin-Konzert in A-dur No. 5 spielen. Das Orchester spielt Händel's Konzert für zwei Bläserchöre und Streichorchester in der Bearbeitung von G. F. Cogen. Die Symphonie ist die in F-dur von Hermann Goetz. —

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908

THE fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, at 3:30. The particular star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abbott, of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York. Miss Abbott was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming, to the disappointment of the many who wished to hear her sing. The desire to hear her now is therefore all the greater. Miss Abbott is one of the many American girls who have made a success in grand opera.

The other artists on the programme are well known in this city, Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a very high standard at these Sunday concerts, and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them. Charles North, of this city, will play the flute obbligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia," sung by Miss Abbott.

THE more announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next week is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. He brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for so many years, and in this fact is one of the secrets of his success. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts, Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist, who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be regarded as a Boston girl, because her training was received in this city.

Sousa's programmes show the same skill that have characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and on the printed programme a majority of the works presented are serious or semi-serious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of [illegible] will be a new [illegible] called "Psychology, Ragtime

---

[102]

PROVIDENCE, R.I.
TRIBUNE.
ress JAN 1 - 1908
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPRESENTATIVE AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL.

Programme of Second Concert of Series of Three, Though Short, Was Most Satisfactory and Exceedingly Well Rendered. Work of Carl Wendling.

A representative audience of Providence music lovers comfortably filled Infantry Hall last evening for the second of the three Boston Symphony Orchestra concert sarranged for presentation in Providence. Barring the substitution of Brahm's Symphony, No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, in place of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74, the latter being now scheduled for presentation at the final concert, Feb. 12, the programme, if short, at least proved most satisfavtory and was exceedingly well rendered. It was as follows:

Overture to the Opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Providence), Humperdinck; Concerto for Violin in A-major, No. 5 (K. 219), 1, Allegro aperto; 2, adagio; 3, tempo di menuetto, Mozart; Symphony No. 2, in D-major, Op. 73, 1, allegro non troppo; 2, adagio non troppo; 3, adagietto grazioso, quasi andantimo; 3, allegro con spirito, Brahms.

In a city where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives but three concerts a season it might be well to leave out such works as Humperdinck's overture. The composer has but little to say and as it is a legitimate overture and made up from motives of the main work it can give but little pleasure especially as it does not rise above the niveau of what Wagner so well termed "Kapellmeistermusik."

Humperdinck wrote the overture to "The Forced Marriage," a comic opera based on a play by Alexandre Dumas, "Les Demoiselles de Saint Cyr," and it was first played at Munich in May, 1906. The story is a simple one, the thematic material being taken from the opera itself and having little that is of musical importance. It is a careful and deliberate piece of composition, with hints at times in the main body of romantic pages, but after all is not at all exceptional among other works of the composer.

VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The violin soloist of the evening was Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. He is in command of a clear and sure technique and a beautiful tone, both of which were used to bring out the charm of Mozart's concerto to the fullest extent. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Wendling in a composition of more pretentious character and larger scope.

No doubt Tschaikowski's "Pathetic" symphony would have been welcomed by many people and it is hard to find a reason for so late, and at the same time so radical, a change in a programme. Especially is this to be deplored as many people had looked forward to hearing the Russian's symphony, which is much nearer to the heart of the majority of concertgoers than the Brahms composition, to whom in some cases this pleasure may be denied through inability to attend the final concert on Feb. 12.

Of all theBrahms symphonies the second is, perhaps, the most pleasant one to listen to, for we miss here the mystic Brahms who occasionally wraps himself up in a veil of syncopated rhythm which often makes his larger works of but little pleasure to the untrained part of the audience. Again, Brahms shows in this symphony the ability to develop a splendid movement out of very scanty material through his ingenuity and theoretical skill; the motif of the first part of the symphony is a striking example of his art. In spite of his often rough outside, so well portrayed in his works, he was yet a man of deep poetic sentiment, and the slow movement of this symphony, as well as of others, gives ample proof of it.

It might be well if the management would see to it that the few concerts we have here are made as interesting as possible, and it would do no harm if there was a little more generosity displayed in the programme. An overture, a concerto and a symphony make a splendid conservative menu for one who dines that way every week, but with an almost starved guest an extra dish would really not bring on indigestion.

s JAN 5 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert there will be a novelty, a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's violin concerto in A major.

Wesley Wyman will give a piano recital in Mendelssohn Hall on the evening of January 11.

Post, New York, 1884

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 4 1908

Notes of Interest In Music World.

Brahms' lovely symphony in D major, No. 2, will be the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, January 10. It is the one symphonic work by Brahms which even his bitterest enemies have been compelled to accept and to praise, and Dr. Muck's reading of it has merely confirmed the profound impression made a year ago by his performance of the first symphony. It shows conclusively that he has penetrated into the heart of Brahms' music as none of his predecessors in this country has ever done.

The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who from all accounts has returned to America even a greater artist than she was in the past. She will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor.

The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense an afterthought, having been written after the first performance in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of "Haensel and Gretel."

NEW YORK EVG POST
ress JAN - 4 1908
e

Teresa Carreño is to be the soloist at next Thursday evening's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; she will play MacDowell's second concerto, of which she has made a specialty, and with which she has won admiration for American music in the capitals of Europe. The concerto will be followed by Dvorák's "Carnaval" overture and preceded by a symphony by Hermann Bischoff, who is described as "a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is the head." The Saturday afternoon programme will include a Handel concerto in five parts for two wind choirs and strings, Goetz's F major symphony, and a Mozart concerto, to be played by the concert master of the Boston orchestra, Carl Wendling.

884

From

Address

Date

ORCHESTRAL DOINGS.

Dr. Muck will present one of the considerable novelties of his series at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Mr. Philip Hale, annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower to some extent of Richard Strauss, and an active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head.

This symphony had its first performance at the Tonkünstler Versammlung in Essen in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not expected to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreño, who will play MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorák's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six, written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and they were probably written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto, recently discovered, is regarded as a work of a considerably later period.

The first number on the Saturday programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and the string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Kogel. There are nine movements, all told, to this work, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. Two movements were played here last week by the New York Symphony Society. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been warmly praised.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
c

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which had its first performance in America in Boston on January 3 and 4. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the Boston Symphony programme book, confesses that he has been able to discover comparatively little about Bischoff. He is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower, more or less, of Richard Strauss, and a particularly active participant in the movement led by Strauss. This symphony had its first performance at the "Ton Kunstler Versammlung," in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety. It is said to be a most interesting example of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future." The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, January 11, will present Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and they were probably written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto recently discovered is unquestionably a work of a much later period. The first number on the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Cogen. There are nine movements, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been extravagantly praised, and if it is not one of the giants of symphonic literature it has qualities which make it worthy of more frequent hearings than it has.

884

ished:

Important New Symphony.

Dr. Muck will present one of the most important symphony novelties of the season at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. It is a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, which had its first performance in America in Boston on Jan. 3 and 4. Bischoff is a young man, a member of the advanced Munich school, a follower more or less of Richard Strauss and a particularly active participant in the movement of which Strauss is at the head. This particular symphony had its first performance at the Ton Kunstler Versammlung, in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and it has been played quite generally through Germany since that time, but owing to the enormous technical difficulties of the work it is not likely to become very popular, because it lies within the reach of so very few orchestras. Even with the Boston Symphony it was necessary to have a half dozen extra rehearsals of the different choirs before the work was read in its entirety the first time. It is said to be a most interesting example of what the younger and more strenuous Germans are doing in the cause of the "music of the future." The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor, and the third number on the programme will be Dvorak's "Carneval" overture.

The programme for Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, will present Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, as the assisting soloist. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. It is one of a set of six written by Mozart while he was living in Salzburg, and they were probably written for his own use, as at that time he contemplated making a specialty of the violin. The seventh concerto, recently discovered, is unquestionably a work of a much later period.

The first number on the programme will be Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and the string orchestra, Dr. Muck using the arrangement of G. F. Cogen. There are nine movements all told to this work, of which five are played in this arrangement. Little is known of its history. The symphony will be that in F major by Hermann Goetz, a work which has been extravagantly praised, and if it is not one of the giants of symphonic literature, it has qualities which make it worthy of more frequent hearings than it has had.

...ndard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ess
e
JAN - 5 1908

Brahms' lovely symphony in D major, No. 2, will be the principal offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening, Jan. 10. It is the one symphonic work by Brahms which even his bitterest enemies have been compelled to accept and to praise, and Dr. Muck's reading of it has merely confirmed the profound impression made a year ago by his performance of the first symphony. It shows conclusively that he has penerated into the heart of Brahms' music as none of his predecessors in this country has ever done. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carrena, who, from all accounts, has returned to America even a greater artist than she was in the past. She will play MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The final number will be Humperdinck's overture to his comic opera, "The Forced Marriage." This opera had its first performance at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in the spring of 1905, and the overture was in a sense an afterthought, having been written after the first performance, in the spring of 1906. The work is entirely characteristic of the composer of Haensel and Gretel.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
ddress
ate

Hermann Bischoff's new symphony in E major, upon which Dr. Carl Muck and his men have been working for several weeks, will be heard here for the first time on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. 1884

The new symphony, the work of a young disciple of Richard Strauss, is said to present technical difficulties of so unusual a character that many extra rehearsals were required. It is in more or less the style of Strauss and will interest all lovers of the strenuous and the bizarre. Mme. Carreno will be the soloist, playing MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor. The other orchestral number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. For the Saturday afternoon concert by the Boston Orchestra, in the same hall, the programme will be Händel's concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's concerto for violin in A major and Hermann Goetz's symphony in F major. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Wendling, the violinist and concert-master of the orchestra.

From

ddress

ate

Kommende Konzerte.

Dr. Muck wird in den nächsten beiden Konzerten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am kommenden Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag bedeutende Novitäten vorführen. Vor Allem die E-dur-Symphonie von Hermann Bischoff, welche ihre Erstaufführung am 3. Januar in Boston erlebt hat, und zwar mit bedeutendem Erfolg. Ferner spielt das Orchester am Donnerstag Dvorak's „Karneval"-Ouverture, und die Solistin Frau Teresa Carreño wird MacDowell's zweites Violin-Konzert in D-moll zur Wiedergabe bringen. In dem Konzert am Samstag Nachmittag wirkt der Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Herr Carl Wendling, als Solist mit, und zwar wird er Mozart's Violin-Konzert in A-dur No. 5 spielen. Das Orchester spielt Händel's Konzert für zwei Bläserchöre und Streichorchester in der Bearbeitung von G. F. Cogen. Die Symphonie ist die in F-dur von Hermann Goetz. —

18

TRAVELER, SATURDAY JANUARY 4, 190

THE fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, at 3:30. The particular star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abbott, of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York. Miss Abbott was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming, to the disappointment of the many who wished to hear her sing. The desire to hear her now is therefore all the greater. Miss Abbott is one of the many American girls who have made a success in grand opera.

The other artists on the programme are well known in this city, Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a very high standard at these Sunday concerts, and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them. Charles North, of this city, will play the flute obligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia" which Miss Abbott will sing.

THE mere announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony Hall next week is sufficient to excite the interest of all those who like band music at its best. He brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for so many years, and in this fact is one of the secrets of his success. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts, Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist, who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be regarded as a Boston girl, because her training was received in this city.

Sousa's programmes show the same skill that have characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and on the printed programme a majority of the works presented are serious or semi-serious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of Sousa's coming will be a new march which is entitled "Powhatan's Daughter."

[102]

BISCHOFF AND CARRENO

A NEW SYMPHONY AND A FAVORITE PIANIST

The Return of Mme. Carreno in MacDowell's Concerto at the Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday—A Charming Work Played with Crisp Brilliance—Bischoff's First Symphony a Work of Tumultuous Cleverness and of Excessive Length—Dr. Muck's Exciting Reading of Dvorak's Carneval Overture

The Symphony programme for this week indulges Dr. Muck once again in his generous interest in contemporaneous music. Dvorak is the most ancient name upon it. MacDowell, on this programme at least—made his the most distinguished. And the name of Herman Bischoff appears for the first time opposite a symphony—one in E major, Opus 16, that was given the post of honor.

Mr. Bischoff's symphony left two very distinct impressions. One impression was of great charm. The other was of overwhelming length. Little seems to be known anywhere of Herman Bischoff, but from what does happen to be known we learn that this is his first essay in the symphonic form. As such it differs promisingly and flatteringly from the usual first symphony of talented youth. That unescapable infliction upon long-suffering music invariably embodies every excellence that the young learner has got from the books. His work is apt, in consequence, to sound like a card catalogue. Mr. Bischoff's first symphony does not sound that way. Far from it! It sounds like a Congressional Library.

This subtle distinction may savor of flippancy; it is rather a cry of justifiable impatience at Mr. Bischoff's simply inordinate, inexcusable, and defacing length. He has engorged his beautiful work till full seventy minutes are consumed in its playing. Schubert himself has seemed long and overcopious to his most passionate lovers in his fifty-minute Symphony in C, one of the mountain-tops of music. For perhaps thirty—to speak by the clock—Mr. Bischoff entranced his hearers yesterday afternoon, with some of the most spirited and ingenious orchestral writing that has been given us in these latter day times. Then he left them to recall that ancient Eastern potentate and his library of a thousand camel-loads.

He was fond of good reading, was that ancient potentate, and he had provided himself with plenty of it. But he read and he read, and yet it seemed that the sands of his life would run out before he had finished his books. He hated to leave behind him so much unlearnt wisdom, and he called his wise men and commanded them to condense the wit and learning of these over-many tomes into a space that he could finish in the time that was left him to live. They reduced the library to a hundred camel loads—and the potentate grew older. They brought it down to a hundred ass loads—to forty ass loads—and then to ten. And the potentate grew feeble. Finally they handed him his library, its philosophy, its teachings written in two sentences on a palm leaf fan.

It matters nothing what those two sentences were; but it does matter that Mr. Bischoff has missed setting to his name one of the remarkable achievements of these days by not following something of the same method with his symphony. Such fresh and vigorous themes—always charming scraps of melody—such ingenious invention, such sparkling, hearty, happy spirit do not speak from more than half a dozen modern works. The man who wrote this symphony had something to say, and he knows how to speak. Glittering episode he piles upon episode more glittering. He knows his orchestra. He treads not far in the rear of his acknowledged master, Strauss himself, in the cunning and audacity with which he mixes orchestral color. The stunning effects he obtains he sends out fairly blurring each other in the rapidity of their succession. His scherzo alone contains more cleverness than the complete works of many an honest and respected man. And there is Mr. Bischoff's fearful falling. His ingenuity will know no end. He has written not one symphony, but three. One heard his first half hour with excited surprise, at so much charm and high spirits and devilish cleverness; and heard his last half hour in impatience as fervid, that the maker of so much fine music had not saved half of it to furnish forth the remaining works of his life!

Dr. Muck did for Bischoff what he might and could. He might not, unsanctioned, perform the office of the wise men of the Eastern potentate. But he could and did lend to the music the gorgeous orchestral palette at his command. And they took Mr. Bischoff's periods, every one of them, and sounded each of the many as if it were the final gem upon which all the other thousand waited. It was a remarkable performance, that exhausted the orchestra's bursting treasury of excellences, that exhausted its conductor's skill and mastery with them—and that exhausted the patience of a prepossessed audience with the gifted and far too generous Mr. Bischoff.

Dvorak's "Carneval" overture, brilliant as it is, and brimming with the wine of high spirits, and after all holding in all its compass hardly a tithe of Mr. Bischoff's first movement alone—went far better, went all the better for what had preceded it. How grateful its crisp directness, its definite, secure, unfailing pursuit of the shortest turn of phrase and the courage of its abrupt end! The rehearsal audience decimated itself, as usual, with withdrawal before the last number—and missed one of the most exciting bits of playing that the orchestra has done under Dr. Muck.

Mme. Carreno and MacDowell left, but one vivid impression—that of great charm. MacDowell has not touched his uppermost level in this, his second concerto. Not that his utterance droops in poetic purport; the fault is rather with its technical presentment. He has seemed over-anxious to make his pianoforte the head of his orchestra only. It speaks with mighty authoritativeness that amounts to epigram, some of them, come off [illegible] the chorus of orchestral voices that follows and comments upon these pronouncements of the oracle is wavering, insecure, faint and indefinite. Their entrances were almost an intrusion; they came like timid beggars at a feast. And the feast was complete without them—not a merry feast; rather a solemn, jovial one. Forgetful of other company, or his chosen instrument, with the tongue that after all has been most obedient to him, MacDowell was delivering one of those Olympic messages that always come from him when he girds himself to write in the highest forms. He delivered another such in the Eroica Sonata that Mr. Bauer played the other afternoon. This concerto was rather another Eroica Sonata, with asides by an orchestra.

And Mme. Carreno played it with a skill and a divination that rather toyed with its Olympic intentions. That is a large word—Olympic—but none other will suffice for the music and the playing. The mighty difficulties of the piece, its fierce rangings up and down the field of dramatic expression, she gripped and swung till they were as eloquent of her own masterful personality as of MacDowell's masterful message. No other woman now at the piano is so at home as she on the heights of feeling; few of them can scale those heights to her daring level. And no other player, of either sex or of any attainment, could sharpen her glitter in the scherzo of that concerto, titanically disdainful as it is alike of the limitations of the puny pianoforte keyboard of the limitations of the human finger, and the even more pitiful limitations of musical expression. It is an event in our musical history to welcome back again so [illegible] player after her several [illegible] of us.

B. K.

Concerts Next Week

The fourth of the series of popular Sunday concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, will have for its star Miss Bessie Abott, who was to have given a recital here in November. Others on the programme will be Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Mr. Félix Fox, and the accompanist will be Mr. Rosenstein of New York, Mr. Charles North of this city playing the flute obbligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

Sousa and his band come to Boston for afternoon and evening concerts next Wednesday, after a tour of the Pacific coast. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Mr. Herbert L. Clarke, cornet player; Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. A feature of the concerts will be a new march by Sousa entitled "Powhatan's Daughter."

SUNDAY CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The fourth of the Sunday concerts at popular prices took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Mr. J. Adamowski, violinist, and Mr. Felix Fox, pianist, took part in the performance of the following programme: Sonata for violin and piano in F major, Grieg; Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti; piano soli: Cantique d'Armour, Liszt; Romance, Faure; Toccata (after fifth concerto), Saint-Saens; songs: Standchen, R. Strauss; Berceuse, Tschaikowsky; Chanson de Juillet, Godard; violin soli: Preislied from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner-Wilhelm; La Ronde des Lutins, Bazzin; "Parla" waltz, Arditi. Mr. Rosenstein of New York was accompanist. Mr. Charles K. North played the flute obligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia."

There was a fair-sized audience present, and much applause in the course of the afternoon. Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Fox performed the Grieg sonata in brilliant and characteristic style.

Miss Abott found favor with her audience in her performances, and she was repeatedly compelled to add to the programme.

Mr. Fox had chosen his solo numbers with taste. He, too, met with a very friendly reception, and added to the programme.

Mr. Adamowski, with his warm tone and brilliant style, fairly brought down the house by his performance of Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lutins."

STAR.

[illegible] 1908

Boston Symphony and Carreno.

With the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, the corner of the season will be turned and the end of the musical year will come in sight. It seems to pass very quickly after the holidays, and before one is fully aware of it the season will be over and plans will be making for 1908-1909. The orchestra will offer at this concert the second of its great piano soloists, this time Madame Teresa Carreno. Madame Carreno will play the D minor concerto for piano by MacDowell. Dr. Muck has placed on the program the second symphony of Brahms, in which the composer has given full rein to the lovely melody which is found in his songs. The other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

884

[103]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 11th Symphony rehearsal and concert included a symphony in E major, Op. 16, by Hermann Bischoff, which was given for the first time in this city; MacDowell's second piano concerto in D minor, and Dvorak's overture, "Carnival," Op. 92. Mme. Teresa Carreno, doubly welcome by reason of her overlong absence from our shores, was soloist.

Bischoff is, if not a pupil in the letter, at least an ardent disciple and admirer of Richard Strauss. This symphony is dedicated to the modern master, but still more, the composer takes pharisaical precautions that his idolatry shall express itself in musical terms. He plucks you by the sleeve; you hear him say: "My confrere and I." Thus, in the first movement, Donna Elvira and Donna Anna make amorous admissions—a glance through the "Don Juan" would enable you to find the passage in Strauss' score—and you again behold the don himself falling into his intoxicated stupor, pedal point, reminiscent themes above it, and all.

Mr. Bischoff, though, is not writing "programme music." Heaven forbid! But, a coy finger in his mouth, you are given to understand that "there is no musical expression which does not find an analogy either in the world of facts and events or in that of poetic sentiments and sensations." So, after an unnecessary amount of circumlocution, it appears that there is, after all, a very definite programme going blandly along through these garrulous pages.

"A young man . . . living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it. He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement)." You actually hear him groan. "The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as Furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet." The mask is now off. The composer comes boldly forward and invites you, during the first movement, to imagine "dissolute nights . . . orgiastic masked balls . . . passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds." If that isn't programmaticism of the most flagrant description, drastic as anything that the magnificent Hector Berlioz began to feed a wondering public some years ago, we'll eat our hat. Mr. Bischoff should have been a critic; he seems to be lively with his pen. We ardently wish that his music might make more vividly evident the enjoyable scenes he so glowingly describes.

The second movement is an edifying, very tedious, inventively weak, and inexcusably prolonged sermon, its moral, "The Wages of Sin," being still further enforced in the scherzo. This latter section, to tired ears, had slightly more of rhythmic and melodic interest than the others. Why continue? The composer essays to fill a larger canvas—about a 70-minute canvas in this case—and to speak of greater things, than he can. The music is lacking in originality and creative strength; it becomes redundant by reason of the constant reiteration of phrases and motifs. The instrumentation is coarse and bombastic. Let us hope that it may be some time before Mr. Bischoff is again tormented by thoughts of the "eternal feminine."

Mme. Carreno is now at the maturity and zenith of her powers. She was remarkably virile and impressive in reading the portentous opening movement of the concerto, a work which is especially her own, and one that grows greater with each too infrequent hearing. Not less remarkable was the kobold music of the "Presto Giocoso." The introductory largo of the last movement, too, was truly MacDowellian in its dark and imaginative coloring, while the measures of the allegro flashed and dazzled with a strange brilliancy. It was a privilege indeed to hear one of the greatest works yet produced by an American so performed by a pianist of such rare gifts. Mme. Carreno was repeatedly recalled with the utmost enthusiasm.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

In Symphony Hall, this afternoon at 3:30, will take place the fourth of the Sunday afternoon concerts at popular prices. Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York will be the especial attraction of the occasion. Miss Abott will be the more welcome on account of the disappointment occasioned by the necessitated postponement of her November concert on account of illness. The other artists who will take part in this concert are Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Mr. Felix Fox, pianist, both well known in this city. Mr. Rosenstein of New York will accompany. Mr. Charles North of Boston will play the flute obligato in the mad scene from "Lucia."

The programme follows:

Sonata for Violin and Piano in F major . . Grieg
Messrs. Adamowski and Fox.

Mad scene from "Lucia" . . . . . Donizetti
Miss Abott.
(Flute obligato, Mr. North.)

Piano soli:
Cantique d'Amour . . . . . Liszt
Romance . . . . . Faure
Toccata (after 5th concerto) . . . . . Saint-Saens
Mr. Fox.

Songs with pianoforte:
Standchen . . . . . Richard Strauss
Berceuse . . . . . Tschaikowsky
Chanson de Juillet . . . . . Godard
Miss Abott.

Violin soli:
Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" . . . . . Wagner-Wilhelmj
La Ronde des Lutins . . . . . Bazzini
Parla Waltz . . . . . Arditi
Miss Abott.

Wednesday afternoon at 2:30 and evening at 8, Mr. John Philip Sousa and his band will give two concerts in Symphony Hall. Soloists will be Mr. Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to the many who have attended the Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeannette Powers, who has previously appeared as soloist with the band in this city, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be considered a Boston girl, for her training was received in this city, where she was for several years a student at the New England Conservatory of Music, and she took first honors in the opera class. The afternoon and evening programmes are not [illegible] be given are of a serious or semi-serious character. The brevity of the printed list, however, will permit a number of encores of a "popular" description. Special features of the occasion will be the new Sousa march, "Powhatan's Daughter," the "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The afternoon programme, in addition to the first and second of the compositions just mentioned, will include Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; cornet solo, "Sounds from the Hudson" (new), Clarke, played by Mr. Clarke; suite, "Three Quotations," Sousa; soprano solo, waltz song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Miss Allen; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; idyl, "Pan Pastoral" (new); violin solo, "Adagio and Moto Perpetuum," Ries, played by Miss Powers; mosaic, "The Free Lance," Sousa.

The evening programme: "Kaiser" overture, Westemeyer; cornet solo, "Rondo Caprice," Clarke, played by Mr. Clarke; suite, "Last Days of Pompeii," Sousa; soprano solo from Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil," Miss Allen; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; (a) Humoreske, Dvorak, and (b) "Powhatan's Daughter," Sousa; violin solo, "Caprice Slav," by Geloso, Miss Powers, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's [illegible]

MISS ABOTT CHARMS SUNDAY "POP" AUDITORS

Metropolitan Opera House Star Adds to Her Already Strong Popularity in Boston—Adamowski and Fox Score in Solos.

The series of the Sunday concerts was resumed at Symphony Hall yesterday with Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House as the attraction. There was an added interest in Miss Abott's appearance from the fact that she had been compelled to abandon her recital here earlier in the season because of illness. It was really the first opportunity Boston music lovers have had to hear her since she made her reputation.

Miss Abott is a lyric soprano with a voice of not great strength but of ample carrying power. Her voice has good range and uncommon flexibility. She sang the familiar mad scene from "Lucia" with not a little dramatic force.

But full as pleasing were the songs, "Staendchen," by Richard Strauss; a berceuse by Tschaikowsky and Godard's "Chanson de Juliet." All three were sung with a delicacy and full expression, which delighted the audience. For an encore Miss Abott sang Nevin's ever popular "Mighty 'Lak a Rose," which would naturally appeal to a singer of Southern birth. Her closing number was the well known Arditi "Parla" waltz and she sang it extremely well.

Assisting were Timothee Adamowski and Felix Fox, who were heard together in Grieg's F major sonata. Mr. Adamowski played as solos, and with his usual finish, Wilhelm's transcription of the prize song from "The Meistersinger" and Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lurins." Mr. Fox gave with all his accustomed correctness numbers by Liszt, Faure and Saint-Saens. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Rosenstein and Charles K. North the flute obbligato for the "Lucia" selection.

MME. CARRENO FEATURE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

The splendid art of Mme. Teresa Carreno was the best feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert. Never has this remarkable musician appeared here to better advantage; never has her insight seemed more poetical or her skill more dazzling; yet it was 45 years ago this month that the distinguished Venezuelan first performed in the presence of a Boston audience! There were some people present Saturday night who claimed to have seen her when, as a child of 9, she played in old Music Hall. "I remember," said one man, "that her little feet couldn't touch the pedals." However, there are many infant prodigies, but there is only one Carreno. Certainly her performance of MacDowell's Concerto in D minor at this Symphony concert could not have been excelled by any other pianist whom Bostonians cheer and worship.

It is an interesting circumstance in connection with the performance that MacDowell studied the piano for awhile with Mme. Carreno. Possibly this had something to do with the captivating enthusiasm that she displayed and with her rare demonstration of exquisite delicacy and Samsonian power. The audience recalled her half a dozen times when the concerto was over.

Another very interesting feature of the concert was the performance for the first time here of Bischoff's Symphony in E major. Bischoff, who is a young German composer, somewhat after the manner of Richard Strauss, has explained that this work is intended to represent the life of a man who misspends his youth and becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer fit to enjoy it. This sermon in music was Puritanically long—the performance occupied an hour and a quarter; but the vast stretches of monotonous discourse were relieved by several passages of extraordinary power and beauty. The piece should be heard again to be understood and appreciated. It was excellently played, Dr. Muck conducting with his accustomed care and spirit.

The other number on the program was Dvorak's lively "Carnival" overture. There will be no concert this

BISCHOFF AND CARRENO

A NEW SYMPHONY AND A FAVORITE PIANIST

The Return of Mme. Carreno in MacDowell's Concerto at the Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday—A Charming Work Played with Crisp Brilliance—Bischoff's First Symphony a Work of Tumultuous Cleverness and of Excessive Length—Dr. Muck's Exciting Reading of Dvorak's Carneval Overture

The Symphony programme for this week indulges Dr. Muck once again in his generous interest in contemporaneous music Dvorak is the most ancient name upon it. MacDowell—on this programme at least—made his the most distinguished. And the name of Herman Bischoff appears for the first time opposite a symphony—one in E major, Opus 16, that was given the post of honor.

Mr. Bischoff's symphony left two very distinct impressions. One impression was of great charm. The other was of overwhelming length. Little seems to be known anywhere of Herman Bischoff, but from what does happen to be known we learn that this is his first essay in the symphonic form. As such it differs promisingly and flatteringly from the usual first symphony of talented youth. That unescapable infliction upon long-suffering music invariably embodies every excellence that the young learner has got from the books. His work is apt, in consequence, to sound like a card catalogue. Mr. Bischoff's first symphony does not sound that way. Far from it! It sounds like a Congressional Library.

This subtle distinction may savor of flippancy; it is rather a cry of justifiable impatience at Mr. Bischoff's simply inordinate, inexcusable, and defacing length. He has engorged his beautiful work till full seventy minutes are consumed in its playing. Schubert himself has seemed long and overcopious to his most passionate lovers in his fifty-minute Symphony in C, one of the mountain-tops of music. For perhaps thirty—to speak by the clock—Mr. Bischoff entranced his hearers yesterday afternoon, with some of the most spirited and ingenious orchestral writing that has been given us in these latter day times. Then he left them to recall that ancient Eastern potentate and his library of a thousand camel-loads.

He was fond of good reading, was that ancient potentate, and he had provided himself with plenty of it. But he read and he read, and yet it seemed that the sands of his life would run out before he had finished his books. He hated to leave behind him so much unlearnt wisdom, and he called his wise men and commanded them to condense the wit and learning of these over-many tomes into a space that he could finish in the time that was left him to live. They reduced the library to a hundred camel loads—and the potentate grew older. They brought it down to a hundred ass loads—to forty ass loads—and then to ten. And the potentate grew feeble. Finally they handed him his library, its philosophy, its teachings written in two sentences on a palm leaf fan.

It matters nothing what those two sentences were; but it does matter that Mr. Bischoff has missed setting to his name one of the remarkable achievements of these days by not following something of the same method with his symphony. Such fresh and vigorous themes—always charming scraps of melody—such ingenious invention, such sparkling, hearty, happy spirit do not speak from more than half a dozen modern works. The man who wrote this symphony had something to say, and he knows how to speak. Glittering episode he piles upon episode more glittering. He knows his orchestra. He treads not far in the rear of his acknowledged master, Strauss himself, in the cunning and audacity with which he mixes orchestral color. The stunning effects he obtains he sends out fairly blurring each other in the rapidity of their succession. His scherzo alone contains more cleverness than the complete works of many an honest and respected man. And there is Mr. Bischoff's fearful failing. His ingenuity will know no end. He has written not one symphony, but three. One heard his first half hour with excited surprise, at so much charm and high spirits and devilish cleverness; and heard his last half hour in impatience as fervid, that the maker of so much fine music had not saved half of it to furnish forth the remaining works of his life!

Dr. Muck did for Bischoff what he might and could. He might not, unsanctioned, perform the office of the wise men of the Eastern potentate. But he could and did lend to the music the gorgeous orchestral palette at his command. And they took Mr. Bischoff's periods, every one of them, and sounded each of the many as if it were the final gem upon which all the other thousand waited. It was a remarkable performance, that exhausted the orchestra's bursting treasury of excellences, that exhausted its conductor's skill and mastery with them—and that exhausted the patience of a prepossessed audience with the gifted and far too generous Mr. Bischoff.

Dvorak's "Carneval" overture, brilliant as it is, and brimming with the wine of high spirits—and after all holding in all its compass hardly a tithe of Mr. Bischoff's first movement alone!—went far better, went all the better for what had preceded it. How grateful its crisp directness, its definite, secure, unfailing pursuit of the shortest turn of phrase and the courage of its abrupt end! The rehearsal audience decimated itself, as usual, with withdrawal before the last number—and missed one of the most exciting bits of playing that the orchestra has done under Dr. Muck.

Mme. Carreno and MacDowell left but one vivid impression—that of great charm. MacDowell has not touched his uppermost level in this, his second concerto. Not that his utterance droops in poetic purport; the fault is rather with its technical presentment. He has seemed over-anxious to make his pianoforte the head of his orchestral family. It speaks with mighty authority, with a directness that amounts to epi- [illegible] phrases, some of them, come off almost fierce. And the chorus of orchestral voices that follows and comments upon these pronouncements of the oracle is wavering, insecure, faint and indefinite. Their entrances were almost an intrusion; they came like timid beggars at a feast. And the feast was complete without them—not a merry feast; rather a solemn, jovial one. Forgetful of other company, on his chosen instrument, with the tongue that after all has been most obedient to him, MacDowell was delivering one of those Olympic messages that always come from him when he girds himself to write in the highest forms. He delivered another such in the Eroica Sonata that Mr. Bauer played the other afternoon. This concerto was rather another Eroica Sonata, with asides by an orchestra.

And Mme. Carreno played it with a skill and a divination that rather toyed with its Olympic intentions. That is a large word—Olympic—but none other will suffice for the music and the playing. The mighty difficulties of the piece, its fierce rangings up and down the field of dramatic expression, she gripped and swung till they were as eloquent of her own masterful personality as of MacDowell's masterful message. No other woman now at the piano is so at home as she on the heights of feeling; few of them can scale those heights to her daring level. And no other player, of either sex or of any attainment, could sharpen her glitter in the scherzo of that concerto, titanically disdainful as it is alike of the limitations of the puny pianoforte keyboard of the limitations of the human finger, and the even more pitiful limitations of musical expression. It is an event in our musical history to welcome back again so [illegible] player after her several years' neglect of us.

B. K.

Concerts Next Week

The fourth of the series of popular Sunday concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, will have for its star Miss Bessie Abott, who was to have given a recital here in November. Others on the programme will be Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Mr. Félix Fox, and the accompanist will be Mr. Rosenstein of New York, Mr. Charles North of this city playing the flute obbligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

Sousa and his band come to Boston for afternoon and evening concerts next Wednesday, after a tour of the Pacific coast. Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Mr. Herbert L. Clarke, cornet player; Miss Jeanette Powers, violinist, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. A feature of the concerts will be a new march by Sousa entitled "Powhatan's Daughter."

SUNDAY CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The fourth of the Sunday concerts at popular prices took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Mr. J. Adamowski, violinist, and Mr. Felix Fox, pianist, took part in the performance of the following programme: Sonata for violin and piano in F major, Grieg; Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti; piano soli: Cantique d'Armour, Liszt; Romance, Faure; Toccata (after fifth concerto), Saint-Saens; songs: Standchen, R. Strauss; Berceuse, Tschaikowsky; Chanson de Juillet, Godard; violin soli: Preislied from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner-Wilhelm; La Ronde des Lutins, Bazzin; "Parla" waltz, Arditi. Mr. Rosenstein of New York was accompanist. Mr. Charles K. North played the flute obligato in the Mad Scene from "Lucia."

There was a fair-sized audience present, and much applause in the course of the afternoon. Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Fox performed the Grieg sonata in brilliant and characteristic style.

Miss Abott found favor with her audience in her performances, and she was repeatedly compelled to add to the programme.

Mr. Fox had chosen his solo numbers with taste. He, too, met with a very friendly reception, and added to the programme.

Mr. Adamowski, with his warm tone and brilliant style, fairly brought down the house by his performance of Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lutins."

Boston Symphony and Carreno.

With the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7, the corner of the season will be turned and the end of the musical year will come in sight. It seems to pass very quickly after the holidays, and before one is fully aware of it the season will be over and plans will be making for 1908-1909. The orchestra will offer at this concert the second of its great piano soloists, this time Madame Teresa Carreno. Madame Carreno will play the D minor concerto for piano by MacDowell. Dr. Muck has placed on the program the second symphony of Brahms, in which the composer has given full rein to the lovely melody which is found in his songs. The other number on the program will be Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage."

884

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 11th Symphony rehearsal and concert included a symphony in E major, Op. 16, by Hermann Bischoff, which was given for the first time in this city; MacDowell's second piano concerto in D minor, and Dvorak's overture, "Carnival," Op. 92. Mme. Teresa Carreno, doubly welcome by reason of her overlong absence from our shores, was soloist.

Bischoff is, if not a pupil in the letter, at least an ardent disciple and admirer of Richard Strauss. This symphony is dedicated to the modern master, but still more, the composer takes pharisaical precautions that his idolatry shall express itself in musical terms. He plucks you by the sleeve; you hear him say: "My confrere and I." Thus, in the first movement, Donna Elvira and Donna Anna make amorous admissions—a glance through the "Don Juan" would enable you to find the passage in Strauss' score—and you again behold the don himself falling into his intoxicated stupor, pedal point, reminiscent themes above it, and all.

Mr. Bischoff, though, is not writing "programme music." Heaven forbid! But, a coy finger in his mouth, you are given to understand that "there is no musical expression which does not find an analogy either in the world of facts and events or in that of poetic sentiments and sensations." So, after an unnecessary amount of circumlocution, it appears that there is, after all, a very definite programme going blandly along through these garrulous pages.

"A young man . . . living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it. He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement)." You actually hear him groan. "The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as Furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet." The mask is now off. The composer comes boldly forward and invites you, during the first movement, to imagine "dissolute nights . . . orgiastic masked balls . . . passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds." If that isn't programmaticism of the most flagrant description, drastic as anything that the magnificent Hector Berlioz began to feed a wondering public some years ago, we'll eat our hat. Mr. Bischoff should have been a critic; he seems to be lively with his pen. We ardently wish that his music might make more vividly evident the enjoyable scenes he so glowingly describes.

The second movement is an edifying, very tedious, inventively weak, and inexcusably prolonged sermon, its moral, "The Wages of Sin," being still further enforced in the scherzo. This latter section, to tired ears, had slightly more of rhythmic and melodic interest than the others. Why continue? The composer essays to fill a larger canvas—about a 70-minute canvas in this case—and to speak of greater things, than he can. The music is lacking in originality and creative strength; it becomes redundant by reason of the constant reiteration of phrases and motifs. The instrumentation is coarse and bombastic. Let us hope that it may be some time before Mr. Bischoff is again tormented by thoughts of the "eternal feminine."

Mme. Carreno is now at the maturity and zenith of her powers. She was remarkably virile and impressive in reading the portentous opening movement of the concerto, a work which is especially her own, and one that grows greater with each too infrequent hearing. Not less remarkable was the kobold music of the "Presto Giocoso." The introductory largo of the last movement, too, was truly MacDowellian in its dark and imaginative coloring, while the measures of the allegro flashed and dazzled with a strange brilliancy. It was a privilege indeed to hear one of the greatest works yet produced by an American so performed by a pianist of such rare gifts. Mme. Carreno was repeatedly recalled with the utmost enthusiasm.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

In Symphony Hall, this afternoon at 3:30, will take place the fourth of the Sunday afternoon concerts at popular prices. Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York will be the especial attraction of the occasion. Miss Abott will be the more welcome on account of the disappointment occasioned by the necessitated postponement of her November concert on account of illness. The other artists who will take part in this concert are Mr. Timothee Adamowski, violinist, and Mr. Felix Fox, pianist, both well known in this city. Mr. Rosenstein of New York will accompany. Mr. Charles North of Boston will play the flute obligato in the mad scene from "Lucia."

The programme follows:

Sonata for Violin and Piano in F major..Grieg
Messrs. Adamowski and Fox.
Mad scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
Miss Abott.
(Flute obligato, Mr. North.)
Piano soli:
Cantique d'Amour.....Lisst
Romance .....Faure
Toccata (after 5th concerto).....Saint-Saens
Mr. Fox.
Songs with pianoforte:
Standchen.....Richard Strauss
Berceuse .....Tschaikowsky
Chanson de Juillet.....Godard
Miss Abott.
Violin soli:
Preislied from "Die Meistersinger"....
Wagner-Wilhelmj
La Ronde des Lutins.....Bazzini
Parla Waltz.....Arditi
Miss Abott.

Wednesday afternoon at 2:30 and evening at 8, Mr. John Philip Sousa and his band will give two concerts in Symphony Hall. Soloists will be Mr. Herbert L. Clarke, whose feats on the cornet are familiar to the many who have attended the Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeannette Powers, who has previously appeared as soloist with the band in this city, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be considered a Boston girl, for her training was received in this city, where she was for several years a student at the New England Conservatory of Music, and she took first honors in the opera class. The afternoon and evening programmes are not [illegible] be given are of a serious or semi-serious character. The brevity of the printed list, however, will permit a number of encores of a "popular" description. Special features of the occasion will be the new Sousa march, "Powhatan's Daughter," the "Jubilee" from Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The afternoon programme, in addition to the first and second of the compositions just mentioned, will include Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; cornet solo, "Sounds from the Hudson" (new), Clarke, played by Mr. Clarke; suite, "Three Quotations," Sousa; soprano solo, waltz song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Miss Allen; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; idyl, "Pan Pastoral" (new); violin solo, "Adagio and Moto Perpetuum," Ries, played by Miss Powers; mosaic, "The Free Lance," Sousa.

The evening programme: "Kaiser" overture, Westemeyer; cornet solo, "Rondo Caprice," Clarke, played by Mr. Clarke; suite, "Last Days of Pompeii," Sousa; soprano solo from Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil," Miss Allen; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; (a) Humoreske, Dvorak, and (b) "Powhatan's Daughter," Sousa; violin solo, "Caprice Slav," by Geloso, Miss Powers, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's [illegible]"

MISS ABOTT CHARMS SUNDAY "POP" AUDITORS

Metropolitan Opera House Star Adds to Her Already Strong Popularity in Boston—Adamowski and Fox Score in Solos.

The series of the Sunday concerts was resumed at Symphony Hall yesterday with Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan Opera House as the attraction. There was an added interest in Miss Abott's appearance from the fact that she had been compelled to abandon her recital here earlier in the season because of illness. It was really the first opportunity Boston music lovers have had to hear her since she made her reputation.

Miss Abott is a lyric soprano with a voice of not great strength but of ample carrying power. Her voice has good range and uncommon flexibility. She sang the familiar mad scene from "Lucia" with not a little dramatic force.

But full as pleasing were the songs, "Staendchen," by Richard Strauss; a berceuse by Tschaikowsky and Godard's "Chanson de Julliet." All three were sung with a delicacy and full expression, which delighted the audience. For an encore Miss Abott sang Nevin's ever popular "Mighty 'Lak a Rose," which would naturally appeal to a singer of Southern birth. Her closing number was the well known Arditi "Parla" waltz and she sang it extremely well.

Assisting were Timothee Adamowski and Felix Fox, who were heard together in Grieg's F major sonata. Mr. Adamowski played as solos, and with his usual finish, Wilhelm's transcription of the prize song from "The Meistersinger" and Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lurins." Mr. Fox gave with all his accustomed correctness numbers by Liszt, Faure and Saint-Saens. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Rosenstein and Charles K. North the flute obbligato for the "Lucia" selection.

MME. CARRENO FEATURE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

The splendid art of Mme. Teresa Carreno was the best feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert. Never has this remarkable musician appeared here to better advantage; never has her insight seemed more poetical or her skill more dazzling; yet it was 45 years ago this month that the distinguished Venezuelan first performed in the presence of a Boston audience! There were some people present Saturday night who claimed to have seen her when, as a child of 9, she played in old Music Hall. "I remember," said one man, "that her little feet couldn't touch the pedals." However, there are many infant prodigies, but there is only one Carreno. Certainly her performance of MacDowell's Concerto in D minor at this Symphony concert could not have been excelled by any other pianist whom Bostonians cheer and worship.

It is an interesting circumstance in connection with the performance that MacDowell studied the piano for awhile with Mme. Carreno. Possibly this had something to do with the captivating enthusiasm that she displayed and with her rare demonstration of exquisite delicacy and Samsonian power. The audience recalled her half a dozen times when the concerto was over.

Another very interesting feature of the concert was the performance for the first time here of Bischoff's Symphony in E major. Bischoff, who is a young German composer, somewhat after the manner of Richard Strauss, has explained that this work is intended to represent the life of a man who misspends his youth and becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer fit to enjoy it. This sermon in music was Puritanically long—the performance occupied an hour and a quarter; but the vast stretches of monotonous discourse were relieved by several passages of extraordinary power and beauty. The piece should be heard again to be understood and appreciated. It was excellently played, Dr. Muck conducting with his accustomed care and spirit.

The other number on the program was Dvorak's lively "Carnival" overture. There will be no concert this

[103]

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 11TH CONCERT

Performance of New Work by Bischoff Is Remarkable for Brilliancy.

COMPOSITION EXAMPLE OF SIN OF "TOO MUCHNESS"

Mme. Carreno Rouses Enthusiasm by Superb Playing of MacDowell Concerto.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E major, op. 16.....Bischoff
Concerto for piano, D minor.....MacDowell
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorak

Hermann Bischoff, who lives in Munich, was studying music at the Leipsic Conservatory in a sober, righteous and godly manner, when he heard one day, as the story goes, the symphony in F minor by Richard Strauss. In comparison with the later works of Strauss this symphony in F minor is a smug and orthodox work, but it set Bischoff a-thinking, and he left the conservatory to be in company with Strauss. There were no actual lessons in composition, but there was reading of scores together for three years; there was much talk about music and the true modern expression of musical thoughts.

Bischoff's chief works are "Gewittersegen" for tenor, organ and orchestra (1899); "Pan," an orchestral idyl, inspired by "The Nymphs," a prose poem by Turgenef (1903), and this symphony, which was produced at the 42d convention of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Essen in May, 1906.

The symphony was then played from manuscript. The composer revised it thoroughly, and made cuts and alterations, before it was published. He wrote a curiously worded programme in explanation of his music for the first performance. This explanation is not printed in the score.

Motif of Symphony.

Bischoff first lays down the principle that there can be no musical expression which does not find an apology in the world of facts and events or in the domain of poetic sentiments and sensations. Writing this symphony, he had in mind the story of a dissolute young man who becomes acquainted with pure happiness in the form of a noble woman, but is not worthy to attain this happiness; he therefore seeks peace in resignation; the ghosts of his misspent youth pursue him like furies; the apparition of pure womanhood quiets the voices of darkness. Man is raised from the muck of life by love for a noble woman.

"If anyone hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmurings in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer."

Shades of Byron and Berlioz! Here is a belated romanticist in a period of machinery and materialism. The story of the rescue of a youth from the beer halls, the tingle-tangles and the jests of the Fliegende Blaetter of Munich by a star-eyed maiden with sentimental hair, is to be told in music. The first movement, we are assured, contains a vision of "lorgiastic masked balls." How far we are from the pious orgies of the muses! This movement should also contain "passionate" but legitimate love-murmuring and songs of birds with the suggestion of moonlit gardens —although gardens of today are thoughtfully provided with electric lights.

Had Definite Programme.

"Peace in resignation" is the motive of the second movement, while ghosts of misspent youth provide a scherzo. But what is the "idea" of the finale? Does the youth never purify himself till he is worthy of the loved one's hand? The finale is in the nature of an apotheosis. Perhaps there is a portrayal of the abandonment of the will, which alone, as certain German and Asiatic philosophers assure us, brings happiness.

It is not necessary to inquire into the measure of Bischoff's success in expressing in tones his story of riotous living, purification, resignation, final conquest over self. Almost every composer has a succession of ideas in his mind which prompt him to paraphrase them in music whether he take the public into his confidence or give out the music as absolute.

We know that Tschaikowsky had a definite programme for his "Pathetic" symphony, but what that programme was he would not tell. Niecks in his recently published book on "Programme Music" thinks it highly probable that Brahms had some argument for each one of his symphonies. Whoever the composer may be, the musical paraphrase of the suggesting ideas is that which should be judged without special reference to the ideas themselves.

Demands Huge Orchestra.

Mr. Bischoff's age is not given in the encyclopaedias, but we know that he was a conservatory student 20 years ago, and his photograph represents him as a well nourished, carefully dressed man, well on the sunny side of 40. There is furthermore a youthful spirit in many pages of this symphony. Not only does he demand a huge orchestra to say his say, but he demands time. His first movement is nearly half an hour long and in spite of its length it is the most impressive. It is frankly boisterous and careless in its main idea, that of portraying a reckless life.

A line of Walt Whitman might serve as motto: "Onward we move, a gay [illegible] backwards, with wild-flapping [illegible]." In this [illegible]

[illegible] vulgar pleasure there is a force. There is an exuberance that is not displeasing. Here the composer is spontaneous; here he is himself. He is also himself in the most striking page of the whole work: in the remarkable preparation for the entrance of a sensuous theme given to the 'cellos, a page of instrumentation that stands out boldly in the whole volume of notes—and this volume is an elephantine folio.

The opening of the second movement has true thoughtfulness and nobility, but after the opening exposition there is too evident attempts at depth, and the mind of the hearer soon wanders; nor is it brought back to the "resignation" of the youth; or, if it be brought back, there is only resignation on the part of the hearer.

Scherzo Too Long.

Here as in the scherzo the composer is guilty of the fault of nimiety, to use a word dear to Coleridge, who attributed this fault to German writers, metaphysicians, poets, dramatists, a word that is synonymous with Artemus Ward's "too muchness." The scherzo has exciting moments, but it is all too long. So, too, the finale might be put into a duck-press. Only the imposing final pages remain in the mind.

As Bischoff is intimate with Richard Strauss, to whom this symphony is dedicated, it might be reasonably expected that his own music would show Strauss' influence. There are pages, especially in the first movement that recall the spirit of Strauss's "Don Juan," the adventurous, freebooting amorist, but the resemblance is chiefly in tricks of expression, as in a matter of horns, a harmonic formula, a flourish of ornamentation. Bischoff is by no means a servile copyist.

These are only impressions of a work that is out of common; a work that while it is swollen out of due proportion, and is at times bombastic, mere sound and fury, and at other times is dull in spite of its pretentiousness, or, rather, by reason of it, is nevertheless the composition of a man to be reckoned with. His most conspicuous faults are those that come from an abuse of material and from the desire to exhaust every subject, however unimportant it may be.

The harmonic scheme is seldom subtle or refined or ultra-modern. The instrumentation is too often thick, without contrast, without delicacy, without wit. In spite of all these faults which characterize so much of the music of the younger German school, and are seen in a modified form in modern German literature and art, there is true stuff in this symphony.

Revealed All in Music.

The performance was remarkable for elasticity, brilliance and eloquence. Dr. Muck, who had rehearsed with the utmost care and patience, and the orchestra that carried out his wishes with intelligence and verve, are alike to be congratulated. There is no doubt but that everything that is in the music was revealed with the utmost clearness and with the fitting pomp of diction. It is a pity that works which demand so much labor and thought—works as Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and this symphony—I group them here only by reason of the difficulties in execution—are heard as a rule only once in a season. This seems hardly fair to the composer, the audience, the conductor and the orchestra.

Mme. Carreno played MacDowell's concerto superbly, with incomparable rhythmic feeling, dash and demoniacal energy. The concerto itself is one of the composer's most purely individual and romantic works. It is a concerto for a virtuoso who must also be a human being and a bit of a poet. Mme. Carreno is an extraordinary woman, a pianist who is mistress of the grand style; a woman of amazing vitality and personal force; a woman of a singularly romantic life. Her performance last night was extraordinary even for her. The audience, which had received the symphony with favor and appreciated the performance, was enthusiastic over Mme. Carreno, and with great reason.

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA
JAN 5- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Among the younger Germans who have been following more or less in the footsteps of Richard Strauss, and have become members of that strenuous band which is preaching in Germany the gospel of "the music of the future," is Herman Bischoff, of Munich, who has written a symphony in E major, which will be the particular work on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Madame Terena Carreno, if she is well enough, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor, and the final number will be Chabrier's brilliant Rhapsody Espana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau [illegible]

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 5- 1908

Among the younger Germans who have been following in the footsteps of Richard Strauss is Hermann Bischoff, of Munich. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been able to find out little about Bischoff, except that he is a young man, who has written a symphony in E major. This symphony will be the special feature on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The symphony had its first performance at the meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung, in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and has been played several times since then in Germany. Because of its enormous technical difficulties the work has not yet become generally known. It had its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4, after rehearsals that started three weeks ago.

The soloist will be Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor. The final number will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody, "Espana."

[104]

MUSICAL MATTERS

Teresa Carreno Soloist at the Symphony.

Bessie Abott Sings at Today's Popular Concert.

Sousa's Band — Other Events of the Week.

There is no doubt of the regard in which Teresa Carreno is held by the music-loving public of Boston, for the great artist was received with the heartiest kind of welcoming at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert, and she honored her pupil, the American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, by choosing for her piano solo his second concerto, a work that compares favorably with the foremost of modern compositions of its rank.

The program opened with the first performance here of the E major symphony by Hermann Bischoff, a musician but little known, though he doubtless soon will be. One hearing of his symphony practically guarantees that fact. The joyous, fantastic and characteristic "Carneval" overture by Dvorak closed the concert.

Mme Carreno has changed somewhat in appearance since her visit here several years ago, but there is the same magnetic personality, brilliant smile, animated poise and commanding air of yore, and her art seems as appealing as ever. She has always been an interesting study, for she has a marvelous hold on the feminine heart and combines masculine virility in playing with a tenderness and grace that relieves her dazzling powers from the suggestion of bravado. She is just natural, that's all.

In her interpretation of the concerto she missed no shade of expression and invested the music with all the delicacy and significance that a sympathetic artist could command. The impressive first movement was a fine example of sustained vigor, with brilliancy in intermittent passage work and well-defined themes successfully pitted against the orchestral forces. The performance of the second part was as near perfection in finger work as it seemed possible, delicate, fleet and clear in exploitation, with a pianissimo effect that roused spontaneous outbursts of applause and obliged the wonderful woman to rise and bow several times before resuming her work.

In the closing movement there was shown the same virtuosity, crisp fingering and beautiful melodic quality of tone that characterized her earlier performance. The superb breadth and freedom of her playing and her ease in conquering all technical difficulties made her interpretation memorable. At the end of the concerto she was recalled many times to the platform to acknowledge the applause. The orchestral support left nothing to be desired.

The Bishoff symphony might be called colossal in proportions, for it is elaborate in orchestral construction, immensely difficult for every choir and is more than an hour in length. It is the most difficult new work Dr Muck has attempted and the rehearsals have been unusually numerous for all parts of the band. The score for the brass part at times verges upon the impossible, not quite though, and every other section is treated in about the same way.

Bishoff had in mind for musical illustration the story of a dissolute youth who, after a life of debauchery and wild revelry, awakens to the sense of a happiness which is denied him. A rake's progress interspersed with poetic visions of pure delights never to reach a realization. As Bishoff dedicated the work to Richard Strauss, the manner of treatment may readily be inferred.

Skilled in the capabilities of the modern orchestra and with an imagination that fairly "rides the whirlwind," the author handled his subject in a strikingly effective way. Not particularly pleasing as a whole, except to the expert in things musical, but showing the great ability of composer in the so-called advanced style of writing, there is a consistent succession of tonal colors representing episodes and sentiments of varying import, and in combinations of the choirs the variety is really perplexing in forms and number. A riot of fancy let loose.

The prominence of the brass contingent is better suited to an open-air performance than in a hall, and fortissimo passages are so frequent that the score, unless heard at a distance, must necessarily sound muddled to those sitting near the heavier instruments. In the second part Bishoff shows he can be melodic, for here two exquisite themes are given to the strings and lighter groups, the working out running along sanely until near the end of the movement; then comes a return to instrumental chaos.

The four divisions bristle with pitfalls for the players, and the general smoothness and coherency of the performances by Dr Muck's forces shows that constant diligence and rehearsals had accomplished splendid results. The big and rather uninviting work called forth unusual exertions on the part of the conductor, as well as the men. 'Twas no child's play to labor through an hour of Bishoff uncontrolled by a musical leash.

The third trip of the orchestra will be taken this week. The 12th program will comprise Haydn's G major symphony, three German dances by Mozart, first time here, and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

Popular Concert Today.

The fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony hall this afternoon. The star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan opera house of New York, who was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming. Miss Abott is one of the many American girls who have made a success in grand [illegible] Southern birth and at the beginning of her career with her sister played banjos and sang songs. While in New York she attracted the attention of Jean de Reszke, and after a course of study in that city she went abroad and ultimately made her debut in grand opera in Paris. For the past three years she has been a member of the Conried company in New York.

The other artists on the program are well known in this city, Mr Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Mr Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a high standard at these Sunday concerts, and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them.

The accompanist will be Mr Rosenstein of New York, and Mr Charles North of this city will play the flute obligato in the mad scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

Sousa in Boston.

The announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony hall next Wednesday is sufficient to excite the interest of those who like band music at its best. Sousa brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for many years, and in this fact is one of the secrets of his success.

Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Mr Herbert L. Clarke, whose performances are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be regarded as a Boston girl, because her training was received in this city.

Sousa's programs show the same skill that has characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and a majority of the works presented are serious or semiserious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of Sousa's coming will be a new march, entitled Powhattan's Daughter."

HERALD—MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1908

FINE SUNDAY MUSIC AT SYMPHONY HALL

Series of Concerts for Benefit of Roxbury Aid Society Resumed.

The series of Sunday concerts given in Symphony Hall by the Roxbury Aid Society was resumed yesterday afternoon, after an interval of two Sundays during the holidays. The soloists were Miss Bessie Abott, soprano; T. Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox, pianist. C. K. North, flutist, and Mr. Rosenstein, accompanist, assisted. The programme included Grieg's sonata in F major for violin and piano; piano solos, Liszt's "Cantique d'Amour," Faure's Romance, Saint-Saens' Toccata; violin pieces, Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Prize Song from Wagner's "Meistersinger," Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lutins," and the following songs: "Mad scene" from "Lucia," Strauss' Serenade, Tschaikowsky's Berceuse, Godard's "Chanson de Julliet" and a waltz song by Arditi.

The concert was one of unusual interest, as it was the occasion of Miss Abott's first public appearance here as a concert singer. She was apparently somewhat hampered by a cold yesterday afternoon, but the quality of her performance was not marred, and the voice itself was delightful, although it could not be used very lavishly. It was a pleasure to hear the "mad" scene sung without too apparent effort, without grimace, and in tune; for often the performance of this scene causes no emotion on the part of the hearer except anxiety. The music itself is, to many, the ideal of concert or opera music; and those to whom it is dull or irritating must make up their minds to hear either this or the "Hamlet" mad scene when a new soprano makes her debut. Miss Abott's success, in this and in her other groups, was notable, and she was obliged to add an encore piece at the end of each group. The personality, and what must be called, for want of a better word, the style of the singer, were largely responsible for the warmth of her reception.

Mr. Fox and Mr. Adamowski maintained well their share in the general interest of the concert. Both are so well known here that it is not necessary to comment upon the quality of their performance, except to remark in passing that the ensemble in the sonata was noteworthy.

Mr. Fox had made an admirable group of solo pieces, which he augmented by a prelude by McDowell, played with characteristic taste, but the intimate nature of one or two of these pieces was somewhat lost in the large hall. During the performance of Faure's delicate Romance many were disturbed by the entrance and the inexcusable rudeness of some late comers.

Mr. North played the flute obbligato to the scene from "Lucia" with accustomed excellence, and Mr. Rosenstein's accompaniments deserve a special comment. The audience was highly appreciative.

Globe - Jan 4 - N.Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, at Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday, with Mme Teresa Carreño as soloist, comprises Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major (first time), MacDowell's second piano concerto, and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The programme for Saturday, with Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist, comprises Handel's concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's [illegible] in concerto in A, and G[illegible]

HERALD—BOSTON, JANUARY 5, 1908

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 11TH CONCERT

Performance of New Work by Bischoff Is Remarkable for Brilliancy.

COMPOSITION EXAMPLE OF SIN OF "TOO MUCHNESS"

Mme. Carreno Rouses Enthusiasm by Superb Playing of MacDowell Concerto.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E major, op. 16.....Bischoff
Concerto for piano, D minor.....MacDowell
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorak

Hermann Bischoff, who lives in Munich, was studying music at the Leipsic Conservatory in a sober, righteous and godly manner, when he heard one day, as the story goes, the symphony in F minor by Richard Strauss. In comparison with the later works of Strauss this symphony in F minor is a smug and orthodox work, but it set Bischoff a-thinking, and he left the conservatory to be in company with Strauss. There were no actual lessons in composition, but there was reading of scores together for three years; there was much talk about music and the true modern expression of musical thoughts.

Bischoff's chief works are "Gewittersegen" for tenor, organ and orchestra (1899); "Pan," an orchestral idyl, inspired by "The Nymphs," a prose poem by Turgenef (1902), and this symphony, which was produced at the 42d convention of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Essen in May, 1906.

The symphony was then played from manuscript. The composer revised it thoroughly, and made cuts and alterations, before it was published. He wrote a curiously worded programme in explanation of his music for the first performance. This explanation is not printed in the score.

Motif of Symphony.

Bischoff first lays down the principle that there can be no musical expression which does not find an analogy in the world of facts and events or in the domain of poetic sentiments and sensations. Writing this symphony, he had in mind the story of a dissolute young man who becomes acquainted with pure happiness in the form of a noble woman, but is not worthy to attain this happiness; he therefore seeks peace in resignation; the ghosts of his misspent youth pursue him like furies; the apparition of pure womanhood quiets the voices of darkness. Man is raised from the muck of life by love for a noble woman.

"If anyone hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmurings in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer."

Shades of Byron and Berlioz! Here is a belated romanticist in a period of machinery and materialism. The story of the rescue of a youth from the beer halls, the tingle-tangles and the jests of the Fliegende Blaetter of Munich by a star-eyed maiden with sentimental hair, is to be told in music. The first movement, we are assured, contains a vision of "lorgiastic masked balls." How far we are from the pious orgies of the muses! This movement should also contain "passionate" but legitimate love-murmuring and songs of birds with the suggestion of moonlit gardens —although gardens of today are thoughtfully provided with electric lights.

Had Definite Programme.

"Peace in resignation" is the motive of the second movement, while ghosts of misspent youth provide a scherzo. But what is the "idea" of the finale? Does the youth never purify himself till he is worthy of the loved one's hand? The finale is in the nature of an apotheosis. Perhaps there is a portrayal of the abandonment of the will, which alone, as certain German and Asiatic philosophers assure us, brings happiness.

It is not necessary to inquire into the measure of Bischoff's success in expressing in tones his story of riotous living, purification, resignation, final conquest over self. Almost every composer has a succession of ideas in his mind which prompt him to paraphrase them in music whether he take the public into his confidence or give out the music as absolute.

We know that Tschaikowsky had a definite programme for his "Pathetic" symphony, but what that programme was he would not tell. Niecks in his recently published book on "Programme Music" thinks it highly probable that Brahms had some argument for each one of his symphonies. Whoever the composer may be, the musical paraphrase of the suggesting ideas is that which should be judged without special reference to the ideas themselves.

Demands Huge Orchestra.

Mr. Bischoff's age is not given in the encyclopaedias, but we know that he was a conservatory student 20 years ago, and his photograph represents him as a well nourished, carefully dressed man, well on the sunny side of 40. There is furthermore a youthful spirit in many pages of this symphony. Not only does he demand a huge orchestra to say his say, but he demands time. His first movement is nearly half an hour long and in spite of its length it is the most impressive. It is frankly boisteours and careless in its main idea, that of portraying a reckless life.

A line of Walt Whitman might serve as motto: "Onward we move, a gay gang of blackguards, with wild-flapping [illegible] this first expos-tion of vulgar pleasure there is a force. There is an exuberance that is not displeasing. Here the composer is spontaneous; here he is himself. He is also himself in the most striking page of the whole work; in the remarkable preparation for the entrance of a sensuous theme given to the 'cellos, a page of instrumentation that stands out boldly in the whole volume of notes—and this volume is an elephantine folio.

The opening of the second movement has true thoughtfulness and nobility, but after the opening exposition there is a too evident attempts at depth, and the mind of the hearer soon wanders; nor is it brought back to the "resignation" of the youth; or, if it be brought back, there is only resignation on the part of the hearer.

Scherzo Too Long.

Here as in the scherzo the composer is guilty of the fault of nimiety, to use a word dear to Coleridge, who attributed this fault to German writers, metaphysicians, poets, dramatists, a word that is synonymous with Artemus Ward's "too muchness." The scherzo has exciting moments, but it is all too long. So, too, the finale might be put into a luck-press. Only the imposing final pages remain in the mind.

As Bischoff is intimate with Richard Strauss, to whom this symphony is dedicated, it might be reasonably expected that his own music would show Strauss' influence. There are pages, especially in the first movement that recall the spirit of Strauss's "Don Juan," the adventurous, freebooting amorist, but the resemblance is chiefly in tricks of expression, as in a matter of horns, a harmonic formula, a flourish of ornamentation. Bischoff is by no means a servile copyist.

These are only impressions of a work that is out of common; a work that, while it is swollen out of due proportion, and is at times bombastic, mere sound and fury, and at other times is dull in spite of its pretentiousness, or, rather, by reason of it, is nevertheless the composition of a man to be reckoned with. His most conspicuous faults are those that come from an abuse of material and from the desire to exhaust every subject, however unimportant it may be.

The harmonic scheme is seldom subtle or refined or ultra-modern. The instrumentation is too often thick, without contrast, without delicacy, without wit. In spite of all these faults which characterize so much of the music of the younger German school, and are seen in a modified form in modern German literature and art, there is true stuff in this symphony.

Revealed All in Music.

The performance was remarkable for elasticity, brilliance and eloquence. Dr. Muck, who had rehearsed with the utmost care and patience, and the orchestra that carried out his wishes with intelligence and verve, are alike to be congratulated. There is no doubt but that everything that is in the music was revealed with the utmost clearness and with the fitting pomp of diction. It is a pity that works which demand so much labor and thought—works as Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and this symphony—I group them here only by reason of the difficulties in execution—are heard as a rule only once in a season. This seems hardly fair to the composer, the audience, the conductor and the orchestra.

Mme. Carreno played MacDowell's concerto superbly, with incomparable rhythmic feeling, dash and demoniacal energy. The concerto itself is one of the composer's most purely individual and romantic works. It is a concerto for a virtuoso who must also be a human being and a bit of a poet. Mme. Carreno is an extraordinary woman, a pianist who is mistress of the grand style; a woman of amazing vitality and personal force; a woman of a singularly romantic life. Her performance last night was extraordinary even for her. The audience, which had received the symphony with favor and appreciated the performance, was enthusiastic over Mme. Carreno, and with great reason.

[illegible]

PHIL[illegible]

JAN[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Among the younger Germans who have been following more or less in the footsteps of Richard Strauss, and have become members of that strenuous band which is preaching in Germany the gospel of "the music of the future," is Herman Bischoff, of Munich, who has written a symphony in E major, which will be the particular work on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Madame Terena Carreno, if she is well enough, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor, and the final number will be Chabrier's brilliant Rhapsody Espana.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD

[illegible] A. P.

[illegible]

Among the younger Germans who have been following in the footsteps of Richard Strauss is Hermann Bischoff, of Munich. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been able to find out little about Bischoff, except that he is a young man, who has written a symphony in E major. This symphony will be the special feature on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The symphony had its first performance at the meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung, in Essen, in the spring of 1906, and has been played several times since then in Germany. Because of its enormous technical difficulties the work has not yet become generally known. It had its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4, after rehearsals that started three weeks ago.

The soloist will be Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor. The final number will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody, "Espana."

[104]

GLOBE—JANUARY 5, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

Teresa Carreno Soloist at the Symphony.

Bessie Abott Sings at Today's Popular Concert.

Sousa's Band — Other Events of the Week.

There is no doubt of the regard in which Teresa Carreno is held by the music-loving public of Boston, for the great artist was received with the heartiest kind of welcoming at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert, and she honored her pupil, the American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, by choosing for her piano solo his second concerto, a work that compares favorably with the foremost of modern compositions of its rank.

The program opened with the first performance here of the E major symphony by Hermann Bischoff, a musician but little known, though he doubtless soon will be. One hearing of his symphony practically guarantees that fact. The joyous, fantastic and characteristic "Carneval" overture by Dvorak closed the concert.

Mme Carreno has changed somewhat in appearance since her visit here several years ago, but there is the same magnetic personality, brilliant smile, animated poise and commanding air of yore, and her art seems as appealing as ever. She has always been an interesting study, for she has a marvelous hold on the feminine heart and combines masculine virility in playing with a tenderness and grace that relieves her dazzling powers from the suggestion of bravado. She is just natural, that's all.

In her interpretation of the concerto she missed no shade of expression and invested the music with all the delicacy and significance that a sympathetic artist could command. The impressive first movement was a fine example of sustained vigor, with brilliancy in intermittent passage work and well-defined themes successfully pitted against the orchestral forces. The performance of the second part was as near perfection in finger work as it seemed possible, delicate, fleet and clear in exploitation, with a pianissimo effect that roused spontaneous outbursts of applause and obliged the wonderful woman to rise and bow several times before resuming her work.

In the closing movement there was shown the same virtuosity, crisp fingering and beautiful melodic quality of tone that characterized her earlier performance. The superb breadth and freedom of her playing and her ease in conquering all technical difficulties made her interpretation memorable. At the end of the concerto she was recalled many times to the platform to acknowledge the applause. The orchestral support left nothing to be desired.

The Bishoff symphony might be called colossal in proportions, for it is elaborate in orchestral construction, immensely difficult for every choir and is more than an hour in length. It is the most difficult new work Dr Muck has attempted and the rehearsals have been unusually numerous for all parts of the band. The score for the brass part at times verges upon the impossible, not quite though, and every other section is treated in about the same way.

Bishoff had in mind for musical illustration the story of a dissolute youth who, after a life of debauchery and wild revelry, awakens to the sense of a happiness which is denied him. A rake's progress interspersed with poetic visions of pure delights never to reach a realization. As Bishoff dedicated the work to Richard Strauss, the manner of treatment may readily be inferred.

Skilled in the capabilities of the modern orchestra and with an imagination that fairly "rides the whirlwind," the author handled his subject in a strikingly effective way. Not particularly pleasing as a whole, except to the expert in things musical, but showing the great ability of composer in the so-called advanced style of writing, there is a consistent succession of tonal colors representing episodes and sentiments of varying import, and in combinations of the choirs the variety is really perplexing in forms and number. A riot of fancy let loose.

The prominence of the brass contingent is better suited to an open-air performance than in a hall, and fortissimo passages are so frequent that the score, unless heard at a distance, must necessarily sound muddled to those sitting near the heavier instruments. In the second part Bishoff shows he can be melodic, for here two exquisite themes are given to the strings and lighter groups, the working out running along sanely until near the end of the movement; then comes a return to instrumental chaos.

The four divisions bristle with pitfalls for the players, and the general smoothness and coherency of the performances by Dr Muck's forces shows that constant diligence and rehearsals had accomplished splendid results. The big and rather uninviting work called forth unusual exertions on the part of the conductor, as well as the men. 'Twas no child's play to labor through an hour of Bishoff uncontrolled by a musical leash.

The third trip of the orchestra will be taken this week. The 12th program will comprise Haydn's G major symphony, three German dances by Mozart, first time here, and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

Popular Concert Today.

The fourth of the series of popular price Sunday concerts will be given in Symphony hall this afternoon. The star of the occasion will be Miss Bessie Abott of the Metropolitan opera house of New York, who was to have given a concert here in November, but illness prevented her coming. Miss Abott is one of the many American girls who have made a success in grand [illegible]

[illegible] southern birth and at the beginning of her career with her sister played banjos and sang songs. While in New York she attracted the attention of Jean de Reszke, and after a course of study in that city she went abroad and ultimately made her debut in grand opera in Paris. For the past three years she has been a member of the Conried company in New York.

The other artists on the program are well known in this city, Mr Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, and Mr Felix Fox, the pianist. It is the effort and purpose of the management to maintain a high standard at these Sunday concerts, and the Boston public seems to take most kindly to them.

The accompanist will be Mr Rosenstein of New York, and Mr Charles North of this city will play the flute obligato in the mad scene from "Lucia," which Miss Abott will sing.

Sousa in Boston.

The announcement that Sousa and his band are to give two concerts in Symphony hall next Wednesday is sufficient to excite the interest of those who like band music at its best. Sousa brings what is practically the same band that has been with him for many years, and in this fact is one of the secrets of his success.

Three soloists will appear at each of the concerts: Mr Herbert L. Clarke, whose performances are familiar to all who have attended Sousa concerts in the past; Miss Jeanette Powers, the talented violinist who has been here before with him, and Miss Lucy Allen, soprano. Miss Allen may in a sense be regarded as a Boston girl, because her training was received in this city.

Sousa's programs show the same skill that has characterized them in the past. They are not very long, and a majority of the works presented are serious or semiserious, but their brevity allows for the number of encores which are invariably music of the most popular kind. A feature of Sousa's coming will be a new march, entitled "Powhattan's Daughter."

HERALD—MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1908

FINE SUNDAY MUSIC AT SYMPHONY HALL

Series of Concerts for Benefit of Roxbury Aid Society Resumed.

The series of Sunday concerts given in Symphony Hall by the Roxbury Aid Society was resumed yesterday afternoon, after an interval of two Sundays during the holidays. The soloists were Miss Bessie Abott, soprano; T. Adamowski, violinist, and Felix Fox, pianist. C. K. North, flutist, and Mr. Rosenstein, accompanist, assisted. The programme included Grieg's sonata in F major for violin and piano; piano solos, Liszt's "Cantique d'Amour," Faure's Romance, Saint-Saens' Toccata; violin pieces, Wilhelmj's arrangement of the Prize Song from Wagner's "Meistersinger," Bazzin's "La Ronde des Lutins," and the following songs: "Mad scene" from "Lucia," Strauss' Serenade, Tschaikowsky's Berceuse, Godard's "Chanson de Julliet" and a waltz song by Arditi.

The concert was one of unusual interest, as it was the occasion of Miss Abott's first public appearance here as a concert singer. She was apparently somewhat hampered by a cold yesterday afternoon, but the quality of her performance was not marred, and the voice itself was delightful, although it could not be used very lavishly. It was a pleasure to hear the "mad" scene sung without too apparent effort, without grimace, and in tune; for often the performance of this scene causes no emotion on the part of the hearer except anxiety. The music itself is, to many, the ideal of concert or opera music; and those to whom it is dull or irritating must make up their minds to hear either this or the "Hamlet" mad scene when a new soprano makes her debut. Miss Abott's success, in this and in her other groups, was notable, and she was obliged to add an encore piece at the end of each group. The personality, and what must be called, for want of a better word, the style of the singer, were largely responsible for the warmth of her reception.

Mr. Fox and Mr. Adamowski maintained well their share in the general interest of the concert. Both are so well known here that it is not necessary to comment upon the quality of their performance, except to remark in passing that the ensemble in the sonata was noteworthy.

Mr. Fox had made an admirable group of solo pieces, which he augmented by a prelude by McDowell, played with characteristic taste, but the intimate nature of one or two of these pieces was somewhat lost in the large hall. During the performance of Faure's delicate Romance many were disturbed by the entrance and the inexcusable rudeness of some late comers.

Mr. North played the flute obbligato to the scene from "Lucia" with accustomed excellence, and Mr. Rosenstein's accompaniments deserve a special comment. The audience was highly appreciative.

Globe - Jan 4 - N.Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, at Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday, with Mme Teresa Carreño as soloist, comprises Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major (first time), MacDowell's second piano concerto, and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The programme for Saturday, with Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, as soloist, comprises Handel's concerto in F for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Mozart's violin concerto in A, and Goetz's [illegible]

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Hermann Bischoff. Symphony in E major.
MacDowell. Concerto No. 2, in D minor. Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Dvorak. Overture. "Carnaval."

It was a piccolo night! Never did that imp of the orchestra hold such continuous high carnival. The piccolo-player must be nursing his worn-out lungs today. Bischoff's symphony might almost be called a piccolo concerto. Yet this new composer had a good deal to say for himself in his debut. He has the defect of painting almost everything scarlet, and he has that awful modern fault of length. Tonorrhoea is a new disease which seems to have fastened upon most of the composers of the modern school. Yet almost every one of the latter day composers is as good in scoring as Wagner or Berlioz was. It is a "metier" which Strauss, Mahler, Weingartner, Bischoff, Loeffler, Van der Stucken, in short all the modern men of prominence, possess.

Of course, therefore, Bischoff's symphony was a very heavy and difficult score, and equally of course it was more than an hour long. It began with a picture of dissipation of the bacchanalian type, something that seemed as graphic a picture of German student life as Murger's "Vie de Boheme" of the Quartier Latin of Paris. Spite of its prolixity (it was about half an hour in length) this movement must be called a very successful number. It is a graphic picture, drawn with a sure touch, even if it omitted to portray the "Katzenjammer," the grey misery of the morning after. Almost every measure in it was riotous and exciting, and Bischoff was not ugly or dissonant even in the midst of the tumult; he did not disdain melody nor did he scorn to be intelligible. There are few composers who could have been so long-winded without becoming tiresome. The piccolo began its shieking almost at once, and kept it up interminably. It was soon evident that the Munich bars do not close at 11 p.m. One could not help wishing that the composer had laid on his scarlet a little less thickly.

The slow movement receded a trifle from the extreme modern vein. It had two frankly melodic themes and there was a convincing vigor in its development and a tranquility at its end that were peculiarly attractive.

The third movement took the place of a Scherzo, although it was rather grotesque than playful. It was rather "Peer Gynt-y" in its progressions, but not in the least plagiarized; the work is original enough from beginning to end. The omnipresent piccolo, which has been momentarily quiet during the second movement, here renewed its yelling, and there were many orchestral oddities and explosions. The trombones were pushed to the headache point in this movement. The performance of this was so brilliant that Dr. Muck and the orchestra (which rose in response) were applauded most vigorously.

The only bit of moderation in the whole symphony was the tempo mark of the finale,—"Allegro Moderato". Again piccolo, trombones, trumpets, kettle-drums, etc., were let loose; again the whole pepper-box was thrown into the dish to spice it up. We must condemn the length.—when will a modern dare to write a symphony as short as Beethoven's eighth again? We can only censure the extreme boisterousness of the work. Yet with it all we feel that this Bischoff may have something to say later on. He is, to us, more like Mahler than like Richard Strauss. But he is likely to grow yet greater. Parts of this symphony are so frankly "canaille" that their very vulgarity becomes interesting and attractive.

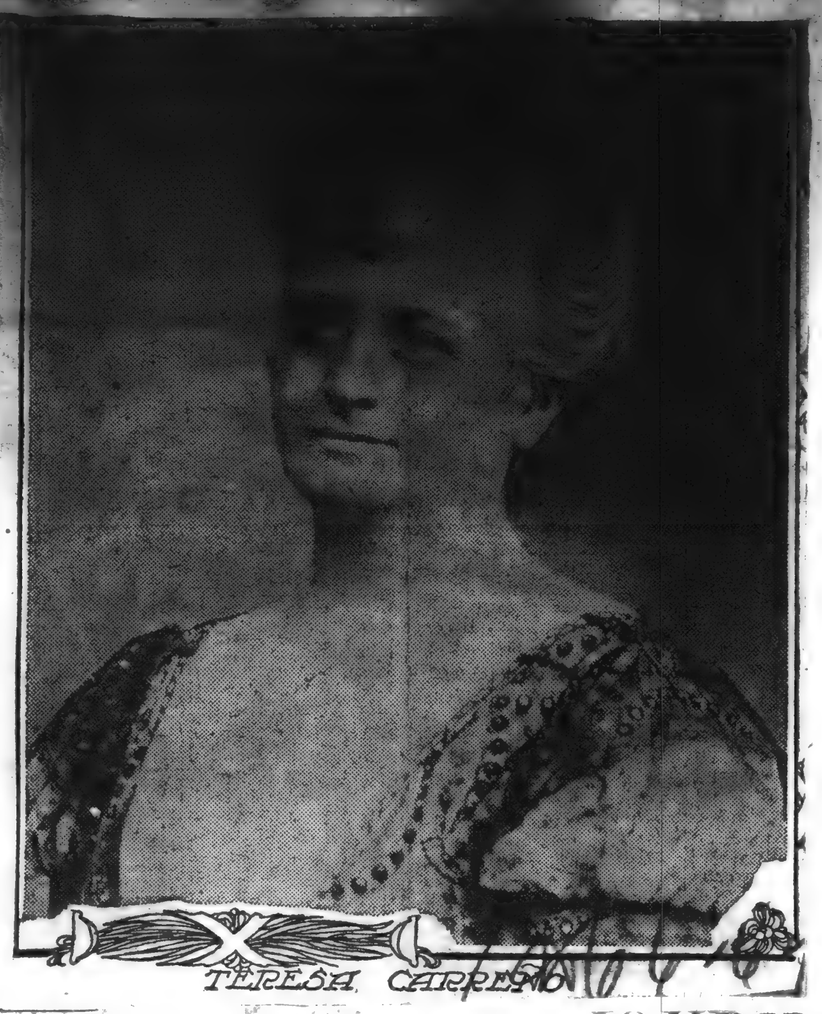
Then came the real triumph of the concert. Teresa Carreno and the MacDowell concerto! There was nothing blatant here, nothing sensational or eccentric. The scoring is for the ordinary orchestra of Beethoven's day (with trombones) the form is clear, and the whole work scarcely as large as Bischoff's first movement. Yet one felt immediately the intrinsic superiority of the school. It also has the advantage of growing continuously stronger to its very end. The contrasts of the concerto are very effective. There was nothing in the entire symphony so beautiful as the subordinate theme of the first movement or the archness and delicacy of the entire second movement of this concerto.

But the most impressive part of the work is the beginning of the finale. Here the first theme (of the opening movement) returns and there is a dramatic sense of brooding and foreboding that becomes doubly pathetic in view of the history of the composer. The breadth of the martial theme of the finale (the "Seitensatz") was enormously impressive (even without any piccolo and "fortissisissimo" effects) and the final wild rush of piano scales and the abrupt close were exciting and effective.

But it takes a Carreno to bring out the abandon and fire of the work. The overwhelming triumph of Teresa Carreno at this concert is the more remarkable when we remember that we had had the greatest season of piano-playing in Boston's musical history before she came. To give the list of the great pianists who have played in Boston this season would be to publish a short musical directory. Yet the last here became first and the success of the tropical pianist was worthy of her great reputation. She has not lost an iota of the brilliant impetuosity that of old carried her audiences off their feet. She has been called "The Lioness of the Piano," and she deserves the title today more than ever. The concerto became, what it should be, an emotional poem, because of the freedom and elasticity with which she gave it. The great technique of the artist became but the means to an end; one did not think of difficulties, of technical points, but every auditor gave himself up to the charm of the tone-poem. At the close Mme. Carreno was recalled over and over again; we lost the count of the number of her reappearances in response to the interminable applause.

Then came more "Carnival". Did not Dr. Muck think that we had dissipated enough in the first jamboree? Did we need Dvorak's frolic after Bischoff's debauch? Was it necessary to have Slibovitzka after Nordhaeuser? However this may be, the piccolo again had a little final shrieking, and we must state here that the instrument was particularly well-played throughout all the evening. There were a few quiet moments in the "Carnival" for which we were grateful. The violins, too, in ... did fine work in the high ... reminiscences of Wagner may be forgiven.

Louis C. Elson.



TERESA CARRENO

Le Courrier de la Presse
A. GALLOIS & CH. DEMOGEOT
21, BOULEVARD MONTMARTRE. PARIS
FOURNIT COUPURES DE JOURNAUX & DE REVUES SUR TOUS SUJETS & PERSONNALITÉS

JOURNAL
CHICOPEE, MASS.
JAN 4- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Tickets are also on sale for the local engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be heard here on the 30th. Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor of this famous organization. Columbus is fortunate in the promise of so much good music.

ablished: London, 1881; New York, 188

JAN 4- 1908

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night will be exceedingly interesting. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who is in this city after an absence of several years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor. The last number will be the Spanish Rhapsody of Chabrier. The programme, in full, is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Op. 73. .....Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte in D Minor, No. 2. Op. 23.....MacDowell
Rhapsody Espana.....Chabrier

1884

EDWARD MACDOWELL,
The American composer whose Piano Concerto No. 2 will be played by Mme. Teresa Carreno.

TIMES
D. C.
JAN 5- 1908

With the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon the corner of the season will be turned and the end of the musical year will come in sight. It seems to pass very quickly after the holidays, and before one is fully aware of it, the season will be over and the musicians will be making plans for 1908-1909.

The orchestra will offer at this concert the second of its great piano soloists, this time Madame Teresa Carreno, who holds as surely today as ever in her career the undisputed position as the first woman pianist in the world.

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 4- 1908

As the soloist of the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, Mme. Teresa Carenno, the distinguished French pianist, will play MacDowell's second concerto in D-minor. The principal orchestral number will be Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E-major, said to be a work of immense difficulty. Bischoff is a young man at present living in Munich, and his symphony had its first performance a year ago at the meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung in Essen, and has been played several times since in Germany, but because of its immense technical demands has not become generally known. It was first given in America in Boston, this week. The final number on Monday evening's program will be Chabrier's brilliant "Rhapsody Espana."

—o—

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 4- 1908

Among the younger Germans who have been following more or less in the footsteps of Richard Strauss, and have been members of that strenuous band which is preaching in Germany the Gospel of "the music of the future," is Hermann Bischoff, of Munich. Mr. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confessedly has been able to find out very little about Bischoff, except the fact that he is a young man and lives in Munich, and has written a symphony in B major, which will be the particular work on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The symphony had its first performance a year ago at the meeting of the Ton Kunster Versammlung, in Essen, in the Spring of 1906, and it has been played several times since then in Germany, but because of its enormous technical difficulties it has not yet become generally known. It had its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4, and an idea of its difficulty may be had from the fact that Dr. Muck and the orchestra started its rehearsals three weeks ago. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor, and the final number will be Chabrier's brilliant Rhapsody Espana.

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 4- 1908

A MONG the younger Germans whose discipleship of Richard Strauss is more or less pronounced, and who are now making in Germany the musical history of the day must be included Herman Bischoff, of Munich. The F Major Symphony by the latter will be the feature of the Boston Symphony concert tomorrow night. Philip Hale, who furnishes the programme notes for the programme books, confesses that he has been able to learn little of Mr. Bischoff except solitary isolated items that he is still young and claims Munich as his home. If Mr. Hale does not know it, it is certain that no one else does except the composer himself, and as yet he is biographically noncommittal. The Symphony had its first performance in the spring of 1906 at a meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung in Essen. Technically difficult, it has not yet been generally played, the American premiere taking place on Friday last in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play the second pianoforte concerto by MacDowell, the concert to conclude with the Chabrier Rhapsody Espana.

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 4- 1908

Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert next Monday evening, will render MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Hermann Bischoff's in E major. The symphony was played for the first time in the spring of 1906, and its first American performance a year ago in Boston.

But little is known of the composer, except that he is a young man who lives in Munich and has written a symphony worthy of production by the world's leading orchestras. It is so difficult that Dr. Muck has had his orchestra rehearsing it for three weeks past.

LETTRE DE BOSTON

(De notre correspondant spécial)

Le concert du 23 novembre dernier, 6e de la saison du Boston-Symphony, avait pour principal attrait la 1re audition du Poème Païen, de M. Loeffler dont le Boston-Symphony avait déjà fait entendre d'autres compositions sous la direction de M. Gericke, prédécesseur du chef actuel, M. Muck de Berlin. La brochure-programme de l'érudit Philip Hale, nous informe que ce Poème Païen fût écrit en 1901, par M. Loeffler, pour piano, deux flûtes, hautbois, clarinette, cor anglais, deux cors, trois trompettes derière la scène, alto et contre-basse ; puis arrangé pour deux pianos et trois trompettes et fut exécuté sous cette dernière forme à Boston en 1903. En 1905 et 1906, l'œuvre fut complètement transformée et traitée plus symphoniquement ; elle est maintenant pour orchestre complet comprenant les cymbales antiques plus un piano.

Il est heureux que M. Loeffler ait fait cette transformation, car il a trouvé dans l'emploi de ses éléments d'orchestre des moyens d'expression dont il a su tirer d'excellents effets. L'œuvre est solide, son architecture bien combinée, et quoiqu'on n'y découvre pas l'étincelle d'un génie novateur, elle fourmille d'heureuses combinaisons de timbres, qui en font une composition bien personnelle et traitée de main de maître ; l'on y sent l'effort dramatique, qui parvient à émouvoir l'auditoire et si M. Loeffler avait la chance de mettre la main sur un livret convenant à ses moyens nul doute qu'il réussirait à doter la scène d'un chef-d'œuvre de plus. Dans l'exécution du Poème Païen, le Boston-Symphony fut digne de la réputation que lui a valu M. Gericke par son souci de la parfaite sonorité, sa volonté, sa persévérance pendant les années qu'il fût à la tête de cet orchestre. L'œuvre est dédiée à Gustave Schirmer, l'éditeur artiste, récemment décédé, à qui nous devons les représentations de Pelléas et Mélisande, Louise, Thaïs, au Manhattan Opera House de New-York, pour cette saison. Le concert avait commencé par l'Ouverture du Roi d'Ys, conduite bien mollement par M. Muck, qui sans doute réservait ses efforts pour la pièce suivante. Dans le solo de clarinette, Grisez nous a rappelé son père ; M. Warnké eut pu faire davantage plaisir avec son violoncelle, s'il n'avait pas abusé des glissandos. La toute petite phrase du hautbois du début fut un charme trop court, elle avait pour interprète Georges Longy, un hautboiste, comme il n'en existe pas toujours un par génération. Quand donc un auteur écrira-t-il à son intention une pièce orchestrale ? Espana de Chabrier, pleine de verve et de richesse d'instrumentation terminait le concert.

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 9- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra will come to Columbus the 30th of this month, and their concert will be an event that no music lover will want to miss. This will probably be the last chance to hear the orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Hermann Bischoff. Symphony in E major.
MacDowell. Concerto No. 2, in D minor. Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Dvorak. Overture. "Carnaval."

It was a piccolo night! Never did that imp of the orchestra hold such continuous high carnival. The piccolo-player must be nursing his worn-out lungs today. Bischoff's Symphony might almost be called a piccolo concerto. Yet this new composer had a good deal to say for himself in his debut. He has the defect of painting almost everything scarlet, and he has that awful modern fault of length. Tonorrhoea is a new disease which seems to have fastened upon most of the composers of the modern school. Yet almost every one of the latter day composers is as good in scoring as Wagner or Berlioz was. It is a "metier" which Strauss, Mahler, Weingartner, Bischoff, Loeffler, Van der Stucken, in short all the modern men of prominence, possess.

Of course, therefore, Bischoff's symphony was a very heavy and difficult score, and equally of course it was more than an hour long. It began with a picture of dissipation of the bacchanalian type, something that seemed as graphic a picture of German student life as Murger's "Vie de Boheme" of the Quartier Latin of Paris. Spite of its prolixity (it was about half an hour in length) this movement must be called a very successful number. It is a graphic picture, drawn with a sure touch, even if it omitted to portray the "Katzenjammer," the grey misery of the morning after. Almost every measure in it was riotous and exciting, and Bischoff was not ugly or dissonant even in the midst of the tumult; he did not disdain melody nor did he scorn to be intelligible. There are few composers who could have been so long-winded without becoming tiresome. The piccolo began its shieking almost at once, and kept it up interminably. It was soon evident that the Munich bars do not close at 11 p.m. One could not help wishing that the composer had laid on his scarlet a little less thickly.

The slow movement receded a trifle from the extreme modern vein. It had two frankly melodic themes and there was a convincing vigor in its development and a tranquility at its end that were peculiarly attractive.

The third movement took the place of a Scherzo, although it was rather grotesque than playful. It was rather "Peer Gynt-y" in its progressions, but not in the least plagiarized; the work is original enough from beginning to end. The omnipresent piccolo, which has been momentarily quiet during the second movement, here renewed its yelling, and there were many orchestral oddities and explosions. The trombones were pushed to the headache point in this movement. The performance of this was so brilliant that Dr. Muck and the orchestra (which rose in response) were applauded most vigorously.

The only bit of moderation in the whole symphony was the tempo mark of the finale,—"Allegro Moderato". Again piccolo, trombones, trumpets, kettle-drums, etc., were let loose; again the whole pepper-box was thrown into the dish to spice it up. We must condemn the length.—when will a modern dare to write a symphony as short as Beethoven's eighth again? We can only censure the extreme boisterousness of the work. Yet with it all we feel that this Bischoff may have something to say later on. He is, to us, more like Mahler than like Richard Strauss. But he is likely to grow yet greater. Parts of this symphony are so frankly "canaille" that their very vulgarity becomes interesting and attractive.

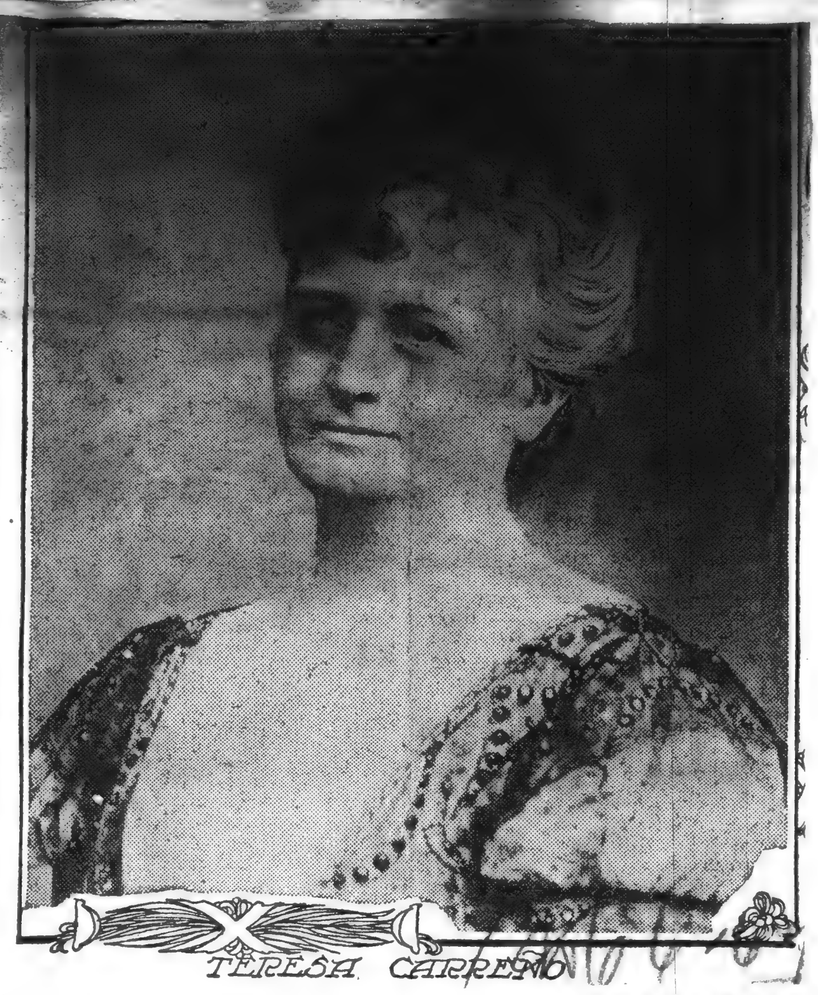
Then came the real triumph of the concert. Teresa Carreno and the MacDowell concerto! There was nothing blatant here, nothing sensational or eccentric. The scoring is for the ordinary orchestra of Beethoven's day (with trombones) the form is clear, and the whole work scarcely as large as Bischoff's first movement. Yet one felt immediately the intrinsic superiority of the school. It also has the advantage of growing continuously stronger to its very end. The contrasts of the concerto are very effective. There was nothing in the entire symphony so beautiful as the subordinate theme of the first movement or the archness and delicacy of the entire second movement of this concerto.

But the most impressive part of the work is the beginning of the finale. Here the first theme (of the opening movement) returns and there is a dramatic sense of brooding and foreboding that becomes doubly pathetic in view of the history of the composer. The breadth of the martial theme of the finale (the "Seitensatz") was enormously impressive (even without any piccolo and "fortissssissimo" effects) and the final wild rush of piano scales and the abrupt close were exciting and effective.

But it takes a Carreno to bring out the abandon and fire of the work. The overwhelming triumph of Teresa Carreno at this concert is the more remarkable when we remember that we had had the greatest season of piano-playing in Boston's musical history before she came. To give the list of the great pianists who have played in Boston this season would be to publish a short musical directory. Yet the last here became first and the success of the tropical pianist was worthy of her great reputation. She has not lost an iota of the brilliant impetuosity that of old carried her audiences off their feet. She has been called "The Lioness of the Piano," and she deserves the title today more than ever. The concerto became, what it should be, an emotional poem, because of the freedom and elasticity with which she gave it. The great technique of the artist became but the means to an end; one did not think of difficulties, of technical points, but every auditor gave himself up to the charm of the tone-poem. At the close Mme. Carreno was recalled over and over again; we lost the count of the number of her reappearances in response to the interminable applause.

Then came more "Carnival". Did not Dr. Muck think that we had dissipated enough in the first jamboree? Did we need Dvorak's frolic after Bischoff's debauch? Was it necessary to have Slibovitzka after Nordhaeuser? However this may be, the piccolo again had a little final shrieking, and we must state here that the instrument was particularly well-played throughout all the evening. There were a few quiet moments in the "Carnival" for which we were grateful. The violins, too, in this Carnival did fine work in the high [illegible]. A few reminiscences of Wagner [illegible] may be forgiven.

Louis C. Elson.



TERESA CARRENO

AMONG the younger Germans whose discipleship of Richard Strauss is more or less pronounced, and who are now making in Germany the musical history of the day must be included Herman Bischoff, of Munich. The F Major Symphony by the latter will be the feature of the Boston Symphony concert tomorrow night. Philip Hale, who furnishes the programme notes for the programme books, confesses that he has been able to learn little of Mr. Bischoff except solitary isolated items that he is still young and claims Munich as his home. If Mr. Hale does not know it, it is certain that no one else does except the composer himself, and as yet he is biographically noncommittal. The Symphony had its first performance in the spring of 1906 at a meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung in Essen. Technically difficult, it has not yet been generally played, the American premiere taking place on Friday last in Boston. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play the second pianoforte concerto by MacDowell, the concert to conclude with the Chabrier Rhapsody Espana.

Among the younger Germans who have been following more or less in the footsteps of Richard Strauss, and have been members of that strenuous band which is preaching in Germany the Gospel of "the music of the future," is Hermann Bischoff, of Munich. Mr. Philip Hale, the learned annotator of the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confessedly has been able to find out very little about Bischoff, except the fact that he is a young man and lives in Munich, and has written a symphony in B major, which will be the particular work on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The symphony had its first performance a year ago at the meeting of the Ton Kunster Versammlung, in Essen, in the Spring of 1906, and it has been played several times since then in Germany, but because of its enormous technical difficulties it has not yet become generally known. It had its first performances in America in Boston on January 3 and 4, and an idea of its difficulty may be had from the fact that Dr. Muck and the orchestra started its rehearsals three weeks ago. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor, and the final number will be Chabrier's brilliant Rhapsody Espana.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert next Monday evening, will render MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Hermann Bischoff's in E major. The symphony was played for the first time in the spring of 1906, and its first American performance a year ago in Boston.

But little is known of the composer, except that he is a young man who lives in Munich and has written a symphony worthy of production by the world's leading orchestras. It is so difficult that Dr. Muck has had his orchestra rehearsing it for three weeks past.

BUCLETINN

JAN 4- 1908

As the soloist of the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert, at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, Mme. Teresa Carenno, the distinguished French pianist, will play MacDowell's second concerto in D-minor. The principal orchestral number will be Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E-major, said to be a work of immense difficulty. Bischoff is a young man at present living in Munich, and his symphony had its first performance a year ago at the meeting of the Ton Kunstler Versammlung in Essen, and has been played several times since in Germany, but because of its immense technical demands has not become generally known. It was first given in America in Boston, this week. The final number on Monday evening's program will be Chabrier's brilliant "Rhapsody Espana."

—o—

Le COURRIER de la PRESSE
A. GALLOIS & CH. DEMOGEOT
21, BOULEVARD MONTMARTRE. PARIS
FOURNIT COUPURES DE JOURNAUX & DE REVUES SUR TOUS SUJETS & PERSONNALITÉS

Journal : [illegible]

Date : 1 DÉCEMBRE 1907

Adresse : [illegible]

Signé : [illegible]

JOURNAL

JAN 4- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Tickets are also on sale for the local engagement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be heard here on the 30th. Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor of this famous organization. Columbus is fortunate in the promise of so much good music.

ablished: London, 1881; New York, 188

JAN 5- 1908

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night will be exceedingly interesting. The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who is in this city after an absence of several years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor. The last number will be the Spanish Rhapsody of Chabrier. The programme, in full, is as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Op. 73. .....Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte in D Minor, No. 2. Op. 23. .....MacDowell
Rhapsody Espana .....Chabrier

1884

EDWARD MACDOWELL,
The American composer whose Piano Concerto No. 2 will be played by Mme. Teresa Carreno.

JAN 5- 1908

With the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon the corner of the season will be turned and the end of the musical year will come in sight. It seems to pass very quickly after the holidays, and before one is fully aware of it, the season will be over and the musicians will be making plans for 1908-1909.

The orchestra will offer at this concert the second of its great piano soloists, this time Madame Teresa Carreno, who holds as surely today as ever in her career the undisputed position as the first woman pianist in the world.

LETTRE DE BOSTON

(De notre correspondant spécial)

Le concert du 23 novembre dernier, 6e de la saison du Boston-Symphony, avait pour principal attrait la re audition du Poème Païen, de M. Loeffler dont le Boston-Symphony avait déjà fait entendre d'autres compositions sous la direction de M. Gericke, prédécesseur du chef actuel, M. Muck de Berlin. La brochure-programme de l'érudit Philip Hale, nous informe que ce Poème Païen fût écrit en 1901, par M. Loeffler, pour piano, deux flûtes, hautbois, clarinette, cor anglais, deux cors, trois trompettes derrière la scène, alto et contre-basse ; puis arrangé pour deux pianos et trois trompettes et fut exécuté sous cette dernière forme à Boston en 1903. En 1905 et 1906, l'œuvre fut complètement transformée et traitée plus symphoniquement ; elle est maintenant pour orchestre complet comprenant les cymbales antiques plus un piano.

Il est heureux que M. Loeffler ait fait cette transformation, car il a trouvé dans l'emploi de ses éléments d'orchestre des moyens d'expression dont il a su tirer d'excellents effets. L'œuvre est solide, son architecture bien combinée, et quoiqu'on n'y découvre pas l'étincelle d'un génie novateur, elle fourmille d'heureuses combinaisons de timbres, qui en font une composition bien personnelle et traitée de main de maître ; l'on y sent l'effort dramatique, qui parvient à émouvoir l'auditoire et si M. Loeffler avait la chance de mettre la main sur un livret convenant à ses moyens nul doute qu'il réussirait à doter la scène d'un chef-d'œuvre de plus. Dans l'exécution du Poème Païen, le Boston-Symphony fut digne de la réputation que lui a valu M. Gericke par son souci de la parfaite sonorité, sa volonté, sa persévérance pendant les années qu'il fût à la tête de cet orchestre. L'œuvre est dédiée à Gustave Schirmer, l'éditeur artiste, récemment décédé, à qui nous devons les représentations de Pelléas et Mélisande, Louise, Thaïs, au Manhattan Opera House de New-York, pour cette saison. Le concert avait commencé par l'Ouverture du Roi d'Ys, conduite bien mollement par M. Muck, qui sans doute réservait ses efforts pour la pièce suivante. Dans le solo de clarinette, Grisez nous a rappelé son père ; M. Warnké eut pu faire davantage plaisir avec son violoncelle, s'il n'avait pas abusé des glissandos. La toute petite phrase du hautbois du début fut un charme trop court, elle avait pour interprète Georges Longy, un hautboiste, comme il n'en existe pas toujours un par génération. Quand donc un auteur écrira-t-il à son intention une pièce orchestrale ? Espana de Chabrier, pleine de verve et de richesse d'instrumentation terminait le concert.

JOURNAL

JAN 5- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra will come to Columbus the 30th of this month, and their concert will be an event that no music lover will want to miss. This will probably be the last chance to hear the orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 5- 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A large and representative audience of society and musical people was present in Infantry Hall at the second Symphony concert Tuesday night. In the gathering were noted the following: Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise Heppin, Miss Louise Sweetland, Miss Sarah Anthony, Miss Isabel Pegram, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Miss Emma Taft, Mrs. Theodore Bogert, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Mrs. Harriett Hazard, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Miss Evangeline Larry, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Emerson, the Misses Cranston, Mrs. William Binney, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles North, Mr. Edwin Barrows, Miss Mary Barrows, Mrs. George Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mrs. Webster Knight, Mrs. I. Gifford Ladd, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, the Misses Collins, Mrs. Robert Steere, Miss Rachel Steere, Miss May Talbot, Miss Harriett Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mr. Alfred Stone, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Miss Elizabeth Brown, Miss Annie Cooke Cushing, Prof. John Greene, Miss Gertrude Swarts and Mrs. Shepardson March, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marian Brown, Col. Harvey A. Baker, Hon. William B. Weeden, Mrs. William Wagar Weeden, Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Miss M. Helen Potter, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Lorraine Johnson, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Louis L. Angell, Miss Edith Angell, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. Harold Cranshaw, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mrs. Charles A. Russell, Miss Charlotte Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. George C. Arnold, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 5- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Some of the Baltimore patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be of the opinion that Dr. Muck has been too generous in the matter of novelties he has presented at the concerts of the orchestra in this city. Anyone who has the making of programs in ever "betwixt the devil and the deep sea." If he does not give novelties he is likely to be cursed, and if he does give novelties the same fate usually awaits him, and all he can do is to stand the blows with becoming patience. Those who do not care for novelties will have no bone to pick with the third program the Boston Symphony will play here on next Wednesday night in the Lyric. The first number is the most popular and best beloved of Brahm's four symphonies, that in D major, No. 2. Even the most ardent anti-Brahmsians have never been able to find fault with this work, and its performance by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck this year has been one of the features of the season, as the performance of the first symphony last year was, for Dr. Muck seems to have found the real spirit of Brahms as no one else in America ever did.

The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who is in this city after an absence of several years, and judging from accounts of her playing in the Middle West, where her season began, her art is more beautiful than it ever has been in the past, which is saying much, because Madame Carreno has held her position as one of the few great pianists of our time for many years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor.

The last number will be the brilliant and popular Spanish "Rhapsody of Chabrier." The program in full is as follows:

Brahms—Symphony, No. 2, in D major. Op. 73.

MacDowell—Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 2. Op. 23.

Chabrier—"Rhapsody Espana."

Soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, from W. E. Walter's Symphony Hall, Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 5- 1908

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

Some of the Baltimore patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be of the opinion that Dr. Muck has been too generous in the number of novelties he has presented at the concerts of the orchestra in this city. Those who do not care for novelties will have no bone to pick with the third program the Boston Symphony will play here Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

The first number is the most popular and best beloved of Brahm's four symphonies—that in D major, No. 2. Its performance by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck this year has been one of the features of the season, as the performance of the first symphony last year was.

The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will visit Baltimore after an absence of several years. Judging from accounts of her playing in the Middle West, where her season began, her art is more beautiful than it ever has been in the past, which is saying much, because Mme. Carreno has held her position as one of the few great pianists of our time for many years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor.

For the last number there will be the brilliant and popular Spanish rhapsody of Chabrier.

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

So many requests are coming in for reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, that Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, announces that she will receive and fill mail orders in advance of the general sale. Such orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a novel and very beautiful programme. This will be Buffalo's first and only opportunity for hearing the Boston men under the magnetic baton of the conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck came over here by special permission of the Kaiser and has done wonders with the clebrated orchestra. The soloist will be Dr. Carl Wendling, the new concertmeister of the orchestra, who is over from Stuttgart for one year during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. He is one of Europe's greatest violinists and is here for this season only.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

Interest is widespread in the coming to Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting, and Prof. Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the famous violinist, as soloist. Prof. Wendling is here for one year only, acting as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Willy Hess. Dr. Muck is in America only by special permission of the Kaiser and this will be his last year with the Boston men, so that Buffalo will welcome two of Europe's greatest musicians when the Boston orchestra comes to town.

There have been so many advance requests for seats that Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, announces that she will receive and fill mail orders before the opening of the general sale. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place.

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 7- 1908

A NEW SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Plays Work by Hermann Bischoff.

Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave us a real musical novelty at the Academy of Music last evening, when the piece de resistance on the program was a symphony in E Major by the German composer, Hermann Bischoff. Concerning Bischoff's personality there is little known in this country, save that his home is in Munich and that he has been intimately associated musically with Richard Strauss. Yet the Strauss influence is not unduly in evidence in this new symphony. That the work is of the extreme modern school there can be no doubt, but there is in it no striking after grotesque effects in orchestration. To a certain extent it is programmusic, as the composer himself asserts that in writing it he had in his mind the story of a young man who, after a life of debauchery, became acquainted with pure happiness when he was no longer worthy nor able to possess it.

The first movement, therefore, represents this wild life. Through it goes the echo of the waltz and the strains of bacchic revelry. But despite the melodiousness of its themes, this movement has a tawdriness about it quite absent from the succeeding movements, which are beautiful examples of symphonic writing, the second movement, "Sehr ruhig und getragen," particularly being an exquisite bit of music in almost a religious mood. This symphony of Bischoff's is long—it took an hour and a quarter to play it—but it is one that will bear rehearing many times.

Teresa Carreno, who has not been heard here for a number of years, was the soloist last evening, being heard in a concerto in D. Minor for pianoforte and orchestra, by MacDowell. Mme. Carreno's playing is marked by a force which is best described as masculine. But there is a certain coldness about her playing which even her brilliancy of execution does not cover.

There were only three numbers on the program, the concert concluding with a Spanish rhapsody by Chabrier.

GLOBE—JANUARY 12, 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra returns today from New York after its third regular trip, but its stay in Boston will be brief, because on Jan 26 it leaves for the annual trip in the middle west. Dr Muck's 12th program, to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has a novelty on it, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's three German dances, which strangely enough seem never to have been played in Boston. The other numbers are Haydn's symphony in G major and Beethoven's symphony, No. 4.

106

TIMES,
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

In the Musical World

Never in its history has there been such a demand as this year for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th. The Boston men, under the magnetic baton of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, are sweeping everything before them and C. A. Ellis, the manager, is unable to fill all the engagements that are asked for. As it is, he has allowed the men to be away from Boston more than residents of that city like, and no further engagements will be made for the Boston players this season except in their home city. Buffalo is indeed fortunate to have them. The soloist at the January concert will be Professor Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, one of Europe's most famous violinists, who has been granted a year's leave of absence from Stuttgart to act as a concertmeister with the Boston orchestra during this season. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, lacal manager for the Boston Orchestra, has received many requests for seat reservations and she therefore announces that she will fill mail orders before the opening of the general sale. These orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

TELEGRAPH
JAN 7- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

In Programme of Modern Music, with Manlo Carreno as Soloist.

A thoroughly modern programme was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a large audience at the Academy of Music last night, opening with a work by Bischoff hitherto unknown here. The composer himself is not widely known in this country, though he has been steadily gaining ground in Germany for some years past. He is of the new school of the younger set, and this last great work of his may be called the "dumier on" in music, somewhat influenced by Richard Strauss, with whom the author has been intimate, but restrained by a more controlled and less evventric temperament. Following so closely on the Berlioz "Symphony Fantastique" that was given here last week by our orchestra, this symphony of Bischoff's which he designates simply by letter, "E major," offers very interesting analogies and comparisons, being closely allied in subject. Berlioz insisted upon an understanding of the literary character of his work before attempting to listen to the musical expression of his ideas. Bischoff, on the contrary, publishes no explanatory progarmme with his score. Still he admits that all music must have some programme meaning if it is to represent any thought at all, so he issued a statement of his ideas to the effect that his intention was to represent the career of a wild, dissolute youth who "becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it, and therefore cannot possess it." He seeks in vain for peace, at first in more orgies, then in quiet resignation, from which he is tormented by the "ghosts of his misspent youth."

In the Berlioz shymphony, as will be remembered, the youth in question was supposed to be dying for love bgy morphine poisoning, and the music presents his delirious dreams. Naturally, therefore, it is disjointed and more or less scrappy, though beautiful in places. The Bischoff symphony, however, has more continuity of thought and expression, and for that reason is perhaps more impressive, although actually it is not so rich in musical invention, and at times is too long drawn out. Of course it was played magnificently—that goes without saying, but really the Bostonians seemed to outdo their own record last night for wonderful ensemble work.

The same might be said for the solo work of Mme. Correno, who gave MacDowell's Concerto No. 2, D minor. Possibly her recent meeting with her once brilliant pupil may have added a touch of emotion to her rendering of his composition, for certainly her playing was something truly marvellous. She has all possible requirements for a great artist, and his them to the thirty-third degree, and they all showed forth superbly last night.

The closing number was a Spanish Rhapsody by Chabrier that came almost as a shock at first, so close to "band concert" rag-time is it in effect, until one realizes that it is a series of studies characteristic typical Spanish melodies, strung together with a syncopated accompaniment. Even then, thaking it as seriously as possible, it seems a bit "jiggy" for the Boston Orchestra. The next concert by this orchestra will occur on February 17.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CONTRACTOR
JAN 7- 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, promises a very novel program when the Boston men visit this city. Dr. Muck has secured splendid results with this famous organization, which has eclipsed all its previous records during the two seasons he has been the conductor. This is Dr. Muck's last year in Boston, as, by command of the Kaiser, he must return next year to the Royal Opera in Berlin. The solist will be Prof. Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concertmeister of the Boston Orchestra, who is in America on a year's leave of absence, and is one of the greatest violin virtuosi that Europe can produce.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that she will receive mail orders for seats in advance of the general sale. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
JAN 7- 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Doctor Muck Presents Symphony by a Contemporary Composer.

Doctor Muck and the Boston Orchestra presented last night for the first time here a symphony by a contemporary composer, to the unlimited scandal of those who believe that music, to be good, must creep and cling like ivy to an old fortress, and no less to the edification of those curious to know what their children will probably accept complacently and their great-grandchildren patronize as astonishingly good, considering it is early 20th century.

Between these two extremes there were many in the audience to listen with pleasurable attention for more than an hour to the symphony's unfoldment and then to recall Doctor Muck thrice in recognition of his efforts to keep us in touch with what men of the present are doing.

Hermann Bischoff, the composer, is one of the few men of today who have been strong enough to dive through the crest of the Wagnerian tidal wave and swim on the unsounded depths of the open sea, while the majority of their confreres are content to be carried by the strength of the wave rather than by their own stroke. Confessedly a disciple of Richard Strauss, Bischoff has an intellectuality strong enough to refuse domination by any mind, however masterly. Like Peer Gynt, he would be "emperor of himself," and certain episodes last night suggested that also like the Norse hero, this individuality if not curbed may land him, artistically speaking, in the madhouse at Cairo.

At present, however, Bischoff offers music that is of splendid and red-blooded vitality, markedly original, even to the point of the eccentric, but generous to excess. The latter is the quality most fruitful of criticism. Having put all he had to say into two first movements of exceptional beauty, filled with fascinating rhythm and shot through and through with melodies of fire, Mr. Bischoff proceeds to repeat himself at considerable length until his warmest admirer reaches a point when chromatic scales and unusual sounds from "the little man in the tin shop" cease to compel.

The wealth of orchestration is so ultra modern that a perusal of the literary programme furnished by the composer will surprise by its conservatism. Avoiding modern pessimism, Mr. Bischoff falls into poetic sentimentality, his choice for prolonged exposition of anarchistic nature of the theme of the Woman Soul which leads upward and on being sufficient to convince the public that he is young without Philip Hale's assurance. The symphony suffers from an overelaboration that is characteristic of contemporary music, which, in contrast to the other arts wherein the present struggle is for greater simplification of means, invents new instruments and new kinds of sound to make a noise, joyful or otherwise, before the people.

Amid the glorious harmonic tangle in which he became involved last night Mr. Bischoff may yet find himself and his second symphony among the distinguished events of the time. It is not music for the superman, like that of poor Anton Bruckner, but music intensely human, intensely living, intensely earnest.

The return of Teresa Carreno as soloist was accompanied by great enthusiasm. As if in gentle rebuke to our own neglect of the most significant voice American music has yet found, she played MacDowell's second concerto in D minor with an assured mastership and a grandeur of style well suited to the dignity of the music she set herself to interpret. There was little of the distinctly temperamental about her rendition; the music made no demand for it, but technical command and beauty of tone were present for the inspiration of those who listened. The concert closed with Chabrier's fascinating "Espana" rhapsody, played beyond criticism.

American Jan. 5
N. Y.

MME. CARRENO IS TO BE HEARD THIS WEEK

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the season's third Brooklyn philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening is the time and the Baptist Temple the setting. Dr. Karl Mack, as usual, will conduct.

This will be the programme:

Symphony, No. 2, in D major Op. 73....Brahms
Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino, Allegro con spirito.

Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 23.....Edward MacDowell
Larghetto calmato, Presto giocoso, Largo, Molto Allegro.

Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage".....Humperdinck

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A large and representative audience of society and musical people was present in Infantry Hall at the second Symphony concert Tuesday night. In the gathering were noted the following. Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Louise Hoppin, Miss Louise Sweetland, Miss Sarah Anthony, Miss Isabel Pegram, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Miss Emma Taft, Mrs. Theodore Bogert, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Mrs. Harriett Hazard, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Miss Evangeline Larry, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Miss Emerson, the Misses Cranston, Mrs. William Binney, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles North, Mr. Edwin Barrows, Miss Mary Barrows, Mrs. George Corliss, Miss Corliss, Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mrs. Webster Knight, Mrs. I. Gifford Ladd, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, the Misses Collins, Mrs. Robert Steere, Miss Rachel Steere, Miss May Talbot, Miss Harriett Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mr. Alfred Stone, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Miss Elizabeth Brown, Miss Annie Cooke Cushing, Prof. John Greene, Miss Gertrude Swarts and Mrs. Shepardson March, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marian Brown, Col. Harvey A. Baker, Hon. William B. Weeden, Mrs. William Wagar Weeden, Mrs. Ralph C. Watrous, Miss M. Helen Potter, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Lorraine Johnson, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Louis L. Angell, Miss Edith Angell, Mr. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. Harold Cranshaw, Miss Edith Nichols, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mrs. Charles A. Russell, Miss Charlotte Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. George C. Arnold, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Some of the Baltimore patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be of the opinion that Dr. Muck has been too generous in the matter of novelties he has presented at the concerts of the orchestra in this city. Anyone who has the making of programs is ever "betwixt the devil and the deep sea." If he does not give novelties he is likely to be cursed, and if he does give novelties the same fate usually awaits him, and all he can do is to stand the blows with becoming patience. Those who do not care for novelties will have no bone to pick with the third program the Boston Symphony will play here on next Wednesday night in the Lyric. The first number is the most popular and best beloved of Brahm's four symphonies, that in D major, No. 2. Even the most ardent anti-Brahmsians have never been able to find fault with this work, and its performance by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck this year has been one of the features of the season, as the performance of the first symphony last year was, for Dr. Muck seems to have found the real spirit of Brahms as no one else in America ever did.

The soloist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who is in this city after an absence of several years, and judging from accounts of her playing in the Middle West, where her season began, her art is more beautiful than it ever has been in the past, which is saying much, because Madame Carreno has held her position as one of the few great pianists of our time for many years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor.

The last number will be the brilliant and popular Spanish "Rhapsody of Chabrier." The program in full is as follows:

Brahms—Symphony, No. 2, in D major. Op. 73.
MacDowell—Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 2. Op. 23.
Chabrier—"Rhapsody Espana."

Soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, from W. E. Walter's Symphony Hall, Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

Some of the Baltimore patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be of the opinion that Dr. Muck has been too generous in the number of novelties he has presented at the concerts of the orchestra in this city. Those who do not care for novelties will have no bone to pick with the third program the Boston Symphony will play here Wednesday evening at the Lyric.

The first number is the most popular and best beloved of Brahm's four symphonies—that in D major, No. 2. Its performance by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Muck this year has been one of the features of the season, as the performance of the first symphony last year was.

The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will visit Baltimore after an absence of several years. Judging from accounts of her playing in the Middle West, where her season began, her art is more beautiful than it ever has been in the past, which is saying much, because Mme. Carreno has held her position as one of the few great pianists of our time for many years. She will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte in D minor.

For the last number there will be the brilliant and popular Spanish rhapsody of Chabrier.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

So many requests are coming in for reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, that Mrs. Maj Davis Smith, the local manager, announces that she will receive and fill mail orders in advance of the general sale. Such orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a novel and very beautiful programme. This will be Buffalo's first and only opportunity for hearing the Boston men under the magnetic baton of the conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck came over here by special permission of the Kaiser and has done wonders with the clebrated orchestra. The soloist will be Dr. Carl Wendling, the new concertmeister of the orchestra, who is over from Stuttgart for one year during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. He is one of Europe's greatest violinists and is here for this season only.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

Interest is widespread in the coming to Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting, and Prof. Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the famous violinist, as soloist. Prof. Wendling is here for one year only, acting as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Willy Hess. Dr. Muck is in America only by special permission of the Kaiser and this will be his last year with the Boston men, so that Buffalo will welcome two of Europe's greatest musicians when the Boston orchestra comes to town.

There have been so many advance requests for seats that Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, announces that she will receive and fill mail orders before the opening of the general sale. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place.

JAN 7-

A NEW SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Plays Work by Hermann Bischoff.

Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave us a real musical novelty at the Academy of Music last evening, when the piece de resistance on the program was a symphony in E Major by the German composer, Hermann Bischoff. Concerning Bischoff's personality there is little known in this country, save that his home is in Munich and that he has been intimately associated musically with Richard Strauss. Yet the Strauss influence is not unduly in evidence in this new symphony. That the work is of the extreme modern school there can be no doubt, but there is in it no striking after grotesque effects in orchestration. To a certain extent it is programmusic, as the composer himself asserts that in writing it he had in his mind the story of a young man who, after a life of debauchery, became acquainted with pure happiness when he was no longer worthy nor able to possess it.

The first movement, therefore, represents this wild life. Through it goes the echo of the waltz and the strains of bacchic revelry. But despite the melodiousness of its themes, this movement has a tawdriness about it quite absent from the succeeding movements, which are beautiful examples of symphonic writing, the second movement, "Sehr ruhig und getragen," particularly being an exquisite bit of music in almost a religious mood. This symphony of Bischoff's is long—it took an hour and a quarter to play it—but it is one that will bear rehearing many times.

Teresa Carreno, who has not been heard here for a number of years, was the soloist last evening, being heard in a concerto in D. Minor for pianoforte and orchestra, by MacDowell. Mme. Carreno's playing is marked by a force which is best described as masculine. But there is a certain coldness about her playing which even her brilliancy of execution does not cover.

There were only three numbers on the program, the concert concluding with a Spanish rhapsody by Chabrier.

GLOBE—JANUARY 12, 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra returns today from New York after its third regular trip, but its stay in Boston will be brief, because on Jan 26 it leaves for the annual trip in the middle west. Dr Muck's 12th program, to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has a novelty on it, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's three German dances, which strangely enough seem never to have been played in Boston. The other numbers are Haydn's symphony in G major and Beethoven's symphony, No. 4.

[106]

BUFFALO TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 5- 1908

In the Musical World

Never in its history has there been such a demand as this year for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th. The Boston men, under the magnetic baton of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, are sweeping everything before them and C. A. Ellis, the manager, is unable to fill all the engagements that are asked for. As it is, he has allowed the men to be away from Boston more than residents of that city like, and no further engagements will be made for the Boston players this season except in their home city. Buffalo is indeed fortunate to have them. The soloist at the January concert will be Professor Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, one of Europe's most famous violinists, who has been granted a year's leave of absence from Stuttgart to act as a concertmeister with the Boston orchestra during this season. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, lacal manager for the Boston Orchestra, has received many requests for seat reservations and she therefore announces that she will fill mail orders before the opening of the general sale. These orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

In Programme of Modern Music, with Manlo Carreno as Soloist.

A thoroughly modern programme was offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a large audience at the Academy of Music last night, opening with a work by Bischoff hitherto unknown here. The composer himself is not widely known in this country, though he has been steadily gaining ground in Germany for some years past. He is of the new school of the younger set, and this last great work of his may be called the "dumier on" in music, somewhat influenced by Richard Strauss, with whom the author has been intimate, but restrained by a more controlled and less evventric temperament. Following so closely on the Berlioz "Symphony Fantastique" that was given here last week by our orchestra, this symphony of Bischoff's which he designates simply by letter, "E major," offers very interesting analogies and comparisons, being closely allied in subject. Berlioz insisted upon an understanding of the literary character of his work before attempting to listen to the musical expression of his ideas. Bischoff, on the contrary, publishes no explanatory progarmme with his score. Still he admits that all music must have some programme meaning if it is to represent any thought at all, so he issued a statement of his ideas to the effect that his intention was to represent the career of a wild, dissolute youth who "becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it, and therefore cannot possess it." He seeks in vain for peace, at first in more orgies, then in quiet resignation, from which he is tormented by the "ghosts of his misspent youth."

In the Berlioz shymphony, as will be remembered, the youth in question was supposed to be dying for love bgy morphine poisoning, and the music presents his delirious dreams. Naturally, therefore, it is disjointed and more or less scrappy, though beautiful in places. The Bischoff symphony, however, has more continuity of thought and expression, and for that reason is perhaps more impressive, although actually it is not so rich in musical invention, and at times is too long drawn out. Of course it was played magnificently—that goes without saying, but really the Bostonians seemed to outdo their own record last night for wonderful ensemble work.

The same might be said for the solo work of Mme. Correno, who gave MacDowell's Concerto No. 2, D minor. Possibly her recent meeting with her once brilliant pupil may have added a touch of emotion to her rendering of his composition, for certainly her playing was something truly marvelous. She has all possible requirements for a great artist, and his them to the thirty-third degree, and they all showed forth superbly last night.

The closing number was a Spanish Rhapsody by Chabrier that came almost as a shock at first, so close to "band concert" rag-time is it in effect, until one realizes that it is a series of studies characteristic typical Spanish melodies, strung together with a syncopated accompaniment. Even then, thaking it as seriously as possible, it seems a bit "jiggy" for the Boston Orchestra. The next concert by this orchestra will occur on February 17.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, promises a very novel program when the Boston men visit this city. Dr. Muck has secured splendid results with this famous organization, which has eclipsed all its previous records during the two seasons he has been the conductor. This is Dr. Muck's last year in Boston, as, by command of the Kaiser, he must return next year to the Royal Opera in Berlin. The solist will be Prof. Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concertmeister of the Boston Orchestra, who is in America on a year's leave of absence, and is one of the greatest violin virtuosi that Europe can produce.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that she will receive mail orders for seats in advance of the general sale. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 7- 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Doctor Muck Presents Symphony by a Contemporary Composer.

Doctor Muck and the Boston Orchestra presented last night for the first time here a symphony by a contemporary composer, to the unlimited scandal of those who believe that music, to be good, must creep and cling like ivy to an old fortress, and no less to the edification of those curious to know what their children will probably accept complacently and their great-grandchildren patronize as astonishingly good, considering it is early 20th century.

Between these two extremes there were many in the audience to listen with pleasurable attention for more than an hour to the symphony's unfoldment and then to recall Doctor Muck thrice in recognition of his efforts to keep us in touch with what men of the present are doing.

Hermann Bischoff, the composer, is one of the few men of today who have been strong enough to dive through the crest of the Wagnerian tidal wave and swim on the unsounded depths of the open sea, while the majority of their confreres are content to be carried by the strength of the wave rather than by their own stroke. Confessedly a disciple of Richard Strauss, Bischoff has an intellectuality strong enough to refuse domination by any mind, however masterly. Like Peer Gynt, he would be "emperor of himself," and certain episodes last night suggested that also like the Norse hero, this individuality if not curbed may land him, artistically speaking, in the madhouse at Cairo.

At present, however, Bischoff offers music that is of splendid and red-blooded vitality, markedly original, even to the point of the eccentric, but generous to excess. The latter is the quality most fruitful of criticism. Having put all he had to say into two first movements of exceptional beauty, filled with fascinating rhythm and shot through and through with melodies of fire, Mr. Bischoff proceeds to repeat himself at considerable length until his warmest admirer reaches a point when chromatic scales and unusual sounds from "the little man in the tin shop" cease to compel.

The wealth of orchestration is so ultra modern that a perusal of the literary programme furnished by the composer will surprise by its conservatism. Avoiding modern pessimism, Mr. Bischoff falls into poetic sentimentality, his choice for prolonged exposition of anarchistic nature of the theme of the Woman Soul which leads upward and on being sufficient to convince the public that he is young without Philip Hale's assurance. The symphony suffers from an overelaboration that is characteristic of contemporary music, which, in contrast to the other arts wherein the present struggle is for greater simplification of means, invents new instruments and new kinds of sound to make a noise, joyful or otherwise, before the people.

Amid the glorious harmonic tangle in which he became involved last night Mr. Bischoff may yet find himself and his second symphony among the distinguished events of the time. It is not music for the superman, like that of poor Anton Bruckner, but music intensely human, intensely living, intensely earnest.

The return of Teresa Carreno as soloist was accompanied by great enthusiasm. As if in gentle rebuke to our own neglect of the most significant voice American music has yet found, she played MacDowell's second concerto in D minor with an assured mastership and a grandeur of style well suited to the dignity of the music she set herself to interpret. There was little of the distinctly temperamental about her rendition; the music made no demand for it, but technical command and beauty of tone were present for the inspiration of those who listened. The concert closed with Chabrier's fascinating "Espana" rhapsody, played beyond criticism.

American Jan-5
n. 4-

MME. CARRENO IS TO BE HEARD THIS WEEK

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the season's third Brooklyn philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening is the time and the Baptist Temple the setting. Dr. Karl Mack, as usual, will conduct.

This will be the programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major Op. 73....Brahms
Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino, Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 23.....Edward MacDowell
Larghetto calmato, Presto giocoso, Largo, Molto Allegro.
Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage" .....Humperdinck

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JAN 7 1908

NEW SYMPHONY GIVES PHILADELPHIANS CHILL

...ly Overrated Boston Orches-tra Heard for Second Time This Season.

NOT A BIT ORIGINAL

SYMPHONIC music of the up-to-date school was heard at the Academy of Music last evening when the much-exploited and much-overrated Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season in Philadelphia. There was a new symphony on tap, distilled from the seething brain of Hermann Bischoff, of Munich, Germany, where art with a sixteen-point A reigns supreme.

It is hardly necessary to affect a critical mood in regard to Mr. Bischoff's symphony. It has pleased Dr. Muck to put the work on the program of a concert given in Philadelphia by the Boston Orchestra, but there is no disposition among Philadelphia concertgoers to follow blindly the lead of this alien annotator of American musical taste.

The audience at the Academy last night didn't like Herr Bischoff's symphony. They had, moreover, excellent reasons therefor—the unfolding of which in these columns would be mere waste of space.

As a composer, Herr Bischoff is an imitator of Richard Strauss, with an added knack of eccentric instrumentation calculated to turn even the audacious Strauss' hair gray. Of original invention the symphony was innocent, but in outlandish combinations of choirs, Herr Bischoff had his German contemporaries beaten a mile.

The veteran Teresa Carreno played delightfully a commonplace concerto by Edward MacDowell, all memory of the composition being lost, as in earlier years, in the magic play of the artist's technique.

Chabrier's "Rhapsodie Espana," which closed the program, was given, evidently, as an example of how not to do it. There was nothing in the entire concert, indeed, which a lover of music could carry away and treasure in memory's chambers.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JAN 7- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Third Concert This Season With Mme. Carreno as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when the feature of the three-number program was a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, a young composer who has taken Richard Strauss for his model and who seems determined to better the instruction and surpass the example of that eccentric and boresome genius.

This symphony is said to embody an attempt to tell the story of a young man's life from the time he starts in to sow his wild oats to the period when in a sobered, chastened and repentant frame of mind he is gathering the crop which customarily attends such sowing. This is a program which has been followed without entirely satisfactory results by composers whose achievements Mr. Bischoff can hardly expect to equal. Smetana, the Bohemian genius who died in a madhouse, wrote a celebrated quartet which he called "Out of My Life," and which he presented to the public as his autobiography, and Hector Berlioz undertook the same kind of thing in a big work which Philadelphia music lovers had an opportunity of hearing no later than last week, and which under the title of "Symphonie Fantastique," illustrates a hasheesh dream of dissipation and its consequences.

It was hardly worth while, as it seemed, to do the thing again and Bischoff's symphony, one of whose principal recommendations is its extreme difficulty, might without any great loss to the world of art have been omitted. There are some good things in it, some developments which are fairly interesting and some climaxes which are moderately effective, and it serves very well to exhibit the capacities of the Boston Orchestra. These, however, no longer need demonstration and when there are so many masterpieces to choose from which one would rather hear the production of a Bischoff symphony at the cost, as the press agent announces, of three weeks' rehearsal, looks like a mistake of judgment. And it played for one hour and a quarter!

The assisting artist was that admirable pianist Madam Teresa Carreno, who had elected to be heard in MacDowell's poetic, graceful, melodious and skillfully constructed concerto in D minor. She played it with consummate refinement, with an absolute mastery of the key board and with an extraordinary eloquence and distinction and again convinced every appreciative hearer that she is one of the five or six greatest pianists of the world. The concert closed with a brilliant rendering of Chabrier's highly colored Spanish rhapsody.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

JAN 10 1908

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is a trite observation, but also a true one (like many of its kind), that we love best the good music with which we are most familiar. It is also a mournful fact that because of the recognition of the old truth those who cater to the public are chary with novelties. We cry for them, but when we get them we find that they are not to our liking. In the case of orchestral music of the large type, the concerts being comparatively few, repetitions are out of the question—at least, in the course of a season—and so we do not learn to love the unfamiliar unless it is of a quite extraordinary excellence. Dr. Muck, with the help of his Boston Orchestra, is offering new things more generously than any of our local concert institutions; and yet it is hard to be grateful to him because the æsthetic principle is as and what it is, and also because the new music that he brings to us has so little that makes an appeal to what may be called our elemental appreciation. Perhaps it is the fault of the woful state into which the art of music has fallen—a state which exalts technical treatment over contents. It is the state which since the world began, not only in music but in all the arts, is consequent upon the high development of virtuososhiip.

At the third concert of the Boston Orchestra last night Dr. Muck brought forward for the first time in New York a symphony in E by a hitherto unknown composer named Hermann Bischoff. It had its first production at one of the German festivals, which are held to give a hearing to such things, a year ago last May. Every year such a festival is held by the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein; a score of new works are brought forward and put down on the records of patient observers like Mr. Hale, of Boston, and then, for the greater part, disappear. As a rule the world does not seem to be much the loser by their disappearance. Once in a long while a good thing survives by virtue of its excellence. Perhaps Bischoff's is one of these good things; but it is to be feared that the repetitions necessary to impress the fact upon the public would entail a great weariness of the flesh in most musical communities. On the first hearing it seems to be another instance of small ideas expanded beyond all reason and beyond ordinary endurance by the composer's capacity and willingness to say the same thing many times in a different orchestral voice. It has one thing in its favor, which is that the composer tries to work with melodies instead of phrases; but, unhappily, his melodies are discursive and lacking in the element of symmetry and reposefulness which many ingenuous lovers of the beautiful stubbornly insist on thinking essential.

There were two other numbers on the programmes—MacDowell's pianoforte concerto in D minor, of which Mme. Carreno played the solo part (with more brilliance and power than poetical feeling), and Dvorak's "Carnival Overture."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JAN 8 1908

HONOR TO MACDOWELL

Washington Audience Testifies to Composer's Worth.

PIANO CONCERTO IN D MINOR

Boston Orchestra Plays Great Musician's Symphony to Brilliant Crowd at National Theater—Mme. Carreno, Soloist, Recalled Eight Times—Individuality Mars Beauty of Brahms' Movement.

For the first time since Edward A. MacDowell, generally considered America's greatest composer, was stricken with an incurable mental malady, one of his larger and more important compositions, the second pianoforte concerto in D minor, was included in the programme of a symphony orchestra in this city. The work was played by Mme. Carreno,—at one time the instructor of Edward MacDowell, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Muck, yesterday at the orchestra's third concert.

The audience was not slow to appreciate the significance of the event, and at the close of the rendition Mme. Carreno was recalled eight times.

The character of the ovation gave proof that the audience was paying this tribute to the composer of the work, and not alone to the artist who performed it. Long after the piano had been closed the applause continued.

The boxes were draped with flags. Four years ago, on the last appearance of Edward MacDowell in this city, an audience of like proportions did honor to the great composer himself at his recital in the Columbia Theater, recalling him at least five times after the performance of his great "Celtic" sonata.

Play Brahms' Symphony.

The other numbers provided at yesterday's concert were the Brahms second symphony in D major and Humperdinck's overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage," which was given for the first time in Washington. There are modernists who still prefer to prolong their melodies beyond two or three measures, and it was from their libraries that Dr. Muck drew all of yesterday's selections. In the first movement of the Brahms symphony there flowed forth smooth, melodious phrases, preponderating in string quality. Admirable as was the ensemble of the first violins, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of its many solo players, is capable of making more pronounced and unanimous effects in the shading and phrasing of the more expressive strains in this movement than they did yesterday. The latitude allowed the first violins in their bowing resulted in a slightly perceptible tendency toward solo effort in this movement and a consequent blurring of the ensemble effect. This was corrected in the succeeding movements of the symphony and in the overture, where the little buzzing motif toward the close was bowed with great care and with excellent results.

Lightness Balances Programme.

The programme had a double share of lightness and humor to counterbalance the more serious moments. In the third movement of the Brahms symphony there was the subtle wit, the unobtrusive spirit of bantering, contrasting strongly with certain measures from Beethoven's symphonies, written with a far broader and more circus-like humor, and therefore less effective. It is said that Brahms is an absolutist in music, but surely if he had no hidden meaning in this movement, the hearer cannot help forming his own story as the music progresses.

The programme notes of the concert, written by Philip Hale, paid a graceful city compliment to Washington by including a review of the "Early Concert Life in America," by Oscar G. Sonneck, of the Library of Congress.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)

Idress .....

JAN 10 1908

New Composer's Work by Boston Symphony

A PUZZLED audience listened to a new symphony last night at Carnegie Hall, when Dr. Muck and the great symphony orchestra from Boston played Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major for the first time. Mr. Bischoff is a present day German composer, with some radical views of composition. 1884

His work required an hour and a quarter for its performance, and the orchestra played the lengthy work with unfailing enthusiasm and power. Despite all their efforts it cannot be said that the work proved popular with the audience. The applause seemed intended for the hard working players and their leader rather than for the composition.

Mme. Teresa Carreno played MacDowell's second concerto in D minor with brilliancy and authority. This most beautiful work of the American master was enthusiastically received.

The programme concluded with the Dvorak carnival overture, brilliantly played.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

JAN 10

CROWDS AT THE SYMPHONY

Mme. Teresa Careno Plays the MacDowell Concerto.

Overture to the "Forced Marriage," Never Before Played in Washington, Is Recited.

One of the largest, as well as one of the most distinguished, audiences which has yet greeted the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was present yesterday when that organization of eminent musicians gave their third matinee at the New National Theater.

The programme was novel, introducing besides Brahms' charming Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73, the overture to the "Forced Marriage," by Humperdinck, which has never before been played in Washington.

Mme. Teresa Careno, the soloist of the performance, gave a thoroughly delightful rendition of MacDowell's Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, D minor, op 23. Her able execution of the animated passages in the second movement were wonderfully done, and at the conclusion of the concert the audience tendered a hearty ovation.

The Brahms' symphony, which is delightfully tender, is of an alternately joyous and serious theme, and the work to the finale has been aptly termed "golden serenity." The symphony is remarkable for its clearness rather than any great weight, and the themes flow smoothly and spontaneously. The programme was replete with themes significant of the action of the opera, and the melodies are worked out magnificently.

Programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, D minor, Op. 23.....MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Washington).....Humperdinck

[107]

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Die Grundnote des gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Symphonie-Konzerts der Bostoner war eine festliche und unnachahmliche Brillanz. Das Programm enthielt ein für New York neues, hochbedeutendes Werk, die E-Dur-Symphonie von Hermann Bischoff, das zweite Klavier-Concert von MacDowell mit Frau Carreño als Solistin und Dvorak's frohgemuthe „Karnevals"-Ouverture, drei glänzende Darbietungen, die wohl nicht tadelloser wiedergegeben werden können, als es gestern der Fall war.

Hermann Bischoff müssen wir auf Grund dieses Werks in die vorderste Reihe der zeitgenössischen Symphoniker stellen. Das Werk ist von bedeutender Erfindung, von imposantem Aufbau und effektvoller Gliederung. Es weicht nicht unwesentlich von der klassischen Symphonieform ab, doch liegt darin so viel echtes Talent, so viel erfreuliche Kraft und heitere Anmuth, daß wir es unbedingt den bemerkenswerthesten Erscheinungen der letzten Jahre auf symphonischem Gebiet zuzählen müssen. Bischoff verfügt über ein überaus glänzendes Talent der Tonschilderung, das seinem Werk ein königlich-prächtiges, glitzerndes Orchestergewand zu geben versteht.

Es giebt da brillante Einfälle und unvergeßliche Klangwirkungen. Was der Symphonie fehlt, ist gedrungene Knappheit, weise Beschränkung. Sie ist zu sehr gedehnt, der Komponist giebt sich zu redselig, als ob er Alles auf einmal sagen wollte. Bischoff ist eingestandenermaßen Programmmusiker, wie aus folgender Darstellung erhellt, die er seinem Werke beigegeben hat.

„Seit einigen Jahren legen viele Komponisten Werth darauf, in den Programmbüchern ausdrücklich zu erklären: mein Stück hat nichts mit „Programm-Musik" zu schaffen. Ich glaube nun zwar, daß es überhaupt keine Musik giebt, noch je gegeben hat, die nicht in irgend einem Sinn Programm-Musik wäre. Insoferne als es keine musikalische Wendung giebt, die nicht eine Analogie in der Erscheinungs- oder der poetischen Empfindungswelt fände. Um indeß nicht aus dem Styl zu fallen, will ich betonen, daß meine Symphonie durchaus Programm-Musik darstellt. Natürlich beansprucht sie deswegen doch, lediglich nach musikalischen Gesetzen geformt zu sein.

„Es schwebte mir die Geschichte eines Jünglings vor, der in einem wilden und schwelgerischen Leben ein reines Glück kennen lernt, als er dessen nicht mehr würdig ist und es deshalb nicht besitzen kann.

„Vergebens sucht er in der Resignation Frieden zu finden (zweiter Satz). Die Gespenster seiner vergeudeten Jugend tauchen wieder auf, wie Furien ihn verfolgend und jagend (dritter Satz). Da erscheint wieder jene schöne und edle Frauengestalt (Ueberleitung), und besänftigt schweigend die Stimme der Finsternis. Die Liebe des reinen Weibes erlöst uns vom Schmutz des Lebens. Wie man sieht, ein altes, oft behandeltes Problem, das schon auf mancherlei Weise gelöst worden ist. Wenn nun Jemand beim Anhören des ersten Satzes (nur dieser hat ein spezielles Programm) die Vision von durchprahten Nächten, von orgiastischen Maskenbällen haben sollte, wenn er heißes Liebesgeflüster in mondbeglänzten Gärten, die von Vogelgesang erfüllt sind, zu vernehmen glaubte, so würde er das empfinden, was dem Komponisten vorgeschwebt hat.

„Aber auch dann, wenn man bei meinem Werk nur die Vorstellung hätte, wie der trübe und schäumende Most sich zum ruhigen und edlen Wein abklärt, dürfte ich glauben, daß es mir gelungen ist, die poetische Idee klar und plastisch herausgearbeitet zu haben."

Der erste A Satz (sehr schnell und feurig) setzt mit einem kecken, originellen Thema von erregtem Glanz ein, um im weiteren Verlauf zwei gut kontrastirende Themata zu bringen. An Stelle des Durchführungstheils setzte der Komponist eine „Episode", ein reizvoll wirksames Gesangsthema, das aber erst im letzten Satz eine Durchführung erfährt. Wir hörten da Klangfiguren, die bezaubernd wirken. Zum Schluß des Satzes macht eine majestätische Steigerung enormen Effekt.

Die Wiedergabe seitens Dr. Muck's und des Orchesters war einfach — man muß zu den höchsten Worten greifen — kolossal, und der Beifall erneuerte sich immer und immer wieder. Aber es sollte noch glänzender kommen. Der zweite Satz (sehr ruhig und getragen) bringt wieder bemerkenswerthes thematisches Material. Der Satz beginnt mit getragenem Gesang mit ganz eigenartigen Begleitungsfiguren, die bald wie drohendes Gewölk, bald sich in seelige Harmonien auflösen schienen.

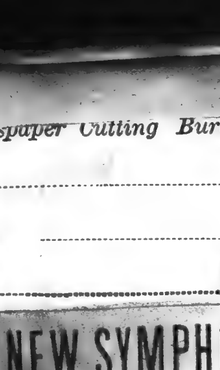
Der Gesang schwillt in prachtvoller Steigerung zu einem vollstimmigen Choral von überraschender Wirkung an, um dann zart und seelig auszutönen. Der dritte Satz, ein Scherzo (Molto), ist technisch

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW SYMPHONY GIVES PHILADELPHIANS CHILL

Overrated Boston Orchestra Heard for Second Time This Season.

NOT A BIT ORIGINAL



SYMPHONIC music of the up-to-date school was heard at the Academy of Music last evening when the much-exploited and much-overrated Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season in Philadelphia. There was a new symphony on tap, distilled from the seething brain of Hermann Bischoff, of Munich, Germany, where art with a sixteen-point A reigns supreme.

It is hardly necessary to affect a critical mood in regard to Mr. Bischoff's symphony. It has pleased Dr. Muck to put the work on the program of a concert given in Philadelphia by the Boston Orchestra, but there is no disposition among Philadelphia concertgoers to follow blindly the lead of this alien annotator of American musical taste.

The audience at the Academy last night didn't like Herr Bischoff's symphony. They had, moreover, excellent reasons therefor—the unfolding of which in these columns would be mere waste of space.

As a composer, Herr Bischoff is an imitator of Richard Strauss, with an added knack of eccentric instrumentation calculated to turn even the audacious Strauss' hair gray. Of original invention the symphony was innocent, but in outlandish combinations of choirs, Herr Bischoff had his German contemporaries beaten a mile.

The veteran Teresa Carreno played delightfully a commonplace concerto by Edward MacDowell, all memory of the composition being lost, as in earlier years, in the magic play of the artist's technique.

Chabrier's "Rhapsodie Espana," which closed the program, was given, evidently, as an example of how not to do it. There was nothing in the entire concert, indeed, which a lover of music could carry away and treasure in memory's chambers.

CROWDS AT THE SYMPHONY

Mme. Teresa Careno Plays the MacDowell Concerto.

Overture to the "Forced Marriage," Never Before Played in Washington, Is Recited.

One of the largest, as well as one of the most distinguished, audiences which has yet greeted the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was present yesterday when that organization of eminent musicians gave their third matinee at the New National Theater.

The programme was novel, introducing besides Brahms' charming Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73, the overture to the "Forced Marriage," by Humperdinck, which has never before been played in Washington.

Mme. Teresa Careno, the soloist of the performance, gave a thoroughly delightful rendition of MacDowell's Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, D minor, op 23. Her able execution of the animated passages in the second movement were wonderfully done, and at the conclusion of the concert the audience tendered a hearty ovation.

The Brahms' symphony, which is delightfully tender, is of an alternately joyous and serious theme, and the work to the finale has been aptly termed "golden serenity." The symphony is remarkable for its clearness rather than any great weight, and the themes flow smoothly and spontaneously. The programme was replete with themes significant of the action of the opera, and the melodies are worked out magnificently.

Programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, D minor, Op. 23.....MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Washington).....Humperdinck

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Third Concert This Season With Mme. Carreno as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the present season at the Academy of Music last evening when the feature of the three-number program was a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, a young composer who has taken Richard Strauss for his model and who seems determined to better the instruction and surpass the example of that eccentric and boresome genius.

This symphony is said to embody an attempt to tell the story of a young man's life from the time he starts in to sow his wild oats to the period when in a sobered, chastened and repentant frame of mind he is gathering the crop which customarily attends such sowing. This is a program which has been followed without entirely satisfactory results by composers whose achievements Mr. Bischoff can hardly expect to equal. Smetana, the Bohemian genius who died in a madhouse, wrote a celebrated quartet which he called "Out of My Life," and which he presented to the public as his autobiography, and Hector Berlioz undertook the same kind of thing in a big work which Philadelphia music lovers had an opportunity of hearing no later than last week, and which under the title of "Symphonie Fantastique," illustrates a hasheesh dream of dissipation and its consequences.

It was hardly worth while, as it seemed, to do the thing again and Bischoff's symphony, one of whose principal recommendations is its extreme difficulty, might without any great loss to the world of art have been omitted. There are some good things in it, some developments which are fairly interesting and some climaxes which are moderately effective, and it serves very well to exhibit the capacities of the Boston Orchestra. These, however, no longer need demonstration and when there are so many masterpieces to choose from which one would rather hear the production of a Bischoff symphony at the cost, as the press agent announces, of three weeks' rehearsal, looks like a mistake of judgment. And it played for one hour and a quarter!

The assisting artist was that admirable pianist Madam Teresa Carreno, who had elected to be heard in MacDowell's poetic, graceful, melodious and skillfully constructed concerto in D minor. She played it with consummate refinement, with an absolute mastery of the key board and with an extraordinary eloquence and distinction and again convinced every appreciative hearer that she is one of the five or six greatest pianists of the world. The concert closed with a brilliant rendering of Chabrier's highly colored Spanish rhapsody.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate.....

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is a trite observation, but also a true one (like many of its kind), that we love best the good music with which we are most familiar. It is also a mournful fact that because of the recognition of the old truth those who cater to the public are chary with novelties. We cry for them, but when we get them we find that they are not to our liking. In the case of orchestral music of the large type, the concerts being comparatively few, repetitions are out of the question—at least, in the course of a season—and so we do not learn to love the unfamiliar unless it is of a quite extraordinary excellence. Dr. Muck, with the help of his Boston Orchestra, is offering new things more generously than any of our local concert institutions; and yet it is hard to be grateful to him because the æsthetic principle is as and what it is, and also because the new music that he brings to us has so little that makes an appeal to what may be called our elemental appreciation. Perhaps it is the fault of the woful state into which the art of music has fallen—a state which exalts technical treatment over contents. It is the state which since the world began, not only in music but in all the arts, is consequent upon the high development of virtuosoship.

At the third concert of the Boston Orchestra last night Dr. Muck brought forward for the first time in New York a symphony in E by a hitherto unknown composer named Hermann Bischoff. It had its first production at one of the German festivals, which are held to give a hearing to such things, a year ago last May. Every year such a festival is held by the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein; a score of new works are brought forward and put down on the records of patient observers like Mr. Hale, of Boston, and then, for the greater part, disappear. As a rule the world does not seem to be much the loser by their disappearance. Once in a long while a good thing survives by virtue of its excellence. Perhaps Bischoff's is one of these good things; but it is to be feared that the repetitions necessary to impress the fact upon the public would entail a great weariness of the flesh in most musical communities. On the first hearing it seems to be another instance of small ideas expanded beyond all reason and beyond ordinary endurance by the composer's capacity and willingness to say the same thing many times in a different orchestral voice. It has one thing in its favor, which is that the composer tries to work with melodies instead of phrases; but, unhappily, his melodies are discursive and lacking in the element of symmetry and reposefulness which many ingenuous lovers of the beautiful stubbornly insist on thinking essential.

There were two other numbers on the programmes—MacDowell's pianoforte concerto in D minor, of which Mme. Carreno played the solo part (with more brilliance and power than poetical feeling), and Dvorak's "Carnival Overture."

JAN 8 1903

HONOR TO MACDOWELL

Washington Audience Testifies to Composer's Worth.

PIANO CONCERTO IN D MINOR

Boston Orchestra Plays Great Musician's Symphony to Brilliant Crowd at National Theater—Mme. Carreno, Soloist, Recalled Eight Times—Individuality Mars Beauty of Brahms' Movement.

For the first time since Edward A. MacDowell, generally considered America's greatest composer, was stricken with an incurable mental malady, one of his larger and more important compositions, the second pianoforte concerto in D minor, was included in the programme of a symphony orchestra in this city. The work was played by Mme. Carreno,—at one time the instructor of Edward MacDowell, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Muck, yesterday at the orchestra's third concert.

The audience was not slow to appreciate the significance of the event, and at the close of the rendition Mme. Carreno was recalled eight times.

The character of the ovation gave proof that the audience was paying this tribute to the composer of the work, and not alone to the artist who performed it. Long after the piano had been closed the applause continued.

The boxes were draped with flags. Four years ago, on the last appearance of Edward MacDowell in this city, an audience of like proportions did honor to the great composer himself at his recital in the Columbia Theater, recalling him at least five times after the performance of his great "Celtic" sonata.

Play Brahms' Symphony.

The other numbers provided at yesterday's concert were the Brahms second symphony in D major and Humperdinck's overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage," which was given for the first time in Washington. There are modernists who still prefer to prolong their melodies beyond two or three measures, and it was from their libraries that Dr. Muck drew all of yesterday's selections. In the first movement of the Brahms symphony there flowed forth smooth, melodious phrases, preponderating in string quality. Admirable as was the ensemble of the first violins, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of its many solo players, is capable of making more pronounced and unanimous effects in the shading and phrasing of the more expressive strains in this movement than they did yesterday. The latitude allowed the first violins in their bowing resulted in a slightly perceptible tendency toward solo effort in this movement and a consequent blurring of the ensemble effect. This was corrected in the succeeding movements of the symphony and in the overture, where the little buzzing motif toward the close was bowed with great care and with excellent results.

Lightness Balances Programme.

The programme had a double share of lightness and humor to counterbalance the more serious moments. In the third movement of the Brahms symphony there was the subtle wit, the unobtrusive spirit of bantering, contrasting strongly with certain measures from Beethoven's symphonies, written with a far broader and more circus-like humor, and therefore less effective. It is said that Brahms is an absolutist in music, but surely if he had no hidden meaning in this movement, the hearer cannot help forming his own story as the music progresses.

The programme notes of the concert, written by Philip Hale, paid a graceful city compliment to Washington by including a review of the "Early Concert Life in America," by Oscar G. Sonneck, of the Library of Congress.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)

Idress .....

New Composer's Work by Boston Symphony

1884

A PUZZLED audience listened to a new symphony last night at Carnegie Hall, when Dr. Muck and the great symphony orchestra from Boston played Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major for the first time. Mr. Bischoff is a present day German composer, with some radical views of composition.

His work required an hour and a quarter for its performance, and the orchestra played the lengthy work with unfailing enthusiasm and power. Despite all their efforts it cannot be said that the work proved popular with the audience. The applause seemed intended for the hard working players and their leader rather than for the composition.

Mme. Teresa Carreno played MacDowell's second concerto in D minor with brilliancy and authority. This most beautiful work of the American master was enthusiastically received.

The programme concluded with the Dvorak carnival overture, brilliantly played.

[107]

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Die Grundnote des gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Symphonie-Konzerts der Bostoner war eine festliche und unnachahmliche Brillanz. Das Programm enthielt ein für New York neues, hochbedeutendes Werk, die E-Dur-Symphonie von Hermann Bischoff, das zweite Klavier-Concert von MacDowell mit Frau Carreño als Solistin und Dvorak's frohgemuthe „Karnevals"-Ouverture, drei glänzende Darbietungen, die wohl nicht tadelloser wiedergegeben werden können, als es gestern der Fall war.

Hermann Bischoff müssen wir auf Grund dieses Werks in die vorderste Reihe der zeitgenössischen Symphoniker stellen. Das Werk ist von bedeutender Erfindung, von imposantem Aufbau und effektvoller Gliederung. Es weicht nicht unwesentlich von der klassischen Symphonieform ab, doch liegt darin so viel echtes Talent, so viel erfreuliche Kraft und heitere Anmuth, daß wir es unbedingt den bemerkenswerthesten Erscheinungen der letzten Jahre auf symphonischem Gebiet zuzählen müssen. Bischoff verfügt über ein überaus glänzendes Talent der Tonschilderung, das seinem Werk ein königlich-prächtiges, glitzerndes Orchestergewand zu geben versteht.

Es giebt da brillante Einfälle und unvergeßliche Klangwirkungen. Was der Symphonie fehlt, ist gedrungene Knappheit, weise Beschränkung. Sie ist zu sehr gedehnt, der Komponist giebt sich zu redselig, als ob er Alles auf einmal sagen wollte. Bischoff ist eingestandenermaßen Programmmusiker, wie aus folgender Darstellung erhellt, die er seinem Werke beigegeben hat.

„Seit einigen Jahren legen viele Komponisten Werth darauf, in den Programmbüchern ausdrücklich zu erklären: mein Stück hat nichts mit „Programm-Musik" zu schaffen. Ich glaube nun zwar, daß es überhaupt keine Musik giebt, noch je gegeben hat, die nicht in irgend einem Sinn Programm-Musik wäre. Insoferne als es keine musikalische Wendung giebt, die nicht eine Analogie in der Erscheinungs- oder der poetischen Empfindungswelt fände. Um indeß nicht aus dem Styl zu fallen, will ich betonen, daß meine Symphonie durchaus Programm-Musik darstellt. Natürlich beansprucht sie deswegen doch, lediglich nach musikalischen Gesetzen geformt zu sein.

„Es schwebte mir die Geschichte eines Jünglings vor, der in einem wilden und schwelgerischen Leben ein reines Glück kennen lernt, als er dessen nicht mehr würdig ist und es deshalb nicht besitzen kann.

„Vergebens sucht er in der Resignation Frieden zu finden (zweiter Satz). Die Gespenster seiner vergeudeten Jugend tauchen wieder auf, wie Furien ihn verfolgend und jagend (dritter Satz). Da erscheint wieder jene schöne und edle Frauengestalt (Ueberleitung), und besänftigt schweigend die Stimme der Finsternis. Die Liebe des reinen Weibes erlöst uns vom Schmutz des Lebens. Wie man sieht, ein altes, oft behandeltes Problem, das schon auf mancherlei Weise gelöst worden ist. Wenn nun Jemand beim Anhören des ersten Satzes (nur dieser hat ein spezielles Programm) die Vision von durchprahten Nächten, von orgiastischen Maskenbällen haben sollte, wenn er heißes Liebesgeflüster in mondbeglänzten Gärten, die von Vogelgesang erfüllt sind, zu vernehmen glaubte, so würde er das empfinden, was dem Komponisten vorgeschwebt hat.

„Aber auch dann, wenn man bei meinem Werk nur die Vorstellung hätte, wie der trübe und schäumende Most sich zum ruhigen und edlen Wein abklärt, dürfte ich glauben, daß es mir gelungen ist, die poetische Idee klar und plastisch herausgearbeitet zu haben."

Der erste A Satz (sehr schnell und feurig) setzt mit einem kecken, originellen Thema von erregtem Glanz ein, um im weiteren Verlauf zwei gut kontrastirende Themata zu bringen. An Stelle des Durchführungstheils setzte der Komponist eine „Episode", ein reizvoll wirksames Gesangsthema, das aber erst im letzten Satz eine Durchführung erfährt. Wir hörten da Klangfiguren, die bezaubernd wirken. Zum Schluß des Satzes macht eine majestätische Steigerung enormen Effekt.

Die Wiedergabe seitens Dr. Muck's und des Orchesters war einfach — man muß zu den höchsten Worten greifen — kolossal, und der Beifall erneuerte sich immer und immer wieder. Aber es sollte noch glänzender kommen. Der zweite Satz (sehr ruhig und getragen) bringt wieder bemerkenswerthes thematisches Material. Der Satz beginnt mit getragenem Gesang mit ganz eigenartigen Begleitungsfiguren, die bald wie drohendes Gewölk, bald sich in seelige Harmonien auflösen schienen.

Der Gesang schwillt in prachtvoller Steigerung zu einem vollstimmigen Choral von überraschender Wirkung an, um dann zart und seelig auszutönen. Der dritte Satz, ein Scherzo (Presto) ist technisch Jagen und Wirbeln von Höllengeistlein und Irrlichtern. Die Bostoner, diesmal ein vieltöpfiger Virtuose sondergleichen, spielten diese beiden Sätze mit unbeschreiblicher durchgeistigter Virtuosität. Der Beifall war nach dem dritten Satz so begeistert und anhaltend, daß das ganze Orchester aufstehen und danken mußte.

Der vierte Satz fällt gegen die beiden vorhergehenden kleinen Wunder etwas ab, doch giebt es auch da noch genug Effekt und Glanz. Dr. Muck hat mit der Leitung dieses Werks eine Probe genialster Kunst abgelegt. Er ging förmlich über sich hinaus und brachte eine Tonschwelgerei und Malerei, die von den glühendsten und fattesten Farben lebte. Welch' ein Hochgenuß — ein bedeutendes Werk, ein großer Dirigent und ein unvergleichliches Orchester!

Nach den Orchestertitanen kam die Klavier-Titanin, Frau Teresa Carreño, die MacDowell's zweites Klavier-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung in ihrem großen Styl spielte, den ersten Satz vielleicht etwas zu wuchtig und schwermüthig, das Presto jedoch genial erfaßt, festlich bewegt, glitzernd, mit einem glücklichen Einschlag von Humor und unwiderstehlichem Elan.

An Kraft übertrifft die Künstlerin bekanntlich viele ihrer männlichen Kollegen, aber ihre zarten Schattirungen im Presto, die runden Wellenlinien ihres Trillers, der unfehlbare Glanz ihrer Oktaven und das überaus flüssige Passagenspiel zeigte die Künstlerin gestern auf erfreulicher Höhe der Charakterisirung und Selbstzucht. Frau Carreño wurde achtmal stürmisch gerufen.

Zum Schluß gab uns Dr. Muck Dvorak's „Karnevals"-Ouverture mit ihrem erquicklichen Frohsinn, der melodischen Frische und Natürlichkeit. Wir werden dieses Konzert nicht so bald vergessen. H.

N.Y. World - Jan 10

CARRENO PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Pianiste Renders MacDowell Concerto—Organization Gives New Symphony.

By Reginald De Koven.

A new symphony by Hermann Bischoff, a young German composer, now resident in Munich, first heard in New York last night, was the instrumental feature of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

I must confess, I approached the first hearing of a modern symphony dedicated to Richard Strauss by an unknown composer with feelings of some trepidation, which were soon allayed, as it was shortly evident that the composer had something to say, and said it well. The work is in the usual four movements, allegro molto con fuoco, andante, presto (scherzo) and finale, allegro moderato (the first two bearing additional titles in German), and is scored for large orchestras, including English horn, double bassoon and extra clarinet and six horns.

While more symphonic fantasy than formal symphony, the work as a whole is picturesque, pictorial, impressive and often frankly melodious, though at times the melodic thought seems to writhe through masses of glaring color and turgid, seething harmonies.

The scoring is lavish and impressionistic—even splotchy—in color, and the composer speaks orchestrally in the voice of Strauss, and he has every known use and misuse of the modern orchestra at his fingers' ends. The first and third movements—the latter a very new Danse macabrre of haunting intensity—are the most interesting and also the best in point of thematic material and workmanship.

The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave a really scintillating performance of a work which I cannot feel is destined to take a permanent place in symphonic literature, as it strikes one as superficially brilliant, but lacking in emotional depth and sincerity of artistic expression. But the work has decided features of rather sensational interest, and made quite an impression on the audience.

A finer exposition of the art of piano playing than that given by Carreno last night in her playing of Macdowell's D minor piano Concerto No. 2 it would be difficult to imagine. Not since Rubinstein have I heard such a magnetic use of the instrument. The finish, the fineness of it all, the temperament, the emotional force and rare artistic sincerity seem to reach out and grasp you, heart and brain. Surely no woman ever dominated an orchestra more than did Carreno last night, and she was applauded to the echo. Her accompaniment, as was the case with Paderewski at the last concert, might have been improved on, both in attack and precision.

A reading of Dvorak's "Carneval" overture at an exaggerated tempo, which coarsened it and robbed it for once of much of its rhythmic charm closed the programme.

NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 10 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A New Symphony by Hermann Bischoff—Mme. Carreno Plays

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert last night in Carnegie Hall. There was the large audience that is unwavering in its interest in these concerts, and that listened with close attention to a programme that offered a very considerable stumbling block to purely musical enjoyment in the shape of a symphony by one Hermann Bischoff, and then offered compensation in the shape of MacDowell's second piano concerto played by Mme. Teresa Carreño, and Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture.

Mr. Bischoff is a contemporary German composer who has won a prize and has had his orchestral works performed at conventions of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein. They do not seem to have figured much on the less strenuous programmes of the established orchestral series in German cities, and this symphony suggested some very good reasons why it has not. One is that it is an hour and a quarter in duration. The modern German symphonic writers ask much of executants and listeners, but few ask more than this.

The composer states that this symphony has nothing to do with "programme music," but that in order to be in fashion he insists that it presents programme music throughout, and proceeds to outline its programme, a romantic suggestion of a dissolute young man who sees the ghosts of his misspent youth and tries in vain to find peace in resignation—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, passionate love murmurings in gardens, flooded with moonlight and vocal with the song of birds. Of the following of this picturesque scheme there soon ceases to be any question.

He begins as if he were going to be different from many of the present day composers in that he dares to write tunes. He presents at the outset one or two that have about as much distinction as those beloved of college glee clubs, with all the emphasis and brilliancy that the full orchestra can give them, emphasized with all that the brass and the piccolo can contribute.

It does not take him long to lose himself in a maze of elaboration that is by turns dry, bombastic, and turgid, from which he seems positively unable to extricate himself. The slow movement, built on themes not without breadth and noble suggestion; the presto, with its slow trio, the final allegro, offer now and then something for the listener to grasp; but it is all worked over with an amazing and fatuous prolixity and laboriousness that swallow up whatever ideas there are in a bottomless tonal morass. And the symphony, at that, is said to have been cut and revised by the author.

There are ideas in the music, and there are passages that show power and grasp of musicianship. But Mr. Bischoff is his own worst enemy in his striving for depth and distinction and elaboration, which has brought him only into the most wearisome and prolonged dullness. His writing for the orchestra is often too thick, too heavy; he abuses the brass and the piccolo, and his effects are often hard and metallic and monotonous, so that the ear cries for relief.

The work is complicated and difficult, but it was played with splendid mastery by the orchestra.

Dr. Muck seemed to like it, and had evidently devoted careful study to it, and filled the performance with innumerable nuances and with a determined spirit and brilliancy, in which the orchestra seconded him with unwearying enthusiasm. So far as their playing went, they quite deserved the compliment of the applause which the conductor passed over to them by making them all rise and bow.

Mme. Carreño did a graceful and appreciative act in playing the concerto of her one-time pupil, Edward MacDowell, and a service to this public as well. But the concerto is wholly worth performance only by so great an artist as Mme. Carreño, apart from all such personal considerations, and she has given sufficient evidence of this by playing it in Germany, where those considerations would not weigh as they might be considered to weigh here.

It is one of MacDowell's best compositions, one of his most original and most sustained in interest. It needs the fiery and romantic style of Mme. Carreño; and she played it with dazzling splendor, with superb eloquence and poetic feeling, and with that wholly personal note, that pointed and expressive treatment of the phrase, that clear rhythm, that characterize her performance always. She was most enthusiastically applauded.

38

CARRENO GETS AN OVATION.

Great Woman Pianist Star Of Boston Symphony Concert.

This was the programme of the third concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night:

Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

MacDowell—Concerto No. 2, D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 23. (Mme. Teresa Carreno, Soloist.)
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; molto allegro.

Chabrier—"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.

Madame Carreno's splendid performance aroused the audience to extraordinary enthusiasm. She was recalled again and again, but the rule against encore numbers, which was withdrawn in favor of Paderewski a month ago, was rigidly observed last night. The MacDowell concerto has moments of great beauty, moments of great brilliance and moments of power. Whether in one or another of them, Madame Carreno played with distinction, and the ovation she received was no more than deserved.

The Brahms symphony, full of melody [illegible] orchestration, was given [illegible] grace and delicacy by

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

Address .....
Date ..... JAN 10 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bischoff's Symphony the Novelty of the Programme, and a Very Extensive One It Was.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night and Dr. Muck conducted. The audience was an enormous one and displayed a great deal of enthusiasm, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played like an orchestra of virtuosi.

So much for very bald facts. But the details are far more interesting, for the programme contained, as a novelty, a symphony, op. 16, by Mr. Hermann Bischoff, which, according to the cruel calculations of hour and minute hands took about one hour and a quarter to perform.

It is not just to measure music with the yardstick or according to the standards of time, but it is taxing the patience and good nature of a concert audience very severely to impose such a task upon its listening and staying powers. The chief sentiment that voices itself at the conclusion of the work is one of pity at its inordinate length, for the composition is unquestionably an interesting one. It has moments that are tremendous, and there are other episodes that show a great deal of lyric inspiration. But the symphony is, despite its length, a most interesting work and, in spots, a big one.

The evening's soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, who has been heard here once before this season. Last night she played Macdowell's Second Concerto, and did it in a manner that more than justified the many recalls she received. In the first movement she made the work sound heroic in its gloom, and in the happy presto she played with charming delicacy and finesse. The whole reading was admirable and this "Valkyrie of the keyboard," as she has been christened in the past, proved that she had poetry as well as heroic force.

The concluding number was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted the Bischoff symphony with an enthusiasm that must have been prompted by something more than the mere introducing of a novelty, and his accompaniments in the Macdowell concerto were sympathetic. And the orchestra played, well, as it nearly always plays, only it sounded more beautiful, just as it does almost every time it is heard anew.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

Address .....
Date ..... JAN 12 1908

Boston Symphony Concert.

Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master, being ill from grip, there was a change in yesterday's Boston symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Wendling was to have appeared as soloist, playing a Mozart concerto, but in place of this the orchestra played MacDowell's A minor suite, with sympathetic spirit, displaying its delicacy in the final movement, the one of the "Forest Spirits."

The remainder of this programme consisted of a Handel concerto in F major, arranged for modern concert orchestra by Mr. Gustav Kogel, and Goetz' F major symphony. And when it was all done the impression created was that of beautiful playing of a programme that contained very little of interest.

The MacDowell suite is very pretty, and some of the incidents are charmingly orchestrated; the Goetz Symphony is also pleasing and the Handel concerto appealed to those who believe in this old, quaint music, and are convinced that it has a place on the concert platform of to-day with its big orchestras.

Dr. Muck conducted with customary spirit, and the orchestra again gave evidence of its virtuosity, but it was not an interesting programme, and its effect was reflected upon the audience, which was lacking in enthusiasm.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
JAN 10 1908

Boston Orchestra Plays a New Symphony Brilliantly

It Is by Hermann Bischoff, of Munich—Teresa Carreno, Soloist, in a MacDowell Piano Concerto.

DR. KARL MUCK, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert in Carnegie Hall, last night, directed a fine performance, for the first time in New York, of a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, a disciple of the modern German revolutionary school of music. It is not easy, after only one hearing, to form a positive opinion of the value of the work. The orchestration is remarkable, a bit noisy if you will, but of expert workmanship. The inspiration of Wagner is manifest, and once there is a striking resemblance in theme and treatment between it and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, which was also on the programme. Nevertheless, in the main, it is original and full of charm. The first movement is delightfully novel and stirring, the scherzo is captivating and the whole composition served last night to keep the faculties on the edge of anticipation.

It was no easy thing to play, but Dr. Muck's men surmounted all the difficulties and gave the work a superb exposition.

Teresa Carreno played the solo part in MacDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor, with all her triumphant assurance and skill and charm. She was recalled many times. In this work and in the Dvorak overture the orchestra maintained the brilliancy of its playing. After the scherzo in the symphony Dr. Muck called upon all his men to stand in acknowledgment of the prolonged applause.

The house was crowded and representative both of art and fashion.

SYLVESTER RAWLINGS

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date JAN 10 1908

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

New Symphony by Boston Players.

Determined not to let his audiences be backward in their knowledge of modern musical literature, Dr. Muck produced last night in Carnegie [illegible] Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major, opus 16. This work was played first on May 24, 1906, at a convention of the Allegemeiner Deutscher Musikverein in Essen, Germany. Last week it was presented in Berlin, when Nikisch and the Philharmonic Orchestra will give it for the first time in the German capital. Evidently Dr. Muck is keeping his programmes up to date. In that he should receive the hearty approval of every person interested in musical progress. It is not a question whether one man or another has any special taste for the composition offered. Dr. Muck does not consult even his own predilections. Once it is granted that a work has substantial merit it is eligible for performance.

The symphony in E major, a creation by a man who, besides composing symphonic music and song, has been active as a critic of music, is not an important contribution to musical literature, weighted though it be with the spices of Germany's most modern orchestral writers.

What Bischoff needs most is the sort of stuff study does not bring. His most pressing want is something to say that is worth while—musical ideas of originality, of eloquence, of weight. Technical proficiency he has in plenty. He clothes his slim thoughts in a garb inappropriately ornamental. It is as if a child were stalking about in raiment intended for a woman of 40.

The first movement, "very fast and with fire," leans more upon Strauss than the others. Bischoff here uses tricks of melodic line and accent that have a strong resemblance to "Till Eulenspiegel." There is in this movement a certain spontaneous fervor and enthusiasm. Frequent changes of rhythm and accent keep the attention of the audience alive. But one listens in vain for thematic distinction, for originality of melody or of harmony. A few novel instrumental effects are about all the composer has to show.

In the second movement, "quietly and in a sustained manner," as in the first, Bischoff, following the fashion of Strauss, introduces quotations from his songs. The first of them is modeled on Bach. That is to suggest the spirit of resignation which represents one of the underlying motives of the work. This movement is long-drawn-out and tiresome. There is a decided change for the better in the scherzo that follows, particularly in the trio section, when the composer for the first time, and with good results, shows that he knows his Bruckner.

The final movement also is on a higher plane than the first two, though not as obviously effective. There is a nearer approach to sincerity; there are moments of real eloquence.

But what, after all, has Bischoff to tell us in this work? The underlying poetic scheme of his species of "Heldenleben" we know authoritatively. It is that of a man who, after a life of dissipations, has finally given himself to nobler things. But the composer wishes the music to speak for itself, and that it does not. Indeed, consider it whatever you wish, absolute music or programme music, it remains a thing of small consequence spun out to inordinate length and bolstered up out of all proportion to its intrinsic value.

As an orchestral show piece, the symphony should take high rank. It is extremely exacting in its demands and admirably adapted to revealing the powers of an instrumental body and its leader. To say that the Boston orchestra and Muck gave it a marvelous performance is mild praise. In beauty of tone, sonority, elasticity of tempo and precision, the virtuosos from Boston never have done a more remarkable piece of work. To watch Muck's mastery of the technique of conducting was in itself an experience.

Teresa Carreno gave a beautiful interpretation of MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, No. 2. It was characterized by incisive strength, breadth of expression, nobility and distinction of phrasing. The evening closed with Dvorak's overture, "Carneval," opus 92.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser.
NEW YORK'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER.

Date ... N 11 1908

ON account of the illness of C... Wendling, concert master of ... Boston Symphony Orchestra, th... gramme for the concert of that ... tion at Carnegie Hall this af... been changed. Instead of ... major violin concerto, which ... was to have played ... Holland Suite" for ... substitute ...

[108]

...brave Form des Werks, von gewaltiger kontrapunktischer Durcharbeitung und originellem Klangzauber. Die Farbung möchten wir „satanisch" nennen, wie ein Jagen und Wirbeln von Höllengeschlechtern und Irrlichtern. Die Bostoner, diesmal ein vielköpfiger Virtuose sondergleichen, spielten diese beiden Sätze mit unbeschreiblicher durchgeistigter Virtuosität. Der Beifall war nach dem dritten Satz so begeistert und anhaltend, daß das ganze Orchester aufstehen und danken mußte.

Der vierte Satz fällt gegen die beiden vorhergehenden kleinen Wunder etwas ab, doch giebt es auch da noch genug Effekt und Glanz. Dr. Muck hat mit der Leitung dieses Werks eine Probe genialster Kunst abgelegt. Er ging förmlich über sich hinaus und brachte eine Tonschwelgerei und Malerei, die von den glühendsten und fattesten Farben lebte. Welch' ein Hochgenuß — ein bedeutendes Werk, ein großer Dirigent und ein unvergleichliches Orchester!

Nach den Orchestertitanen kam die Klavier-Titanin, Frau Teresa Carreño, die MacDowell's zweites Klavier-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung in ihrem großen Styl spielte, den ersten Satz vielleicht etwas zu wuchtig und schwermüthig, das Presto jedoch genial erfaßt, festlich bewegt, glitzernd, mit einem glücklichen Einschlag von Humor und unwiderstehlichem Elan.

An Kraft übertrifft die Künstlerin bekanntlich viele ihrer männlichen Kollegen, aber ihre zarten Schattirungen im Presto, die runden Wellenlinien ihres Trillers, der unfehlbare Glanz ihrer Oktaven und das überaus flüssige Passagenspiel zeigte die Künstlerin gestern auf erfreulicher Höhe der Charakterisirung und Selbstzucht. Frau Carreño wurde achtmal stürmisch gerufen.

Zum Schluß gab uns Dr. Muck Dvorak's „Karnevals"-Ouverture mit ihrem erquicklichen Frohsinn, der melodischen Frische und Natürlichkeit. Wir werden dieses Konzert nicht so bald vergessen. H.

W. Y. World Jan 10

CARRENO PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Pianiste Renders MacDowell Concerto—Organization Gives New Symphony.

By Reginald De Koven.

A new symphony by Hermann Bischoff, a young German composer, now resident in Munich, first heard in New York last night, was the instrumental feature of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

I must confess, I approached the first hearing of a modern symphony dedicated to Richard Strauss by an unknown composer with feelings of some trepidation, which were soon allayed, as it was shortly evident that the composer had something to say, and said it well. The work is in the usual four movements, allegro molto con fuoco, andante, presto (scherzo) and finale, allegro moderato (the first two bearing additional titles in German), and is scored for large orchestras, including English horn, double bassoon and extra clarinet and six horns.

While more symphonic fantasy than formal symphony, the work as a whole is picturesque, pictorial, impressive and often frankly melodious, though at times the melodic thought seems to writhe through masses of glaring color and turgid, seething harmonies.

The scoring is lavish and impressionistic—even splotchy—in color, and the composer speaks orchestrally in the voice of Strauss, and he has every known use and misuse of the modern orchestra at his fingers' ends. The first and third movements—the latter a very new Danse macabre of haunting intensity—are the most interesting and also the best in point of thematic material and workmanship.

The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave a really scintillating performance of a work which I cannot feel is destined to take a permanent place in symphonic literature, as it strikes one as superficially brilliant, but lacking in emotional depth and sincerity of artistic expression. But the work has decided features of rather sensational interest, and made quite an impression on the audience.

A finer exposition of the art of piano playing than that given by Carreno last night in her playing of Macdowell's D minor piano Concerto No. 2 it would be difficult to imagine. Not since Rubinstein have I heard such a magnetic use of the instrument. The finish, the fineness of it all, the temperament, the emotional force and rare artistic sincerity seem to reach out and grasp you, heart and brain. Surely no woman ever dominated an orchestra more than did Carreno last night, and she was applauded to the echo. Her accompaniment, as was the case with Paderewski at the last concert, might have been improved on, both in attack and precision.

A reading of Dvorak's "Carneval" overture at an exaggerated tempo, which coarsened it and robbed it for once of much of its rhythmic charm, closed the programme.

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 11 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A New Symphony by Hermann Bischoff—Mme. Carreno Plays

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert last night in Carnegie Hall. There was the large audience that is unwavering in its interest in these concerts, and that listened with close attention to a programme that offered a very considerable stumbling block to purely musical enjoyment in the shape of a symphony by one Hermann Bischoff, and then offered compensation in the shape of MacDowell's second piano concerto played by Mme. Teresa Carreño, and Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture.

Mr. Bischoff is a contemporary German composer who has won a prize and has had his orchestral works performed at conventions of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein. They do not seem to have figured much on the less strenuous programmes of the established orchestral series in German cities, and this symphony suggested some very good reasons why it has not. One is that it is an hour and a quarter in duration. The modern German symphonic writers ask much of executants and listeners, but few ask more than this.

The composer states that this symphony has nothing to do with "programme music," but that in order to be in fashion he insists that it presents programme music throughout, and proceeds to outline its programme, a romantic suggestion of a dissolute young man who sees the ghosts of his misspent youth and tries in vain to find peace in resignation—dissolute nights, orgiastic masked balls, passionate love murmurings in gardens, flooded with moonlight and vocal with the song of birds. Of the following of this picturesque scheme there soon ceases to be any question.

He begins as if he were going to be different from many of the present day composers in that he dares to write tunes. He presents at the outset one or two that have about as much distinction as those beloved of college glee clubs, with all the emphasis and brilliancy that the full orchestra can give them, emphasized with all that the brass and the piccolo can contribute.

It does not take him long to lose himself in a maze of elaboration that is by turns dry, bombastic, and turgid, from which he seems positively unable to extricate himself. The slow movement, built on themes not without breadth and noble suggestion; the presto, with its slow trio, the final allegro, offer now and then something for the listener to grasp; but it is all worked over with an amazing and fatuous prolixity and laboriousness that swallow up whatever ideas there are in a bottomless tonal morass. And the symphony, at that, is said to have been cut and revised by the author.

There are ideas in the music, and there are passages that show power and grasp of musicianship. But Mr. Bischoff is his own worst enemy in his striving for depth and distinction and elaboration, which has brought him only into the most wearisome and prolonged dullness. His writing for the orchestra is often too thick, too heavy; he abuses the brass and the piccolo, and his effects are often hard and metallic and monotonous, so that the ear cries for relief.

The work is complicated and difficult, but it was played with splendid mastery by the orchestra.

Dr. Muck seemed to like it, and had evidently devoted careful study to it, and filled the performance with innumerable nuances and with a determined spirit and brilliancy, in which the orchestra seconded him with unwearying enthusiasm. So far as their playing went, they quite deserved the compliment of the applause which the conductor passed over to them by making them all rise and bow.

Mme. Carreño did a graceful and appreciative act in playing the concerto of her one-time pupil, Edward MacDowell, and a service to this public as well. But the concerto is wholly worth performance only by so great an artist as Mme. Carreño, apart from all such personal considerations, and she has given sufficient evidence of this by playing it in Germany, where those considerations would not weigh as they might be considered to weigh here.

It is one of MacDowell's best compositions, one of his most original and most sustained in interest. It needs the fiery and romantic style of Mme. Carreño; and she played it with dazzling splendor, with superb eloquence and poetic feeling, and with that wholly personal note, that pointed and expressive treatment of the phrase, that clear rhythm, that characterize her performance always. She was most enthusiastically applauded

ss

CARRENO GETS AN OVATION.

Great Woman Pianist Star Of Boston Symphony Concert.

This was the programme of the third concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night:

Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D major. Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

MacDowell—Concerto No. 2, D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. Op. 23. (Mme. Teresa Carreno, Soloist.)
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; molto allegro.

Chabrier—"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.

Madame Carreno's splendid performance aroused the audience to extraordinary enthusiasm. She was recalled again and again, but the rule against encore numbers, which was withdrawn in favor of Paderewski a month ago, was rigidly observed last night. The MacDowell concerto has moments of great beauty, moments of great brilliance and moments of power. Whether in one or another of them, Madame Carreno played with distinction, and the ovation she received was no more than deserved.

The Brahms symphony, full of melody and colorful orchestration, was given with the utmost grace and delicacy by the orchestra, particularly the piquant third movement. The Chabrier rhapsody, with its [illegible] barbaric tonal effects,

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
ddress .....
ate .....1908.
Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bischoff's Symphony the Novelty of the Programme, and a Very Extensive One It Was.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night and Dr. Muck conducted. The audience was an enormous one and displayed a great deal of enthusiasm, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played like an orchestra of virtuosi.

So much for very bald facts. But the details are far more interesting, for the programme contained, as a novelty, a symphony, op. 16, by Mr. Hermann Bischoff, which according to the cruel calculations of hour and minute hands took about one hour and a quarter to perform.

It is not just to measure music with the yardstick or according to the standards of time, but it is taxing the patience and good nature of a concert audience very severely to impose such a task upon its listening and staying powers. The chief sentiment that voices itself at the conclusion of the work is one of pity at its inordinate length, for the composition is unquestionably an interesting one. It has moments that are tremendous, and there are other episodes that show a great deal of lyric inspiration. But the symphony is, despite its length, a most interesting work and, in spots, a big one.

The evening's soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, who has been heard here once before this season. Last night she played Macdowell's Second Concerto, and did it in a manner that more than justified the many recalls she received. In the first movement she made the work sound heroic in its gloom, and in the happy presto she played with charming delicacy and finesse. The whole reading was admirable and this "Valkyrie of the keyboard," as she has been christened in the past, proved that she had poetry as well as heroic force.

The concluding number was Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted the Bischoff symphony with an enthusiasm that must have been prompted by something more than the mere introducing of a novelty, and his accompaniments in the Macdowell concerto were sympathetic. And the orchestra played, well, as it nearly always plays, only it sounded more beautiful, just as it does almost every time it is heard anew.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address .....
Date .....1908.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master, being ill from grip, there was a change in yesterday's Boston symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Wendling was to have appeared as soloist, playing a Mozart concerto, but in place of this the orchestra played MacDowell's A minor suite, with sympathetic spirit, displaying its delicacy in the final movement, the one of the "Forest Spirits."

The remainder of this programme consisted of a Handel concerto in F major, arranged for modern concert orchestra by Mr. Gustav Kogel, and Goetz' F major symphony. And when it was all done the impression created was that of beautiful playing of a programme that contained very little of interest.

The MacDowell suite is very pretty, and some of the incidents are charmingly orchestrated; the Goetz Symphony is also pleasing and the Handel concerto appealed to those who believe in this old, quaint music, and are convinced that it has a place on the concert platform of to-day with its big orchestras.

Dr. Muck conducted with customary spirit, and the orchestra again gave evidence of its virtuosity, but it was not an interesting programme, and its effect was reflected upon the audience, which was lacking in enthusiasm.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

JAN 6 1908

Boston Orchestra Plays a New Symphony Brilliantly

It Is by Hermann Bischoff, of Munich—Teresa Carreno, Soloist, in a MacDowell Piano Concerto.

DR. KARL MUCK, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert in Carnegie Hall, last night, directed a fine performance, for the first time in New York, of a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff, a disciple of the modern German revolutionary school of music. It is not easy, after only one hearing, to form a positive opinion of the value of the work. The orchestration is remarkable, a bit noisy if you will, but of expert workmanship. The inspiration of Wagner is manifest, and once there is a striking resemblance in theme and treatment between it and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, which was also on the programme. Nevertheless, in the main, it is original and full of charm. The first movement is delightfully novel and stirring, the scherzo is captivating and the whole composition served last night to keep the faculties on the edge of anticipation.

It was no easy thing to play, but Dr. Muck's men surmounted all the difficulties and gave the work a superb exposition.

Teresa Carreno played the solo part in MacDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor, with all her triumphant assurance and skill and charm. She was recalled many times. In this work and in the Dvorak overture the orchestra maintained the brilliancy of its playing. After the scherzo in the symphony Dr. Muck called upon all his men to stand in acknowledgment of the prolonged applause.

The house was crowded and representative both of art and fashion.

SYLVESTER RAWLINGS

[108]

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
te JAN 6 1908

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

New Symphony by Boston Players.

Determined not to let his audiences be backward in their knowledge of modern musical literature, Dr. Muck produced last night in Carnegie Hall Hermann Bischoff's symphony in E major, opus 16. This work was played first on May 24, 1906, at a convention of the Allegemeiner Deutscher Musikverein in Essen, Germany. Last week it was presented in Boston. On January 13 it will be heard in Berlin, when Nikisch and the Philharmonic Orchestra will give it for the first time in the German capital. Evidently Dr. Muck is keeping his programmes up to date. In that he should receive the hearty approval of every person interested in musical progress. It is not a question whether one man or another has any special taste for the composition offered. Dr. Muck does not consult even his own predilictions. Once it is granted that a work has substantial merit it is eligible for performance.

The symphony in E major, a creation by a man who, besides composing symphonic music and song, has been active as a critic of music, is not an important contribution to musical literature, weighted though it be with the spices of Germany's most modern orchestral writers.

What Bischoff needs most is the sort of stuff study does not bring. His most pressing want is something to say that is worth while—musical ideas of originality, of eloquence, of weight. Technical proficiency he has in plenty. He clothes his slim thoughts in a garb inappropriately ornamental. It is as if a child were stalking about in raiment intended for a woman of 40.

The first movement, "very fast and with fire," leans more upon Strauss than the others. Bischoff here uses tricks of melodic line and accent that have a strong resemblance to "Till Eulenspiegel." There is in this movement a certain spontaneous fervor and enthusiasm. Frequent changes of rhythm and accent keep the attention of the audience alive. But one listens in vain for thematic distinction, for originality of melody or of harmony. A few novel instrumental effects are about all the composer has to show.

In the second movement, "quietly and in a sustained manner," as in the first, Bischoff, following the fashion of Strauss, introduces quotations from his songs. The first of them is modeled on Bach. That is to suggest the spirit of resignation which represents one of the underlying motives of the work. This movement is long-drawn-out and tiresome. There is a decided change for the better in the scherzo that follows, particularly in the trio section, when the composer for the first time, and with good results, shows that he knows his Bruckner.

The final movement also is on a higher plane than the first two, though not as obviously effective. There is a nearer approach to sincerity; there are moments of real eloquence.

But what, after all, has Bischoff to tell us in this work? The underlying poetic scheme of his species of "Heldenleben" we know authoritatively. It is that of a man who, after a life of dissipations, has finally given himself to nobler things. But the composer wishes the music to speak for itself, and that it does not. Indeed, consider it whatever you wish, absolute music or programme music, it remains a thing of small consequence spun out to inordinate length and bolstered up out of all proportion to its intrinsic value.

As an orchestral show piece, the symphony should take high rank. It is extremely exacting in its demands and admirably adapted to revealing the powers of an instrumental body and its leader. To say that the Boston orchestra and Muck gave it a marvelous performance is mild praise. In beauty of tone, sonority, elasticity of tempo and precision, the virtuosos from Boston never have done a more remarkable piece of work. To watch Muck's mastery of the technique of conducting was in itself an experience.

Teresa Carreno gave a beautiful interpretation of MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, No. 2. It was characterized by incisive strength, breadth of expression, nobility and distinction of phrasing. The evening closed with Dvorak's overture, "Carneval," opus 92.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.

Date ... JAN 11 1908.

Esta

ON account of the illness of C... Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the programme for the concert of that organization at Carnegie Hall this afternoon has been changed. Instead of Mozart's A major violin concerto, which Mr. Wendling was to have played, MacDowell's "Woodland Suite" for orchestra has been substituted

SUN.

New York City.

JAN 10 1908

ANOTHER MUSIC PROBLEM

AN ELONGATED PUZZLE SYMPHONY BY BISCHOFF.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck Wade Through a Dismal Swamp of Discord—Teresa Carreno and Edward MacDowell Supply Sweetness and Light.

When an English bus driver refused to laugh at a good jest on the day when his father was hanged another] driver remarked, "He ain't got no sense o' humor wotever!" It is impossible to tell what would make Dr. Muck, the Mephistophelian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, laugh, but it is certain that there is something very defective in his sense of humor. Otherwise he would not play in New York such a composition as the symphony in E major of Hermann Bischoff of Munich, which was the first number of the third evening of the current season at Carnegie Hall last night.

A distinguished Brooklyn pianist, going home world weary after hearing this composition, said: "It has everything in it but music." It is true. It had length, breadth, depth, thickness and opacity. It had the voices of many instruments and the perversion of many chords. It had sounds dismal, sour, chortling, elongated, somniferous. It had science and learning. It had oceans of convolutions, waves, billows of developments out of nowhere into nothing. Yet it had a purpose, for this is what its very own composer said about it:

"For some years many composers have attached importance to explicit explanations in programme books. My piece has nothing to do with 'programme music.' I believe, however, that there is no music, as there has been no music which is not programme music in one way or another: inasmuch as there is no musical expression which does not find an analogy either in the world of facts and events or in that of poetic sentiments and sensations. Not to be out of fashion I therefore insist that my symphony presents throughout programme music. It naturally lays claim to be shaped solely in accordance with musical principles.

"In my mind is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it.

"He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement). The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet. Love of the pure woman delivers us from the filth of life.' As one sees, this is an old problem that has often been treated, that has often been solved in many ways. Now if any one, hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme), should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls, if he believes that he hears passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer.

"And also if the hearer has only the idea of my work, as the cloudy and foaming must clears into still and noble wine, I may then believe that I have succeeded in working the poetical idea into that which is clearly defined and plastic."

Thus do we penetrate to the workings of a mighty genius. Goethe in his "Faust" has told us how the woman soul leadeth us ever upward and on. About the same time he exclaims, "The indescribable, here is it done." Yet Hermann Bischoff had not composed any symphonies in Goethe's day, and the author of "The Sorrows of Werther" did not like music anyhow. Suffice it to say that Bischoff's symphony may have meant much to him, but it is not likely to mean anything to the common or New York music lover.

The first movement does indeed suggest the presence of some reprehensible youth at a vaudeville performance or a circus, and there is no doubt that he drank something not good for him and had the inevitable miseries of "the cold gray dawn of the morning after." Any one can hear all this in the first principal theme, and the melancholy, not to say dissipated, working out. In the second movement the search after peace might perhaps not occur to the superficial mind, but once it is suggested one easily discerns it, and at the same time sees clearly its utter failure. The reason why the composer cannot find peace in resignation is that he will not resign, but clings to his post at the score with a grim determination, which must arouse admiration, though it cannot give pleasure.

In the third movement even a tyro in the art of listening to modern music can see the ghosts of a misspent youth, misspent in learning how to maltreat the diatonic scale, to dissect dead chords, to make infernal machines of combinations forbidden by every prompting of artistic conscience and to abuse an orchestra by causing it to caper like a xylophone. No wonder the furies pursue this fellow. The pity of it is that they do not catch and destroy him before he begins the last movement.

[illegible] in his programme note the [illegible] not completely solve the [illegible] movement. Even he [illegible] means. He [illegible] to the empyrean [illegible] Perseus, she says pertinently, "Well, if that's poetry I don't like poetry." Doubtless there were some narrow minded persons in last night's audience who, like THE SUN'S reporter, thought, "If that's music I don't like music."

Dr. Muck seems to have conceived a desperate passion for this sort of tempest in a teapot, and we may have to hear more of the same sort. Heaven send that the next be shorter. This symphony took an hour and a quarter, which is a good deal of a brief life to give up to the consideration of a puzzle in tones.

At the conclusion of the work one felt as if he would be glad to hale Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner and Brahms into court and say to them, "You are a pretty quartet, aren't you? Now, look what you've brought us to!" But the orchestra covered itself with glory as well as with a pall of discomfort in playing this work. It is tremendously difficult. If Dr. Johnson had heard it he would have said, "Would it had been impossible."

Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the concert, played Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, that in D minor. Her art has ripened gloriously. It has lost none of its splendid power, its brilliancy, its dash, its incisiveness. But it has gained greatly in tenderness, in suavity, in color, in repose. Its qualities were beautifully and convincingly displayed in last night's performance, and the enthusiasm of the audience after hearing her admirable interpretation of Mr. MacDowell's graceful and ingratiating concerto was that of a public which had walked in darkness and had seen a great light. The concert concluded with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

NEW YORK AMERICAN.-FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1908.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NEW WORK

Symphony by Henry Bischoff Proves to Be Very Interesting.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At last night's Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck directed a very remarkable performance of a new and distinctly interesting symphony. Mme. Carreno interpreted MacDowell's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in D minor. Every sent in the house was filled and the usual enthusiasm prevailed.

The symphony of the evening (in E major) was by Hermann Bischoff, a young Munich composer, who has largely devoted himself to song writing. It is dedicated to Richard Strauss and shows frequent traces of that master's influence. In the main, however, it proceeds from the "Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz and, like that beautiful work, is more or less of a descriptive character. Half in mockery, half in earnest, Bischoff himself has classified it as programme music.

While not necessarily intended to suggest definite scenes or episodes, it was written when certain distinct ideas were in the minds of the composer, and hints, at least, at the experiences of a young rake who, after running a wild course, a la Tannhaeuser, dreams of redemption through the love of a pure woman.

The four movements are all, in various ways, effective, picturesque, vividly colored. The second (played "very quietly and in a sustained manner") is particularly beautiful.

Mme. Carreno had less scope last night in the MacDowell Concerto than on the occasion of her previous appearance this season at Carnegie Hall, when she interpreted the Tschaikowsky Concerto. She was in magnificent form, however, and delighted the large audience.

The programme ended with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted with his accustomed skill and inspiration.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK

The Symphony Orchestra returns today from New York after its third regular trip, but its stay in Boston will be brief, because on Jan. 26 it leaves for the annual trip in the middle West, and there will therefore be but two programs between now and then. Dr. Muck, who has lately been very generous in his modern novelties, returns to the classical period for the twelfth program to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

None the less there is a novelty on it, and a novelty by no less person than Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. This novelty consists of three German dances, which strangely enough seem never to have been played in Boston. They are true Wiener Waltzer and unquestionably their performance will excite a great deal of interest. The first number on the program is Haydn's Symphony in G major, better known as the "Surprise" symphony, and the last number is Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat major.

TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
JAN 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Third Concert of the Season Attended by Notable Gathering.

Selections Pleasing in Detail and Artists Give Exquisite Finish.

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, D minor Op. 23.....MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Washington .....Humperdinck

No less notable than its preceding concerts in Washington was the third recital this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterady afternoon in the National Theater. Under the direction of Carl Muck and with Mme. Carreno, probably the world's greatest woman pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony players were in their happiest mood and gave a notably artistic reading of a fine program.

Roosevelt Party Attends.

Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, was present with Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Miss Christine Roosevelt and Mrs. Launt-Palmer, a guest of the White House.

Yesterday's symphony was Brahm's Second Symphony in D major, which was beautifully read, the first movement, particularly, bringing out every little detail of the composer's delightful conception with a delicey and charming finish that swept over the entire house.

The succeeding movements of the symphony were equally well played, the finale, especially, being read with a smoothness and tranquility fascinating in the extreme.

A novelty was given Washington music lovers in the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage." The number gave a decidedly interesting and varied touch to the program and detailed the splendid groundwork of the work itself in a marvelously comprehensive manner. It was delightfully drawn and as delightfully played, the orchestra entering keenly into the spirit of the writing and giving it an exquisite finish.

Mme. Carreno Soloist.

The appearance of Mme. Carreno as soloist proved a notable event in Washington for two reasons. Mme. Carreno has not been heard often in the Capital, and yesterday she chose for her principal number Edward MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The art of Mme. Carreno, coupled with her pretty tribute to MacDowell, combined to win for her a most enthusiastic reception. Washington, as well as all America, has a keen pride in the works of this celebrated native composer, and never has any of his writings received a more beautiful interpretation than that which was given yesterday afternoon by the woman who was once his instructor.

The downpour of rain and sleet, with a driving wind, had no effect upon the enthusiasm of lovers of music. The theater was filled, and in the enjoyment of the artistic work of the orchestra and its distinguished soloist everything else was forgotten.

AMERICA
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 9 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of Season by Orchestra at the Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for this season last evening at the Lyric before its usual large audience. An ideal program was presented by Dr. Karl Muck, as follows:

Brahms—
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasa andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
MacDowell—
Concerto No. 2, D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 23.
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Chabrier—
"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.

The program, consisting of but three numbers, was without unnecessary variety, and was entirely of modern composers. The Brahms Symphony No. 2 is not probably his best, but it is strong throughout and especially beautiful in its third and fourth movements, which are rich in the rhythmic variety which is characteristic of Brahms. The Chabrier Spanish Rhapsody is a light work for orchestra, but requires most delicate and scholarly handling on the part of the conductor. It proved a good anticlimax after the splendid concerto by McDowell.

But the feature of the great concert was the personality and wonderful playing of Mme. Teresa Carreno. Her position among pianists is unique. She has more than the strength of D'Albert or Paderewsky, and a delicacy and finish in her shading which is all her own. She has the advantage of Amazonic South American blood, with the intelligence of a supernatural Valkyrior.

In her physical makeup she is not the ideal Scandinavian Creamhildt, but the ideal Brunhildt that Wagner immortalised in his operas. She has the courage of her convictions on all subjects, and has been brave enough as a South American woman to make both North and South American music known and loved throughout both the Old and the New World.

She ranks the MacDowell concerto with the A minor of Grieg and "The Emperor" of Beethoven, and she plays it both in Europe and America. After her performance of this noble work last evening she was recalled many times, and the audience insisted on violating the rule against encores until the piano undertakers appeared and put the instrument out of position.

Carreno loves Baltimore and recalled many of her former visits here when she played in concerts with the Peabody Symphony Orchestra, under Asger Hamerik. Her reception last evening amounted to an ovation.

A Large Audience.

The audience was large, many prominent members of society being present, and a large number of handsome gowns being noticed.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs.—	Mr. and Mrs.—
Randolph Barton,	Professor Moses,
Henry Wood,	H. A. Prichard,
Harold Randolph,	Frederick Gottlieb,
Henry Ward,	Oscar Leser,
J. A. Tompkins, Jr.,	Arthur Montell,
Hugh L. Bond,	Edgar H. Gans,
H. M. Matthews,	Pembroke Womble,
Charles M. Morton,	Frederick Colston,
George Hammill,	Burnstein,
H. P. Hall,	H. P. Janes,
S. Bevan Miller,	Taggart Steele,
George Penniman,	Stretlan,
George L. Zell,	Ralph Nolley,
J. H. Whiteley,	Professor Melamet,
Hugh Young,	Edward Gibson,
Roland Whitridge,	J. B. Wells,
H. W. James,	Eugene de Bullett,
Howard Thatcher,	James Young,
Frederick Savage,	Clarence Stewart.

SUN,

New York City.

JAN 12 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, January 26. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

JAN 12 1908

Goetz Symphony at Carnegie.

At the afternon function of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon there was a comparatively small attendance. This may or may not have been due to the fact that Carl Wendling, the violinist, who was to have appeared, was ill, and that the Mozart Concerto in A major, which he was to have played, had been replaced by MacDowell's "Woodland" suite. The symphony of the day was that of Goetz, in F major. It is not unknown, although seldom played here, and proved enjoyable.

[109]

SUN.

New York City.

JAN 10 1908

ONE MORE MUSIC PROBLEM

AN ELONGATED PUZZLE SYMPHONY BY BISCHOFF.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck Wade Through a Dismal Swamp of Discord—Teresa Carreno and Edward MacDowell Supply Sweetness and Light.

When an English 'bus driver refused to laugh at a good jest on the day when his father was hanged another driver remarked, "He ain't got no sense o' humor wotever!" It is impossible to tell what would make Dr. Muck, the Mephistophelian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, laugh, but it is certain that there is something very defective in his sense of humor. Otherwise he would not play in New York such a composition as the symphony in E major of Hermann Bischoff of Munich, which was the first number of the third evening of the current season at Carnegie Hall last night.

A distinguished Brooklyn pianist, going home world weary after hearing this composition, said: "It has everything in it but music." It is true. It had length, breadth, depth, thickness and opacity. It had the voices of many instruments and the perversion of many chords. It had sounds dismal, sour, chortling, elongated, somniferous. It had science and learning. It had oceans of convolutions, waves, billows of developments out of nowhere into nothing. Yet it had a purpose, for this is what its very own composer said about it:

"For some years many composers have attached importance to explicit explanations in programme books. My piece has nothing to do with 'programme music.' I believe, however, that there is no music, as there has been no music, which is not programme music in one way or another; inasmuch as there is no musical expression which does not find an analogy either in the world of facts and events or in that of poetic sentiments and sensations. Not to be out of fashion I therefore insist that my symphony presents throughout programme music. It naturally lays claim to be shaped solely in accordance with musical principles.

"In my mind is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it.

"He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement). The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet. Love of the pure woman delivers us from the filth of life. As one sees, this is an old problem that has often been treated, that has often been solved in many ways. Now if any one, hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme), should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls, if he believes that he hears passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer.

"And also if the hearer has only the idea of my work, as the cloudy and foaming must clears into still and noble wine, I may then believe that I have succeeded in working the poetical idea into that which is clearly defined and plastic."

Thus do we penetrate to the workings of a mighty genius. Goethe in his "Faust" has told us how the woman soul leadeth us ever upward and on. About the same time he exclaims, "The indescribable, here is it done." Yet Hermann Bischoff had not composed any symphonies in Goethe's day, and the author of "The Sorrows of Werther" did not like music anyhow. Suffice it to say that Bischoff's symphony may have meant much to him, but it is not likely to mean anything to the common or New York music lover.

The first movement does indeed suggest the presence of some reprehensible youth at a vaudeville performance or a circus, and there is no doubt that he drank something not good for him and had the inevitable miseries of "the cold gray dawn of the morning after." Any one can hear all this in the first principal theme, and the melancholy, not to say dissipated, working out. In the second movement the search after peace might perhaps not occur to the superficial mind, but once it is suggested one easily discerns it, and at the same time sees clearly its utter failure. The reason why the composer cannot find peace in resignation is that he will not resign, but clings to his post at the score with a grim determination, which must arouse admiration, though it cannot give pleasure.

In the third movement even a tyro in the art of listening to modern music can see the ghosts of a misspent youth, misspent in learning how to maltreat the diatonic scale, to dissect dead chords, to make infernal machines of combinations forbidden by every prompting of artistic conscience and to abuse an orchestra by causing it to caper like a xylophone. No wonder the furies pursue this fellow. The pity of it is that they do not catch and destroy him before he begins the last movement.

Note that in his programme note the composer does not completely solve the riddle of the last movement. Even he [illegible] what it meant. He invites us to dis[illegible] and foaming must clearing into noble wine. We surely see the clouds and the foam. But when the must does settle we find only sharp and stinging vinegar.

When Bunthorne soars to the empyrean in the presence of Patience, she says pertinently, "Well, if that's poetry I don't like poetry." Doubtless there were some narrow minded persons in last night's audience who, like THE SUN'S reporter, thought, "If that's music I don't like music."

Dr. Muck seems to have conceived a desperate passion for this sort of tempest in a teapot, and we may have to hear more of the same sort. Heaven send that the next be shorter. This symphony took an hour and a quarter, which is a good deal of a brief life to give up to the consideration of a puzzle in tones.

At the conclusion of the work one felt as if he would be glad to hale Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner and Brahms into court and say to them, "You are a pretty quartet, aren't you? Now, look what you've brought us to!" But the orchestra covered itself with glory as well as with a pall of discomfort in playing this work. It is tremendously difficult. If Dr. Johnson had heard it he would have said, "Would it had been impossible."

Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the concert, played Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, that in D minor. Her art has ripened gloriously. It has lost none of its splendid power, its brilliancy, its dash, its incisiveness. But it has gained greatly in tenderness, in suavity, in color, in repose. Its qualities were beautifully and convincingly displayed in last night's performance, and the enthusiasm of the audience after hearing her admirable interpretation of Mr. MacDowell's graceful and ingratiating concerto was that of a public which had walked in darkness and had seen a great light. The concert concluded with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,-FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1908.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NEW WORK

Symphony by Henry Bischoff Proves to Be Very Interesting.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

At last night's Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck directed a very remarkable performance of a new and distinctly interesting symphony. Mme. Carreno interpreted MacDowell's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in D minor. Every seat in the house was filled and the usual enthusiasm prevailed.

The symphony of the evening (in E major) was by Hermann Bischoff, a young Munich composer, who has largely devoted himself to song writing. It is dedicated to Richard Strauss and shows frequent traces of that master's influence. In the main, however, it proceeds from the "Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz and, like that beautiful work, is more or less of a descriptive character. Half in mockery, half in earnest, Bischoff himself has classified it as programme music.

While not necessarily intended to suggest definite scenes or episodes, it was written when certain distinct ideas were in the minds of the composer, and hints, at least, at the experiences of a young rake who, after running a wild course, a la Tannhaeuser, dreams of redemption through the love of a pure woman.

The four movements are all, in various ways, effective, picturesque, vividly colored. The second (played "very quietly and in a sustained manner") is particularly beautiful.

Mme. Carreno had less scope last night in the MacDowell Concerto than on the occasion of her previous appearance this season at Carnegie Hall, when she interpreted the Tschaikowsky Concerto. She was in magnificent form, however, and delighted the large audience.

The programme ended with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Dr. Muck conducted with his accustomed skill and inspiration.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK

The Symphony Orchestra returns today from New York after its third regular trip, but its stay in Boston will be brief, because on Jan. 26 it leaves for the annual trip in the middle West, and there will therefore be but two programs between now and then. Dr. Muck, who has lately been very generous in his modern novelties, returns to the classical period for the twelfth program to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

None the less there is a novelty on it, and a novelty by no less person than Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. This novelty consists of three German dances, which strangely enough seem never to have been played in Boston. They are true Wiener Waltzer and unquestionably their performance will excite a great deal of interest. The first number on the program is Haydn's Symphony in G major, better known as the "Surprise" symphony, and the last number is Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat major.

TIMES,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Third Concert of the Season Attended by Notable Gathering.

Selections Pleasing in Detail and Artists Give Exquisite Finish.

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, D minor Op. 23.....MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage" (first time in Washington Humperdinck

No less notable than its preceding concerts in Washington was the third recital this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterady afternoon in the National Theater. Under the direction of Carl Muck and with Mme. Carreno, probably the world's greatest woman pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony players were in their happiest mood and gave a notably artistic reading of a fine program.

Roosevelt Party Attends.

Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, was present with Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Miss Christine Roosevelt and Mrs. Launt-Palmer, a guest of the White House.

Yesterday's symphony was Brahm's Second Symphony in D major, which was beautifully read, the first movement, particularly, bringing out every little detail of the composer's delightful conception with a delicey and charming finish that swept over the entire house.

The succeeding movements of the symphony were equally well played, the finale, especially, being read with a smoothness and tranquility fascinating in the extreme.

A novelty was given Washington music lovers in the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage." The number gave a decidedly interesting and varied touch to the program and detailed the splendid groundwork of the work itself in a marvelously comprehensive manner. It was delightfully drawn and as delightfully played, the orchestra entering keenly into the spirit of the writing and giving it an exquisite finish.

Mme. Carreno Soloist.

The appearance of Mme. Carreno as soloist proved a notable event in Washington for two reasons. Mme. Carreno has not been heard often in the Capital, and yesterday she chose for her principal number Edward MacDowell's second concerto in D minor. The art of Mme. Carreno, coupled with her pretty tribute to MacDowell, combined to win for her a most enthusiastic reception. Washington, as well as all America, has a keen pride in the works of this celebrated native composer, and never has any of his writings received a more beautiful interpretation than that which was given yesterday afternoon by the woman who was once his instructor.

The downpour of rain and sleet, with a driving wind, had no effect upon the enthusiasm of lovers of music. The theater was filled, and in the enjoyment of the artistic work of the orchestra and its distinguished soloist everything else was forgotten.

SUN,

New York City.

JAN 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, January 26. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

JAN 1908

Goetz Symphony at Carnegie.

At the afternon function of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon there was a comparatively small attendance. This may, or may not have been due to the fact that Carl Wendling, the violinist, who was to have appeared, was ill, and that the Mozart Concerto in A major, which he was to have played, had been replaced by MacDowell's "Woodland" suite. The symphony of the day was that of Goetz, in F major. It is not unknown, although seldom played here, and proved enjoyable.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of Season by Orchestra at the Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for this season last evening at the Lyric before its usual large audience. An ideal program was presented by Dr. Karl Muck, as follows:

Brahms—
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasa and-antino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
MacDowell—
Concerto No. 2, D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 23.
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Chabrier—
"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.

The program, consisting of but three numbers, was without unnecessary variety, and was entirely of modern composers. The Brahms Symphony No. 2 is not probably his best, but it is strong throughout and especially beautiful in its third and fourth movements, which are rich in the rhythmic variety which is characteristic of Brahms. The Chabrier Spanish Rhapsody is a light work for orchestra, but requires most delicate and scholarly handling on the part of the conductor. It proved a good anticlimax after the splendid concerto by McDowell.

But the feature of the great concert was the personality and wonderful playing of Mme. Teresa Carreno. Her position among pianists is unique. She has more than the strength of D'Albert or Paderewsky, and a delicacy and finish in her shading which is all her own. She has the advantage of Amazonic South American blood, with the intelligence of a supernatural Valkyrior.

In her physical makeup she is not the ideal Scandinavian Creamhildt, but the ideal Brunhildt that Wagner immortalized in his operas. She has the courage of her convictions on all subjects, and has been brave enough as a South American woman to make both North and South American music known and loved throughout both the Old and the New World.

She ranks the MacDowell concerto with the A minor of Grieg and "The Emperor" of Beethoven, and she plays it both in Europe and America. After her performance of this noble work last evening she was recalled many times, and the audience insisted on violating the rule against encores until the piano undertakers appeared and put the instrument out of position.

Carreno loves Baltimore and recalled many of her former visits here when she played in concerts with the Peabody Symphony Orchestra, under Asger Hamerik. Her reception last evening amounted to an ovation.

A Large Audience.

The audience was large, many prominent members of society being present, and a large number of handsome gowns being noticed.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs.—	Mr. and Mrs.—
Randolph Barton,	Professor Moses,
Henry Wood,	H. A. Prichard,
Harold Randolph,	Frederick Gottlieb,
Henry Ward,	Oscar Leser,
J. A. Tompkins, Jr.,	Arthur Montell,
Hugh L. Bond,	Edgar H. Gans,
H. M. Matthews,	Pembroke Womble,
Charles M. Morton,	Frederick Colston,
George Hammill,	Burnstein,
H. P. Hall,	H. P. Janes,
S. Bevan Miller,	Taggart Steele,
George Penniman,	Stretlan,
George L. Zell,	Ralph Nolley,
J. H. Whiteley,	Professor Melamet,
Hugh Young,	Edward Gibson,
Roland Whitridge,	J. B. Wells,
H. W. James,	Eugene de Bullett,
Howard Thatcher,	James Young,
Frederick Savage,	Clarence Stewart.

[109]

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 9- 19

TRIUMPH FOR CARRENO

Noted Woman Pianist With Boston Symphony At Lyric.

WAS TEACHER OF MacDOWELL

Dr. Muck And His Players Gave A Program Of Rare Excellence Before Large Audience.

After two successive nights of grand opera Baltimore musiclovers had an opportunity last evening to enjoy a diversion in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric. It was the third of the present Baltimore series by that organization and was attended by an audience that nearly filled the building.

Dr. Muck and his men gave a thoroughly interesting performance, in which a large share of the honors fell to Mme. Theresa Carreno, the Venezuelan pianist, who was the soloist and gave MacDowell's concerto in D minor.

The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 (in D major, op. 73).....Brahms
Concerto No. 2 (D minor, for piano and orchestra, op. 23).....MacDowell
Espana (rhapsody for orchestra).....Chabrier
Soloist—Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The feature of the performance was the playing of Mme. Carreno. Her 54 years rest lightly indeed on her shoulders, and she may well lay claim to being one of the greatest women pianists. She plays with the enthusiasm of youth. While her art has the firmness and strength of a man's, it is tempered with delicacy, and her naturally unbounded enthusiasm is qualified with the restrictions of intelligence which are manifest in everything she does. Had the unfortunate MacDowell himself heard his old teacher as she gave his work such a flawless reading last evening, he would no doubt have been thrilled with emotion and the consciousness that the performer understood him perfectly.

Brahm's second symphony is believed by many to have been the greatest of the four symphonies written by that great classicist. It is replete in melodic beauty and exquisite thematic treatment, naturally and effectively developed. Of the four movements, the second and third, with their beautiful string episodes, were the most delightful.

The Chabrier rhapsody, with its brass fanfare and jingling orchestral treatment, with which the program was concluded, was in decided contrast with the dignity and artistic wholesomeness of the rest of the program. It is based on a medley of Spanish dance tunes, in which the fandango is prominent ever and anon, and in which cymbals, castenets and tambourines emphasize the whirling rhythm.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
JAN 12 1908

MUSIC.

OPERAS AND CONCERTS.

Thanks to the standards set for musical performances in this city by an exacting public, there was artistic pleasure, in some degree, awaiting the visitor who should attend any of the seven events on yesterday's calendar. If excellence of performance, consistent and unvarying, were to be the touchstone by which the potency of these musical doings should be measured, first rank would fall to the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. But, fortunately, comparisons are unnecessary, and in this case would be unprofitable, and so the record may be filled out without regard to priority of place by enumerating the rich variety of the day's offerings. Besides the Boston orchestra, the afternoon's list included Flotow's "Marta," for the first time this season, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and a third performance of Charpentier's "Louise" at the Manhattan, while at Mendelssohn Hall Mr. Charles W. Clark gave a song recital. In the evening there was a Verdi opera at popular prices at each house, "Aida" being sung by Mr. Conried's company and "Il Trovatore" by the forces of Mr. Hammerstein. There was also a piano recital by Mr. Wesley Weyman at Mendelssohn Hall.

Had the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme been carried out as originally planned, with Mozart's fifth violin concerto as the solo number, the range of yesterday's entertainments would have covered most of the familiar forms of serious music. But the indisposition of Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who was to have played the Mozart piece, caused the substitution of a number without solo performer, and the choice fell upon Edward MacDowell's delicate and fanciful suite in A minor, Op. 42. It was good to hear this charming music once more and to note afresh, as Dr. Muck and the Boston virtuosi played it, the ingenuity and the unfailing beauty of this score. Its inclusion would have been more fortunate, however, had not the symphony been that of Hermann Goetz, in F major, which derives as much from Schumann as did the MacDowell suite from Raff. The result was a lack of contrast, which lessened the concert's vitality and grip. It is no disrespect to the suite and the symphony to say that the most modern work on the list was the delightful F major concerto for strings and two wind orchestras by George Frederick Handel, written perhaps a hundred and seventy years ago, and played with spirit and relish by the band.

EVENING POST,
Address
New York City.
JAN 1

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck is an ungrateful man. He has now conducted more than a dozen concerts in New York; he has always been admired, applauded, praised in the press, commended for keeping the Boston Orchestra up to its high standard of technical excellence, while giving it a much greater variety of expression—especially dynamic—than his predecessor gave. In return for all this wholesale laudation, what has he now done? With truly Mephistophelian malice he inflicted on last night's audience at Carnegie Hall a symphony by Hermann Bischoff of Munich, a pupil, admirer, and imitator of Richard Strauss; a symphony so unutterably dreary, stupid, empty, noisy, cacophonous, piercing, purposeless, chaotic, and long-drawn out—it lasted an hour and a quarter—that many must have wondered why such a monstrosity should be imposed on an unoffending and friendly audience.

The mystery is easily solved. Bischoff has learned how to write effectively for a big orchestra. His symphony gives excellent opportunity to show how fine a band the Boston orchestra is in all its groups. The playing last night was superlatively good—alas that it should have been wasted on such trash! What was most irritating and unpardonable was the length of the thing. It is the same old story: the less a man has to say the longer it takes him to say it. To go into details about such a symphony would be a mistake. One reason why certain composers write very long pieces is because the foolish critics as a rule give space and attention to a new work in proportion to its duration. They are thus partly responsible for such inflictions.

Ample atonement for the Bischoff symphony was provided by the second half of the programme, which comprised the second MacDowell concerto and Dvorák's fiery "Carnival Overture," in which the wild mirth of a band of merry maskers is portrayed in the Bohemian's most animated style. But the climax of the concert was the concerto by America's foremost composer. It descended on the audience like a flood of sunshine after one of those Bavarian hailstorms against which the farmers take out a special insurance. It is one of Mr. MacDowell's most inspired works, melodious, delightfully idiomatic, both for the piano and the orchestra, replete with dainty bits of color and novel rhythms, and of sustained interest. It is difficult to play—to bring out all its beauties—but the pianist was Mme. Teresa Carreño—what more need be said? She has made this work by her former pupil known to audiences all over Europe, and she renders it with a combination of brilliancy and tenderness, of tonal strength and delicacy, of bravura and poetic insight, that never fails to entrance an audience. Many a time has she been compelled to repeat the scherzo; the audience wanted to hear it again last night; the pianist had to rise and bow several times in response to the enthusiastic applause; but the rules of the Boston Orchestra forbid such a thing. After the concerto, Mme. Carreño was recalled many times—twice even after the lid had been put down over the piano, so that there was in this gratitude no "lively sense of favors to come." She will give a recital at Carnegie Hall on Sunday afternoon.

Breitkopf & Härtel have just issued the final edition of the MacDowell concerto, edited by Mr. W. H. Humiston, who made the score correspond with the MS. containing the composer's last revisions. The most important change made from the version used last night is that the strings are muted in the opening orchestral passage.

The production of Dvorák's splendid "Carnival" overture recalls a bit of interesting local history to which Mr. Philip Hale thus refers in the programme book: "The first performance (of this overture) was at a concert given October 21, 1892, under the auspices of the National Conservatory of Music . . . . in honor of Dvorák, who then made his first appearance in this country. The solo singers were Mme. de Vere-Sapio and Mr. Emil Fischer. The orchestra was the Metropolitan. Mr. R. H. Warren conducted 'America'; Col. T. W. Higginson delivered an oration, 'Two New Worlds: The New World of Columbus and the New World of Music'; Liszt's 'Tasso' was played, conducted by Mr. Seidl; the Triple Overture and a Te Deum (expressly written for the occasion) were performed under the direction of the composer. The programme stated that the Triple Overture had not yet been performed in public."

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser
Date JAN 10 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

DR. MUCK continued his missionary work for modern music by introducing to New York at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last evening, a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, one of the younger German composers, now living in Munich. The preachment lasted nearly an hour and a quarter. Schubert's C major symphony, which takes fifty minutes in performance, has been blamed for its "heavenly length."

Concerning Bischoff even the invincible industry of the accomplished compiler and the Boston orchestra's programme books has discovered little. Three things are clear: Bischoff is now alive, he has foregathered with Richard Strauss, on the occasion of the performance of this symphony at Essen he wrote a statement about his intentions and an analysis. This curious document we reprint:

"In my mind is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it.

"He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement). The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as Furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet. Love of the pure woman delivers us from the filth of life. As one sees, this is an old problem that has often been treated, that has often been solved in many ways. Now if any one hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer.

"And also if the hearer has only the idea of my work, as the cloudy and foaming must clears into still and noble wine, I may then believe that I have succeeded in working the poetical idea into that which is clearly defined and plastic."

Let not a programme discourage the listener. Immortal songs have been written to commonplace words. A great symphony might be written to a trite programme. The present symphony is colossal in its dimensions, and, you are likely to conclude at the end of an hour and a quarter, in its power to bore. The first movement, depicting a misspent youth, is (alas for the moralist!) the most interesting of the four. The themes are obvious, even vulgar, but they lend themselves to vivacity of treatment, and for a single hearing the results are unquestionably entertaining. But presently the music begins to look green and pale at what it did so freely. The second movement is as dismal as the slough of despond. The scherzo is unquestionably clever, but cleverness is sometimes a scourge. The finale has a portentous glorification that might be imposing if it were not so long. That the symphony makes a great noise and that this noise is frequently, nay generally, ingeniously discordant, is to be expected from an "advanced" German composer. Heard melodies may be sweet, as Keats admits, but melodies unheard are sweeter.

The performance of the symphony, a work of infinite difficulty, was an astonishing exhibition of virtuosity on the part of the orchestra and of devotion and skill on the part of the conductor.

The rest of the concert was more ingratiating, consisting as it did of Mr. MacDowell's second piano concerto, played by Mme Carreño, and of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Considering the few really fine piano concertos and the many really fine pianists one is surprised that this concerto by Mr. MacDowell, a work so individual and so charming, is not heard oftener. At least Mme Carreño has shown a fondness for it and has played it often, both here and in Europe. Mme Carreño's performance last night evoked thunderous applause. She played with amazing brilliance, vitality, power. And yet she did not neglect the romantic feeling of the composition. Hers was superb playing in the "grand style."

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date JAN 12 1908

The Boston Symphony.

Through the illness of Mr. Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have played Mozart's violin concerto in A major, No. 5, at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck was compelled to alter his programme. The conductor presented instead MacDowell's suite in A minor, opus 42. The other numbers were Handel's concerto in F major, for two wind choirs and string orchestra, in Gustav Kogel's edition, and Goetz's symphony in F major, opus 9. With no soloist the list hardly represented one that was happily chosen. Yet the music was more than welcome. The five movements of the Handel concerto were played with wonderful richness of tone and dynamical balance. The romantic Goetz symphony, a composition all too seldom performed, was given with grace, charm and an irresistible exuberance of feeling. This work is not among the most original creations of its period, but it takes a much higher rank than has generally been conceded to it. Comparison with contemporary works of Rubinstein and Jensen are exceedingly flattering to Goetz. The symphony is characterized by melodic spontaneity, polyphonic beauty and glowing enthusiasm.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
ess
JAN 10 1908

Karl Muck with his [illegible] —'twas a Providence [illegible] so we hear, and not [illegible] symphony, that did it—caused [illegible] eight Boston Orchestra men to stand in Carnegie Hall last night after the [illegible] of Hermann Bischoff's symphony [illegible] rake's progress. No jokes on the rake are in order to-day. The stern leader smiled as he conducted, too. And frankly, when giddy young [illegible] goes in for symphonic slumming expeditions it leaves little old New York, with all our veritist Isoldes, our rival Traviatas, our up-to-date Thaïs and Louise yearnings, a long, long way behind. The most famous band in absolute music's service took an hour and twenty minutes to play that new work in which a young Münchener, a friend and follower of Strauss, had tried to dramatize the "past" of a bad, bad man about town where the beer comes from.

Young Hermann Bischoff is a true Münchener, as genuine as the little painted bishop on the steins. He has done a useful, necessary work in spite of much dirt and dust of conflict. He seeks to find what we are coming to in modern music, and he attempts to harmonize the discords of modern life, as Strauss did, by "quoting" his own earlier works. It is most naïvely done. "My famous drinking song," as in cut A, so to speak, is cited in the first disclosure of details of the debauchee. We recognized at least one ballet girl among those kaleidoscopic love scenes. And then "a quotation from Bischoff's song, 'Letzte Bitte,'" sustained that second movement of harping on the R-E-M-O-R-S-E string.

Ghosts of a misspent youth reappeared in the scherzo, or third part, to be interrupted by the eternal if not womanly "solo violin." Oh! "Heldenleben" and all thy "Hero's works" and "Wifely consolation." But this symphony of two parts "Don Juan" and "Domestica" and one part "Till Owlglass" was fun to hear, if you could spare the time.

Its unheavenly length; if not theme, left your senses dulled now and then, and you started up about every quarter hour as one awakened from reverie or slumber, to ask, "And what are they doing now?"

At the same time, this music was both new and alive. It was no dead Bruckner issue, and the splendid behavior of both audience and orchestra was such as no other concert or operatic production could have met with. Bostonians played to admiration and the serious men in the band believed in their music.

There were those present, on this anniversary night, who hoped that another 150 visits might pass before such another symphony. At least Dr. Muck has shown what the Germans after Strauss and Reger are doing to-day.

A concerto with a "presto giocoso," not to say a sense of humor, was a whirlwind success after a symphony without any humor at all. And Dvorak's "Carnival" ended the evening merrily.

Teresa Carreño, who, thirty years ago was teaching a little boy, Edward MacDowell, in New York, was a radiant, green-spangled star soloist in that boy's piano concerto No. 2, which MacDowell himself first played with the Boston Orchestra in 1889.

Only Philadelphia and Manhattan heard the Bischoff music. The symphony for hungrier music-lovers in Washington, Baltimore and, to-night, for Brooklyn, was the second of Brahms.

Carreño plays for the fifth and last time to-night, the Manhattan matinée star being Concertmaster Carl Wendling.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
JAN 12 1908

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Bostoner gaben gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall vor dem wie üblich ganz gefüllten Saal ein Konzert unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck, das infolge Unwohlseins des als Solisten in Aussicht genommenen Konzertmeisters des Orchesters, Herrn Carl Wendling, ohne solistische Mithülfe verlief. An Stelle des Mozartschen Violin-Concerts in A-Dur, das Herr Wendling spielen sollte, wurde MacDowell's A-Moll-Suite Op. 42 aufgeführt, selbstverständlich in vollendeter Weise. Die übrigen Orchester-Nummern waren Hermann Goetz's F-Dur-Symphonie Op. 9 und Haendel's F-Dur-Concert für zwei Bläser-Chöre und Streichorchester in der Bearbeitung von Gustav Kogel. Diese Vorführungen geben zu besonderen Bemerkungen keinen Anlaß; — muß man immer wieder hervorheben, daß die Klangschönheit und die Virtuosität der Bostoner musterhaft sind? So war es auch gestern.

[110]

JUN

JAN 9 - 1908

TRIUMPH FOR CARRENO

Noted Woman Pianist With Boston Symphony At Lyric.

WAS TEACHER OF MacDOWELL

Dr. Muck And His Players Gave A Program Of Rare Excellence Before Large Audience.

After two successive nights of grand opera Baltimore musiclovers had an opportunity last evening to enjoy a diversion in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric. It was the third of the present Baltimore series by that organization and was attended by an audience that nearly filled the building.

Dr. Muck and his men gave a thoroughly interesting performance, in which a large share of the honors fell to Mme. Theresa Carreno, the Venezuelan pianist, who was the soloist and gave MacDowell's concerto in D minor.

The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 (in D major, op. 73).....Brahms
Concerto No. 2 (D minor, for piano and orchestra, op. 23).....MacDowell
Espana (rhapsody for orchestra).....Chabrier
Soloist—Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The feature of the performance was the playing of Mme. Carreno. Her 54 years rest lightly indeed on her shoulders, and she may well lay claim to being one of the greatest women pianists. She plays with the enthusiasm of youth. While her art has the firmness and strength of a man's, it is tempered with delicacy, and her naturally unbounded enthusiasm is qualified with the restrictions of intelligence which are manifest in everything she does. Had the unfortunate MacDowell himself heard his old teacher as she gave his work such a flawless reading last evening, he would no doubt have been thrilled with emotion and the consciousness that the performer understood him perfectly.

Brahm's second symphony is believed by many to have been the greatest of the four symphonies written by that great classicist. It is replete in melodic beauty and exquisite thematic treatment, naturally and effectively developed. Of the four movements, the second and third, with their beautiful string episodes, were the most delightful.

The Chabrier rhapsody, with its brass fanfare and jingling orchestral treatment, with which the program was concluded, was in decided contrast with the dignity and artistic wholesomeness of the rest of the program. It is based on a medley of Spanish dance tunes, in which the fandango is prominent ever and anon, and in which cymbals, castenets and tambourines emphasize the whirling rhythm.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date JAN 1908

MUSIC.

OPERAS AND CONCERTS.

Thanks to the standards set for musical performances in this city by an exacting public, there was artistic pleasure, in some degree, awaiting the visitor who should attend any of the seven events on yesterday's calendar. If excellence of performance, consistent and unvarying, were to be the touchstone by which the potency of these musical doings should be measured, first rank would fall to the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. But, fortunately, comparisons are unnecessary, and in this case would be unprofitable, and so the record may be filled out without regard to priority of place by enumerating the rich variety of the day's offerings. Besides the Boston orchestra, the afternoon's list included Flotow's "Marta," for the first time this season, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and a third performance of Charpentier's "Louise" at the Manhattan, while at Mendelssohn Hall Mr. Charles W. Clark gave a song recital. In the evening there was a Verdi opera at popular prices at each house, "Aïda" being sung by Mr. Conried's company and "Il Trovatore" by the forces of Mr. Hammerstein. There was also a piano recital by Mr. Wesley Weyman at Mendelssohn Hall.

Had the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme been carried out as originally planned, with Mozart's fifth violin concerto as the solo number, the range of yesterday's entertainments would have covered most of the familiar forms of serious music. But the indisposition of Mr. Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who was to have played the Mozart piece, caused the substitution of a number without solo performer, and the choice fell upon Edward MacDowell's delicate and fanciful suite in A minor, Op. 42. It was good to hear this charming music once more and to note afresh, as Dr. Muck and the Boston virtuosi played it, the ingenuity and the unfailing beauty of this score. Its inclusion would have been more fortunate, however, had not the symphony been that of Hermann Goetz, in F major, which derives as much from Schumann as did the MacDowell suite from Raff. The result was a lack of contrast, which lessened the concert's vitality and grip. It is no disrespect to the suite and the symphony to say that the most modern work on the list was the delightful F major concerto for strings and two wind orchestras by George Frederick Handel, written perhaps a hundred and seventy years ago, and played with spirit and relish by the band.

EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date JAN

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck is an ungrateful man. He has now conducted more than a dozen concerts in New York; he has always been admired, applauded, praised in the press, commended for keeping the Boston Orchestra up to its high standard of technical excellence, while giving it a much greater variety of expression—especially dynamic—than his predecessor gave. In return for all this wholesale laudation, what has he now done? With truly Mephistophelian malice he inflicted on last night's audience at Carnegie Hall a symphony by Hermann Bischoff of Munich, a pupil, admirer, and imitator of Richard Strauss; a symphony so unutterably dreary, stupid, empty, noisy, cacophonous, piercing, purposeless, chaotic, and long-drawn out—it lasted an hour and a quarter—that many must have wondered why such a monstrosity should be imposed on an unoffending and friendly audience.

The mystery is easily solved. Bischoff has learned how to write effectively for a big orchestra. His symphony gives excellent opportunity to show how fine a band the Boston orchestra is in all its groups. The playing last night was superlatively good—alas that it should have been wasted on such trash! What was most irritating and unpardonable was the length of the thing. It is the same old story: the less a man has to say the longer it takes him to say it. To go into details about such a symphony would be a mistake. One reason why certain composers write very long pieces is because the foolish critics as a rule give space and attention to a new work in proportion to its duration. They are thus partly responsible for such inflictions.

Ample atonement for the Bischoff symphony was provided by the second half of the programme, which comprised the second MacDowell concerto and Dvorák's fiery "Carnival Overture," in which the wild mirth of a band of merry maskers is portrayed in the Bohemian's most animated style. But the climax of the concert was the concerto by America's foremost composer. It descended on the audience like a flood of sunshine after one of those Bavarian hailstorms against which the farmers take out a special insurance. It is one of Mr. MacDowell's most inspired works, melodious, delightfully idiomatic, both for the piano and the orchestra, replete with dainty bits of color and novel rhythms, and of sustained interest. It is difficult to play—to bring out all its beauties—but the pianist was Mme. Teresa Carreño—what more need be said? She has made this work by her former pupil known to audiences all over Europe, and she renders it with a combination of brilliancy and tenderness, of tonal strength and delicacy, of bravura and poetic insight, that never fails to entrance an audience. Many a time has she been compelled to repeat the scherzo; the audience wanted to hear it again last night; the pianist had to rise and bow several times in response to the enthusiastic applause; but the rules of the Boston Orchestra forbid such a thing. After the concerto, Mme. Carreño was recalled many times—twice even after the lid had been put down over the piano, so that there was in this gratitude no "lively sense of favors to come." She will give a recital at Carnegie Hall on Sunday afternoon.

Breitkopf & Härtel have just issued the final edition of the MacDowell concerto, edited by Mr. W. H. Humiston, who made the score correspond with the MS. containing the composer's last revisions. The most important change made from the version used last night is that the strings are muted in the opening orchestral passage.

The production of Dvorák's splendid "Carnival" overture recalls a bit of interesting local history to which Mr. Philip Hale thus refers in the programme book: "The first performance (of this overture) was at a concert given October 21, 1892, under the auspices of the National Conservatory of Music . . . in honor of Dvorák, who then made his first appearance in this country. The solo singers were Mme. de Vere-Sapio and Mr. Emil Fischer. The orchestra was the Metropolitan. Mr. R. H. Warren conducted 'America'; Col. T. W. Higginson delivered an oration, 'Two New Worlds: The New World of Columbus and the New World of Music'; Liszt's 'Tasso' was played, conducted by Mr. Seidl; the Triple Overture and a Te Deum (expressly written for the occasion) were performed under the direction of the composer. The programme stated that the Triple Overture had not yet been performed in public."

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser, NEW YORK'S BEST NEWSPAPER.
Date JAN 10 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

DR. MUCK continued his missionary work for modern music by introducing to New York at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last evening, a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, one of the younger German composers, now living in Munich. The preachment lasted nearly an hour and a quarter. Schubert's C major symphony, which takes fifty minutes in performance, has been blamed for its "heavenly length."

Concerning Bischoff even the invincible industry of the accomplished compiler and the Boston orchestra's programme books has discovered little. Three things are clear: Bischoff is now alive, he has foregathered with Richard Strauss, on the occasion of the performance of this symphony at Essen he wrote a statement about his intentions and an analysis. This curious document we reprint:

"In my mind is the story of a young man who, living a wild and debauched life, becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer worthy of it and therefore cannot possess it.

"He seeks in vain to find peace in resignation (second movement). The ghosts of his misspent youth appear again, as Furies following him, pursuing him (third movement). Again appears that noble and beautiful womanly apparition (intermediate passage), and the voices of darkness, hushed, are quiet. Love of the pure woman delivers us from the filth of life. As one sees, this is an old problem that has often been treated, that has often been solved in many ways. Now if any one hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmuring in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer.

"And also if the hearer has only the idea of my work, as the cloudy and foaming must clears into still and noble wine, I may then believe that I have succeeded in working the poetical idea into that which is clearly defined and plastic."

Let not a programme discourage the listener. Immortal songs have been written to commonplace words. A great symphony might be written to a trite programme. The present symphony is colossal in its dimensions, and, you are likely to conclude at the end of an hour and a quarter, in its power to bore. The first movement, depicting a misspent youth, is (alas for the moralist!) the most interesting of the four. The themes are obvious, even vulgar, but they lend themselves to vivacity of treatment, and for a single hearing the results are unquestionably entertaining. But presently the music begins to look green and pale at what it did so freely. The second movement is as dismal as the slough of despond. The scherzo is unquestionably clever, but cleverness is sometimes a scourge. The finale has a portentous glorification that might be imposing if it were not so long. That the symphony makes a great noise and that this noise is frequently, nay generally, ingeniously discordant, is to be expected from an "advanced" German composer. Heard melodies may be sweet, as Keats admits, but melodies unheard are sweeter.

The performance of the symphony, a work of infinite difficulty, was an astonishing exhibition of virtuosity on the part of the orchestra and of devotion and skill on the part of the conductor.

The rest of the concert was more ingratiating, consisting as it did of Mr. MacDowell's second piano concerto, played by Mme Carreño, and of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Considering the few really fine piano concertos and the many really fine pianists one is surprised that this concerto by Mr. MacDowell, a work so individual and so charming, is not heard oftener. At least Mme Carreño has shown a fondness for it and has played it often, both here and in Europe. Mme Carreño's performance last night evoked thunderous applause. She played with amazing brilliance, vitality, power. And yet she did not neglect the romantic feeling of the composition. Hers was superb playing in the "grand style."

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date JAN 12 1908

The Boston Symphony.

Through the illness of Mr. Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have played Mozart's violin concerto in A major, No. 5, at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck was compelled to alter his programme. The conductor presented instead MacDowell's suite in A minor, opus 42. The other numbers were Handel's concerto in F major, for two wind choirs and string orchestra, in Gustav Kogel's edition, and Goetz's symphony in F major, opus 9. With no soloist the list hardly represented one that was happily chosen. Yet the music was more than welcome. The five movements of the Handel concerto were played with wonderful richness of tone and dynamical balance. The romantic Goetz symphony, a composition all too seldom performed, was given with grace, charm and an irresistible exuberance of feeling. This work is not among the most original creations of its period, but it takes a much higher rank than has generally been conceded to it. Comparison with contemporary works of Rubinstein and Jensen are exceedingly flattering to Goetz. The symphony is characterized by melodic spontaneity, polyphonic beauty and glowing enthusiasm.

ess
Date JAN 10 1908

Karl Muck with his right hand in bandages—'twas a Providence, R. I., carriage door, so we hear, and not that newest Munich symphony, that did it—caused all his ninety-eight Boston Orchestra men to stand up in Carnegie Hall last night after the scherzo of Hermann Bischoff's symphony of a rake's progress. No jokes on the Muck rake are in order to-day. The stern, spare leader smiled as he conducted, though. And frankly, when giddy young Boston goes in for symphonic slumming expeditions it leaves little old New York, with all our veritist Isoldes, our rival Traviatas, our up-to-date Thaïs and Louise young persons, a long, long way behind. The most famous band in absolute music's service took an hour and twenty minutes to play that new work in which a young Münchener, a friend and follower of Strauss, had tried to dramatize the "past" of a bad, bad man about town where the beer comes from.

Young Hermann Bischoff is a true Münchener, as genuine as the little painted bishop on the steins. He has done a useful, necessary work in spite of much dirt and dust of conflict. He seeks to find what we are coming to in modern music, and he attempts to harmonize the discords of modern life, as Strauss did, by "quoting" his own earlier works. It is most naïvely done. "My famous drinking song," as in cut A, so to speak, is cited in the first disclosure of details of the debauchee. We recognized at least one ballet girl among those kaleidoscopic love scenes. And then "a quotation from Bischoff's song, 'Letzte Bitte,'" sustained that second movement of harping on the R-E-M-O-R-S-E string.

Ghosts of a misspent youth reappeared in the scherzo, or third part, to be interrupted by the eternal if not womanly "solo violin." Oh! "Heldenleben" and all thy "Hero's works" and "Wifely consolation." But this symphony of two parts "Don Juan" and "Domestica" and one part "Till Owlglass" was fun to hear, if you could spare the time.

Its unheavenly length, if not theme, left your senses dulled now and then, and you started up about every quarter hour as one awakened from reverie or slumber, to ask, "And what are they doing now?"

At the same time, this music was both new and alive. It was no dead Bruckner issue, and the splendid behavior of both audience and orchestra was such as no other concert or operatic production could have met with. Bostonians played to admiration and the serious men in the band believed in their music.

There were those present, on this anniversary night, who hoped that another 150 visits might pass before such another symphony. At least Dr. Muck has shown what the Germans after Strauss and Reger are doing to-day.

A concerto with a "presto giocoso," not to say a sense of humor, was a whirlwind success after a symphony without any humor at all. And Dvorak's "Carnival" ended the evening merrily.

Teresa Carreño, who, thirty years ago, was teaching a little boy, Edward MacDowell, in New York, was a radiant, green-spangled star soloist in that boy's piano concerto No. 2, which MacDowell himself first played with the Boston Orchestra in 1889.

Only Philadelphia and Manhattan heard the Bischoff music. The symphony for hungrier music-lovers in Washington, Baltimore and, to-night, for Brooklyn, was the second of Brahms.

Carreño plays for the fifth and last time to-night, the Manhattan matinée star being Concertmaster Carl Wendling.

om STAATS ZEITUNG, ldress New York City.
ate

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Bostoner gaben gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall vor dem wie üblich ganz gefüllten Saal ein Konzert unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck, das infolge Unwohlseins des als Solisten in Aussicht genommenen Konzertmeisters des Orchesters, Herrn Carl Wendling, ohne solistische Mithülfe verlief. An Stelle des Mozartschen Violin-Concerts in A-Dur, das Herr Wendling spielen sollte, wurde MacDowell's A-Moll-Suite Op. 42 aufgeführt, selbstverständlich in vollendeter Weise. Die übrigen Orchester-Nummern waren Hermann Goetz's F-Dur-Symphonie Op. 9 und Haendel's F-Dur-Concert für zwei Bläser-Chöre und Streichorchester in der Bearbeitung von Gustav Kogel. Diese Vorführungen geben zu besonderen Bemerkungen keinen Anlaß; — muß man immer wieder hervorheben, daß die Klangschönheit und die Virtuosität der Bostoner musterhaft sind? So war es auch gestern.

Newspaper Cuttings from the World's Press

NEW YORK HERALD

JAN 10 1908

NEW SYMPHONY WELL GIVEN BY BOSTON BAND.

Composition by Hermann Bischoff Has Charm and Worth.—"Tristan und Isolde" Repeated

A very large audience listened to another of Dr. Muck's original programmes played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall last night. This was the first concert of the third visit to New York, and great gains were shown in ensemble, freedom and the more subtle elements which were disturbed through the reorganization which occurred this season.

Mr. Muck's offerings were a new symphony by a new writer, one Hermann Bischoff, of Munich; Edward A. MacDowell's second concerto for piano, played by Mme. Carreno, once MacDowell's teacher, and Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture.

Bischoff is a young German, evidently in the storm and stress period of his career. He has no serious exaggerations, unless extreme length may be regarded as such; it is even a question whether he has not justified this length by not repeating himself more than is necessary to his purpose, and it is a fact that he does not fail to hold the interest as he wends his way stormily or peacefully through charming melodies deftly handled.

He will work out of the present influences, the strongest of which he frankly avows by dedicating this symphony to Richard Strauss, to whom he relates himself more in theme than in his treatment of it. He is more sane, perhaps the Straussite would prefer to say less daring, in orchestration and in dissonances. Bischoff also knows his Handel, as was evident in the beautiful second movement, but is not a jump from Strauss back to Handel in itself original?

There are traces of all the later forces, not omitting Wagner, Schumann and Puccini. However, without taking into consideration these details, the symphony has genuine charm and undoubted worth.

In great contrast was MacDowell's second piano concerto, written in a style welcome through its almost naive messages of simplicity and tenderness. Mme. Carreno brought to this the great wealth of her art, which seems to encompass everything. The work and its presentation elicited long and spontaneous applause. Dr. Muck gave it magnificent support and brought a new and worthy orchestral word from MacDowell.

* * *

At the concert to be given Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling will not play as announced, but in place of his number Dr. Muck will give the MacDowell suite.

* * *

SUN,

New York City.

JAN 12 1908

THE MUSIC OF A SATURDAY

Four Operatic Performances, One Orchestral Concert and Two Recitals.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall was attended by a small audience. The programme consisted of Handel's concerto in F major for two wind choirs and string orchestra, recently played by Mr. Damrosch's men; MacDowell's suite in A minor, opus 42, and Goetz's symphony in F major, opus 9.

The playing of the oboes and horns in the Handel number was something to be remembered because of its technical excellence and its delightful style, while in the two other numbers the entire orchestra furnished pleasure of the kind so familiar at the concerts of these welcome visitors from Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. Mr. MacDowell's suite was heard again with satisfaction, though no one would select it as the work on which to rest a reputation so great as that accorded to this composer.

Charles W. Clark, a barytone who dwells in Chicago and has sung in other places, gave a song recital in the afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. His programme was made along the usual lines but contained some songs out of the hackneyed list, among them one by Walter Rummel, the talented son of the pianist, Franz Rummel. Mr. Clark's beauty of voice is as great as ever and he still sings with intelligence and feeling, though with occasional exaggerations of manner which might be omitted to the improvement of his style.

Wesley Weyman, who gave a piano recital in the evening in Mendelssohn Hall, is a player of some taste and skill perhaps better fitted to entertain in a salon than in a concert hall. His style is fluent rather than impressive. However, he has friends and they like to hear him play. There is no reason why he should not have to do so.

TIMES,

New York City.

JAN 12 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Wendling Indisposed and MacDowell's Suite Substituted for Mozart's Violin Concerto.

There were no problems for the audience at the second concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave on its third visit yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme was changed from that originally announced. Mr. Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, who was to play a violin concerto by Mozart, was indisposed, and instead of it Dr. Muck substituted Edward MacDowell's suite for orchestra in A minor, op. 42. Before it came Gustav Kogel's arrangement of Handel's concerto grosso in F for the wind choirs and string orchestra, and after it Hermann Goetz's symphony, also in F.

A couple of movements from Handel's concerto were played a few days before by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kogel has kept five out of the original nine in his edition of the work, and it was therefore proper that the programme book announced the performance as "the first in this form in New York." The five movements all have the Handelian grand style, and as they were presented by the Boston orchestra they are of most delightful tonal color. The two wind choirs—two oboes, horns, and bassoons in each—are used as the "concertino" or solo group, often antiphonally answering each other and the string orchestra, after the manner of the now obsolete concerto grosso. The oboe solos in the third movement were played with beautiful phrasing and clear articulation, and in the last the horns, dominating in rapid and swinging melodic passages, likewise distinguished themselves. The audience listened to this fine performance of music characteristic of Handel's virile and stately manner with a singular apathy.

Mr. MacDowell's suite is frankly in the landscape manner of his master, Raff, as represented by his symphony "Im Walde." It has the typical German romantic view of the woods—a word which, it has been said, no German can pronounce, in his native tongue without bursting into tears. Americans, on the other hand, are accused of looking upon the forest as so much potential cord wood. It is not cord wood to Mr. MacDowell; it is a place of haunted nooks, of lurking sprites, and upon its borders he can find Summer idyls and shepherdesses' songs. The adult mind, even of this century, can still put itself into a receptive frame for such images. So the musician, likewise, can put himself into a frame of mind to depict them, but it is a more or less deliberate procedure. The result is that Mr. MacDowell's suite, however plausible and pretty, is hardly serious, and it is not one of his strongest works. It is a little artificial, a playing with tones, with bright and delicately flashing orchestration evoking Mendelssohnian fairies and agreeable Grimm's fairy story telling. Listened to as such it is pretty, mirthful, and charming music that goes very little below the surface. It was dextrously played, and its fundamental character was admirably set forth. It was notable that Mr. MacDowell's name should thus appear on two successive programmes of the Boston Orchestra, following after the concerto that Mme. Carreño played on Thursday night.

It was pleasant to hear Hermann Goetz's symphony again, which has fallen into neglect after the vogue it had a generation ago. It was absurdly overpraised at one time. To-day it seems like agreeable music—also somewhat touched with the Mendelssohnian spirit—melodious with a freshness that is hardly stated, propounding no philosophy, and grappling with no problems, a stranger to "Weltschmerz"; not even following out a "poetic idea." If it is out of the fashion on these accounts, it none the less holds the attention, and if it does not deeply stir it gives pleasure and stimulates the purely musical imagination. Dr. Muck read it, as he does everything, with complete devotion to the spirit and the letter, and the orchestra achieved a brilliant and spirited performance.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

Date JAN 12 1908

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

The Day's Music.

If all the men and women who listened to music yesterday afternoon and evening in the concert halls and opera houses of Manhattan were formed in ranks they would form a mighty army; and if all the sound put forth could be concentrated into a single explosion of noise it would lift the roof off any ordinary building.

The afternoon offerings in the two opera houses were "Marta" and "Louise," Flotow's popular work having its first presentation of the season in Conried's stronghold, and Charpentier's music-drama being sung for the third time by Hammerstein's company. Carnegie and Mendelssohn halls also had their doors open at this time of day. In the Fifty-seventh street house the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, gave its regular matinee concert, and in the smaller hall, in Forty-fourth street, Charles W. Clark, an American baritone, sang songs to an appreciative audience.

In the evening Conried produced "Aida," with Lucas for the first time as Radames, and Hammerstein put "Trovatore" on the Manhattan boards, with Zenatello as the drawing card. Wesley Weyman simultaneously played piano music in Mendelssohn Hall. What more could any one expect in a single day?

NEW YORK HE...

(See other side.)

Address BROOKLYN EDIT...

Date JAN 11 1908

JAN 11 1908

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Brooklyn residents taxed the limit of the capacity of the Baptist Temple last evening for the third concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Theresa Carreno as the assisting soloist. A brilliant programme was rendered with the interpretation which Dr. Muck is wont to give with the Boston players at their best. Brahms' Second Symphony in D major opened the programme, while Edward MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D minor, opus 23, was the selection which Mme. Carreno played with the orchestra. The concluding number was Humperdinck's overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage."

After the concert a reception was given to Dr. and Mrs. Carl Muck by the Barnard Club at its rooms, No. 137 Remsen street. The Woman's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic Concerts, of which Mrs. Camden C. Dike is the president, co-operated in this reception.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 11 1908

Paderewski's last performance in the East before he departed on his four months' tour of the middle and far West was at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, on Sunday evening, December 29. He played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and he received a tremendous ovation from the audience, which filled every corner of Boston's great music hall. After the concert Dr. Muck, the conductor, in behalf o fthe orchestra, presented a handsome silver bowl to the pianist as a token of the orchestra's appreciation of what he had done for it, and a sign of the warm friendship of the members for him. Mr. Paderewski left Boston on January 2 in his private car, his first stop being Akron, O., and his second Cincinnati. He was accompanied by Mme. Paderewski, and his numerous staff. The car will be his home until the end of April, when he ends his tour.

Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society was given last night at the Baptist Temple, and as at the previous concerts, there was a full attendance of Brooklyn music lovers. Dr. Karl Muck conducted and Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist.

The Brahms music was his second symphony in D major, op 73, and was in four movements. This symphony emphasizes all that is peaceful, tender and serene in music, and runs from quick, joyous humor to the deepest seriousness, is filled with delightful and entrancing melody throughout. The orchestra, under Dr. Muck's careful leadership, did full justice to this great work.

For the piano Mme. Carreno selected one of the works of Edward MacDowell, a New Yorker, and a former pupil, who still resides in Manhattan. Mme. Carreno was at her best last evening, and her wonderful playing of this melodious music, which was divided into three movements, was rewarded by applause so continued that she was obliged to appear several times and bow her thanks.

The concert closed with Humperdinck's "Forced Marriage" overture, the first time given to a Brooklyn audience. The overture is very full of melody and was well rendered by the orchestra.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 11 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, January 26. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

BULLETIN

PHILADELPHIA, Pa

JAN 11 1908

JAN 11 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves the last of January on its annual Western tour. It will take, in addition to the conductor and business staff, eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

Daily Citizen

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 11 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Carreno, Assisting, Received an Ovation at the Baptist Temple.

Brooklynites were more enthusiastic than usual last night over the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple and the rendering of it with the assistance of Madame Therea Carreno, pianist. Three numbers only were needed to fill the concert hour, and these were Brahms' second Symphony in D Major op. 73; McDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D Minor, op. 23, and Humperdinck's Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage." This last had its first rendering in Brooklyn last night and it proved most entertaining. The work is a very new one, having been composed for a production of the opera in the spring of 1908 at Munich. The libretto supplies a comedy which the music sets forth in gay and sprightly measures, bringing all the instruments of the orchestra into play and giving the harp and cymbals an effective place.

The symphony with its four movements is a classical study on the whole having more interest for the musician or student than for the average concertgoer. It affords strong contrasts of joy and humor with meditative seriousness of thought, not, however, obscuring themes and some melody which gives the ear a key to the meaning of the measures amid their elaborate working out by the composer. The scherzo of the chord movement was particularly graceful and effective. As for the rendering of this number, the orchestra under Dr. Muck's baton gave a finished interpretation with due regard to the subtleties of the score.

As for Madame Carreno, the pianiste, whose playing has thrilled Brooklyn audiences many times in the past, returned for her second appearance in this borough this season and gave a performance of Edward MacDowell's concerto with orchestra, which showed her to be still in the former rank of women pianists. While paying a tribute to the American composer who at one time was her pupil, she had selected a work which scarcely could have been surpassed for the opportunity of her characteristic temperamental interpretation. The concerto was a happy medium for artistic tone coloring, while it demanded no slight technical ability. Madame Carreno's playing was full of magnetism and rich tone color. The composition was replete with pleasing themes worked out in the intricate and scholarly manner which has been characteristic of America's foremost composer. The orchestral part was effectively given and Dr. Muck shared with the pianiste the unusual amount of applause which the audience gave to this number.

Immediately after last evening's concert a reception was tendered to Dr. and Mrs. Carl Muck and Carl Wendling, the first violinist of the orchestra, at the Barnard Club. Members of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic concerts, of which Mrs. Camden C. Dike is president, attended the reception.

TIMES,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAN 12 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard Tuesday afternoon by a crowded house of distinguished people. Occupying boxes besides Mrs. Roosevelt and Baroness von Sternburg, the latter entertaining in her box Miss Carow, the sister of Mrs. Roosevelt; Mrs. Murray Crane, Miss Langham, Merr von Schubert, of the German embassy staff, and Baron Ambrozy, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy, were Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. C. A. Williams, and Mrs. Herbert Parsons, each with a party.

Occupying orchestra chairs were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. James R. Garfield, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Straus, and Mr. and Mrs. Hockstadter, Mr. and Mrs. Boardman, Miss Boardman, Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Bacon, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Brewer, Mrs. James Bayard, Miss Bayard, Mrs. Joseph Audenreid, Capt. and Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. Hay, Mrs. Payne Whitney, of New York; Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Rear Admiral and Mrs. William Sheffield Cowles, Mrs. Chatard, Mrs. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Denny, Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany Dyer, Mr. and Mrs. William Phelps Eno, Mr. and Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirk Porter, and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page.

N. Y. EVE WORLD

JAN 13 1908

Dr. Muck, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon, substituted MacDowell's suite in A minor for Mozart's Fifth violin concerto because of the illness of Carl Wendling, the orchestra's concert master, who was to have played the solo part. The other numbers were Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F major and Handel's Concerto for wind instruments and strings in F major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W
n ress JAN 10 190
e

NEW SYMPHONY WELL GIVEN BY BOSTON BAND.

Composition by Hermann Bischoff Has Charm and Worth—"Tristan und Isolde" Repeated

A very large audience listened to another of Dr. Muck's original programmes played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall last night. This was the first concert of the third visit to New York, and great gains were shown in ensemble, freedom and the more subtle elements which were disturbed through the reorganization which occurred this season.

Mr. Muck's offerings were a new symphony by a new writer, one Hermann Bischoff, of Munich; Edward A. MacDowell's second concerto for piano, played by Mme. Carreno, once MacDowell's teacher, and Dvorak's brilliant "Carnival" overture.

Bischoff is a young German, evidently in the storm and stress period of his career. He has no serious exaggerations, unless extreme length may be regarded as such; it is even a question whether he has not justified this length by not repeating himself more than is necessary to his purpose, and it is a fact that he does not fail to hold the interest as he wends his way stormily or peacefully through charming melodies deftly handled.

He will work out of the present influences, the strongest of which he frankly avows by dedicating this symphony to Richard Strauss, to whom he relates himself more in theme than in his treatment of it. He is more sane, perhaps the Straussite would prefer to say less daring, in orchestration and in dissonances. Bischoff also knows his Handel, as was evident in the beautiful second movement, but is not a jump from Strauss back to Handel in itself original?

There are traces of all the later forces, not omitting Wagner, Schumann and Puccini. However, without taking into consideration these details, the symphony has genuine charm and undoubted worth.

In great contrast was MacDowell's second piano concerto, written in a style welcome through its almost naive messages of simplicity and tenderness. Mme. Carreno brought to this the great wealth of her art, which seems to encompass everything. The work and its presentation elicited long and spontaneous applause. Dr. Muck gave it magnificent support and brought a new and worthy orchestral word from MacDowell.

* * *

At the concert to be given Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling will not play as announced, but in place of his number Dr. Muck will give the MacDowell suite.

* * *

SUN,
New York City.
ress

THE MUSIC OF A SATURDAY

Four Operatic Performances, One Orchestral Concert and Two Recitals.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée at Carnegie Hall was attended by a small audience. The programme consisted of Handel's concerto in F major for two wind choirs and string orchestra, recently played by Mr. Damrosch's men; MacDowell's suite in A minor, opus 42, and Goetz's symphony in F major, opus 9.

The playing of the oboes and horns in the Handel number was something to be remembered because of its technical excellence and its delightful style, while in the two other numbers the entire orchestra furnished pleasure of the kind so familiar at the concerts of these welcome visitors from Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. Mr. MacDowell's suite was heard again with satisfaction, though no one would select it as the work on which to rest a reputation so great as that accorded to this composer.

Charles W. Clark, a barytone who dwells in Chicago and has sung in other places, gave a song recital in the afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. His programme was made along the usual lines but contained some songs out of the hackneyed list, among them one by Walter Rummel, the talented son of the pianist, Franz Rummel. Mr. Clark's beauty of voice is as great as ever and he still sings with intelligence and feeling, though with occasional exaggerations of nuance which might be omitted to the improvement of his style.

Wesley Weyman, who gave a piano recital in the evening in Mendelssohn Hall, is a player of some taste and skill perhaps better fitted to entertain in a salon than in a large hall. His style is fluent rather than communicative. However, he has friends and pupils, and they like to hear him play. Others do not have to do so.

TIMES,
ess New York City.
e

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Wendling Indisposed and MacDowell's Suite Substituted for Mozart's Violin Concerto.

There were no problems for the audience at the second concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave on its third visit yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme was changed from that originally announced. Mr. Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, who was to play a violin concerto by Mozart, was indisposed, and instead of it Dr. Muck substituted Edward MacDowell's suite for orchestra in A minor, op. 42. Before it came Gustav Kogel's arrangement of Handel's concerto grosso in F for the wind choirs and string orchestra, and after it Hermann Goetz's symphony, also in F.

A couple of movements from Handel's concerto were played a few days before by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kogel has kept five out of the original nine in his edition of the work, and it was therefore proper that the programme book announced the performance as "the first in this form in New York." The five movements all have the Handelian grand style, and as they were presented by the Boston orchestra they are of most delightful tonal color. The two wind choirs—two oboes, horns, and bassoons in each—are used as the "concertino" or solo group, often antiphonally answering each other and the string orchestra, after the manner of the now obsolete concerto grosso. The oboe solos in the third movement were played with beautiful phrasing and clear articulation, and in the last the horns, dominating in rapid and swinging melodic passages, likewise distinguished themselves. The audience listened to this fine performance of music characteristic of Handel's virile and stately manner with a singular apathy.

Mr. MacDowell's suite is frankly in the landscape manner of his master, Raff, as represented by his symphony "Im Walde." It has the typical German romantic view of the woods—a word which, it has been said, no German can pronounce, in his native tongue without bursting into tears. Americans, on the other hand, are accused of looking upon the forest as so much potential cord wood. It is not cord wood to Mr. MacDowell; it is a place of haunted nooks, of lurking sprites, and upon its borders he can find Summer idyls and shepherdesses' songs. The adult mind, even of this century, can still put itself into a receptive frame for such images. So the musician, likewise, can put himself into a frame of mind to depict them, but it is a more or less deliberate procedure. The result is that Mr. MacDowell's suite, however plausible and pretty, is hardly serious, and it is not one of his strongest works. It is a little artificial, a playing with tones, with bright and delicately flashing orchestration evoking Mendelssohnian fairies and agreeable Grimm's fairy story telling. Listened to as such it is pretty, mirthful, and charming music that goes very little below the surface. It was dextrously played, and its fundamental character was admirably set forth. It was notable that Mr. MacDowell's name should thus appear on two successive programmes of the Boston Orchestra, following after the concerto that Mme. Carreño played on Thursday night.

It was pleasant to hear Hermann Goetz's symphony again, which has fallen into neglect after the vogue it had a generation ago. It was absurdly overpraised at one time. To-day it seems like agreeable music—also somewhat touched with the Mendelssohnian spirit—melodious with a freshness that is hardly stated, propounding no philosophy, and grappling with no problems, a stranger to "Weltschmerz"; not even following out a "poetic idea." If it is out of the fashion on these accounts, it none the less holds the attention, and if it does not deeply stir it gives pleasure and stimulates the purely musical imagination. Dr. Muck read it, as he does everything, with complete devotion to the spirit and the letter, and the orchestra achieved a brilliant and spirited performance.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date JAN 12 1908

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

The Day's Music.

If all the men and women who listened to music yesterday afternoon and evening in the concert halls and opera houses of Manhattan were formed in ranks they would form a mighty army; and if all the sound put forth could be concentrated into a single explosion of noise it would lift the roof off any ordinary building.

The afternoon offerings in the two opera houses were "Marta" and "Louise," Flotow's popular work having its first presentation of the season in Conried's stronghold, and Charpentier's music-drama being sung for the third time by Hammerstein's company. Carnegie and Mendelssohn halls also had their doors open at this time of day. In the Fifty-seventh street house the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, gave its regular matinee concert, and in the smaller hall, in Forty-fourth street, Charles W. Clark, an American baritone, sang songs to an appreciative audience.

In the evening Conried produced "Aida," with Lucas for the first time as Radames, and Hammerstein put "Trovatore" on the Manhattan boards, with Zenatello as the drawing card. Wesley Weyman simultaneously played piano music in Mendelssohn Hall. What more could any one expect in a single day?

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address
ate JAN 1 1 1908

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Brooklyn residents taxed the limit of the capacity of the Baptist Temple last evening for the third concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Theresa Carreno as the assisting soloist. A brilliant programme was rendered with the interpretation which Dr. Muck is wont to give with the Boston players at their best. Brahms' Second Symphony in D major opened the programme, while Edward MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D minor, opus 23, was the selection which Mme. Carreno played with the orchestra. The concluding number was Humperdinck's overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage."

After the concert a reception was given to Dr. and Mrs. Carl Muck by the Barnard Club at its rooms, No. 132 Remsen street. The Woman's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic Concerts, of which Mrs. Camden C. Dike is the president, co-operated in this reception.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 11 1908
ss

Paderewski's last performance in the East before he departed on his four months' tour of the middle and far West was at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, on Sunday evening, December 29. He played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and he received a tremendous ovation from the audience, which filled every corner of Boston's great music hall. After the concert Dr. Muck, the conductor, in behalf o fthe orchestra, presented a handsome silver bowl to the pianist as a token of the orchestra's appreciation of what he had done for it, and a sign of the warm friendship of the members for him. Mr. Paderewski left Boston on January 2 in his private car, his first stop being Akron, O., and his second Cincinnati. He was accompanied by Mme. Paderewski, and his numerous staff. The car will be his home until the end of April, when he ends his tour.

Standard Union,
ess
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society was given last night at the Baptist Temple, and as at the previous concerts, there was a full attendance of Brooklyn music lovers. Dr. Karl Muck conducted and Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist.

The Brahms music was his second symphony in D major, op 73, and was in four movements. This symphony emphasizes all that is peaceful, tender and serene in music, and runs from quick, joyous humor to the deepest seriousness, is filled with delightful and entrancing melody throughout. The orchestra, under Dr. Muck's careful leadership, did full justice to this great work.

For the piano Mme. Carreno selected one of the works of Edward MacDowell, a New Yorker, and a former pupil, who still resides in Manhattan. Mme. Carreno was at her best last evening, and her wonderful playing of this melodious music, which was divided into three movements, was rewarded by applause so continued that she was obliged to appear several times and bow her thanks.

The concert closed with Humperdinck's "Forced Marriage" overture, the first time given to a Brooklyn audience. The overture is very full of melody and was well rendered by the orchestra.

m Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ress JAN 1 1 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, January 26. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

om BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
te JAN 11 1908
JAN 11 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves the last of January on its annual Western tour. It will take, in addition to the conductor and business staff, eighty-four men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati.

Daily Citizen,
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 11 190

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Carreno, Assisting, Received an Ovation at the Baptist Temple.

Brooklynites were more enthusiastic than usual last night over the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple and the rendering of it with the assistance of Madame Therea Carreno, pianist. Three numbers only were needed to fill the concert hour, and these were Brahms' second Symphony in D Major op. 73; McDowell's Concerto No. 2 in D Minor, op. 23, and Humperdinck's Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage." This last had its first rendering in Brooklyn last night and it proved most entertaining. The work is a very new one, having been composed for a production of the opera in the spring of 1906 at Munich. The libretto supplies a comedy which the music sets forth in gay and sprightly measures, bringing all the instruments of the orchestra into play and giving the harp and cymbals an effective place.

The symphony with its four movements is a classicl study, on the whole having more interest for the musician or student than for the average concertgoer. It affords strong contrasts of joy and humor with meditative seriousness of thought, not, however, obscuring themes and some melody which gives the ear a key to the meaning of the measures amid their elaborate working out by the composer. The scherzo of the chord movement was particularly graceful and effective. As for the rendering of this number, the orchestra under Dr. Muck's baton gave a finished interpretation with due regard to the subtleties of the score.

As for Madame Carreno, the pianiste, whose playing has thrilled Brooklyn audiences many times in the past, returned for her second appearance in this borough this season and gave a performance of Edward MacDowell's concerto with orchestra, which showed her to be still in the former rank of women pianists. While paying a tribute to the American composer who at one time was her pupil, she had selected a work which scarcely could have been surpassed for the opportunity of her characteristic temperamental interpretation. The concerto was a happy medium for artistic tone coloring, while it demanded no slight technical ability. Madame Carreno's playing was full of magnetism and rich tone color. The composition was replete with pleasing themes worked out in the intricate and scholarly manner which has been characteristic of America's foremost composer. The orchestral part was effectively given and Dr. Muck shared with the pianiste the unusual amount of applause which the audience gave to this number.

Immediately after last evening's concert a reception was tendered to Dr. and Mrs. Carl Muck and Carl Wendling, the first violinist of the orchestra, at the Barnard Club. Members of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic concerts, of which Mrs. Camden C. Dike is president, attended the reception.

TIMES,
ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard Tuesday afternoon by a crowded house of distinguished people. Occupying boxes besides Mrs. Roosevelt and Baroness von Sternburg, the latter entertaining in her box Miss Carow, the sister of Mrs. Roosevelt; Mrs. Murray Crane, Miss Langham, Merr von Schubert, of the German embassy staff, and Baron Ambrozy, of the Austro-Hungarian embassy, were Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. C. A. Williams, and Mrs. Herbert Parsons, each with a party.

Occupying orchestra chairs were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. James R. Garfield, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and Mrs. Straus, and Mr. and Mrs. Hockstadter, Mr. and Mrs. Boardman, Miss Boardman, Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Bacon, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Brewer, Mrs. James Bayard, Miss Bayard, Mrs. Joseph Audenreid, Capt. and Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. Hay, Mrs. Payne Whitney, of New York; Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Rear Admiral and Mrs. William Sheffield Cowles, Mrs. Chatard, Mrs. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Denny, Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany Dyer, Mr. and Mrs. William Phelps Eno, Mr. and Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mr. and Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kirk Porter, and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page.

ss

Dr. Muck, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, substituted MacDowell's suite in A minor for Mozart's Fifth violin concerto because of the illness of Carl Wendling, the orchestra's concert master, who was to have played the solo part. The other numbers were Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F major and Handel's F major concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs. All were played with the brilliancy and thoroughness with which this band is wont to delight its hearers.

Address Daily Times,
Date Brooklyn, N.Y.
JAN 11 1908

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Orchestra With Mme. Carreno as Soloist.

Patrons of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose fullness of joy depends more or less upon the participation of a soloist at a concert, had occasion for satisfaction last night at the third event of the series. The playing of the orchestra is always reason enough for finding solid enjoyment at these concerts, yet the nature of the programme last night made the presence of Mme. Teresa Carreno particularly welcome. And then her presence is of the gracious kind that is likely to find a welcome on any occasion. The musical list for the evening offered the Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D major, MacDowell's piano Concerto No. 2, in D minor, and the new overture to Humperdinck's opera, "The Forced Marriage."

The symphony heard last night is a far different affair from the first symphony of this composer, which Dr. Muck presented on the occasion of his introduction to a Brooklyn audience at the first concert of the orchestra last season. This second symphony may be taken as evidence that Mr. Brahms could think rationally and give expression to musical thoughts of really delightful import. And your staunch Brahms advocate quotes it strongly to illustrate this fact. There is not much else of Brahms that he could quote in support of the contention, and so this second symphony is the favorite recourse in support of the allegation that Brahms could actually write beautiful music. "There," says your Brahms advocate, "you will not deny that this is really interesting music. Now will you admit that Brahms—"

But the conservative music lover who refuses to enthuse over Brahms is not disturbed in his position by any assertion regarding this second symphony. To him it is simply the exception which justifies his attitude toward the generally unattractive, unsympathetic character of Brahms' music. He contends that the fact that Brahms could write as he did in the symphony heard last night leaves less excuse for the existence of much of the other stuff he wrote. That he chose to devote himself to morbid metaphysical meanderings in the realm of tone is no reason why we should follow him. That he was an ingenious writer cannot be denied, in truth, but therein lies the danger of his musical machinations. We are so apt to accept as worthy that which is cleverly contrived. At least that seems to be the professional viewpoint, and so far members of the Brahms cult are almost exclusively professional musicians, who admire the ingenuity of the man.

This symphony has unmistakable charm, particularly manifest in the first and third movements, and there was masterly efficiency in the rendering by Dr. Muck and his men. The Humperdinck overture, heard for the first time in Brooklyn, is more pretentious than is generally written for a light opera, being more ample and substantial in quality. It is built upon the themes of the opera (for which it is written as an afterthought), and possesses dainty, engaging elements of interest.

Mme. Carreno was fortunate in the choice of her solo number, and Mr. MacDowell's concerto was fortunate in having so sympathetic and capable an interpreter. This work, written twenty years ago, when Mr. MacDowell (alas! now afflicted beyond recovery), was in the full flower of his youthful enthusiasm, is charged to an unusual degree with bouyancy of spirit and fanciful romantic feeling. It is a sparkling exposition of musical thought, and it had a most sympathetic, con amore interpretation by Mme. Carreno. The composition is one to show forth the admirable temperamental qualities in her playing, and she probably felt an uncommon interest in this concerto because she once taught the composer of it. It was beautifully played, and Mme. Carreno was given a cordial ovation.

BOSTON
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date JAN 11 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tourn on Sunday, January 26. It will take, in addition to the conductor and business staff, 84 men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1. The next Baltimore concert will be on February 19.

SUN
Address COLUMBUS, O
Date JAN 14 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of [illegible] best of America's instru[illegible] is coming [illegible]

Address Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 11 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Pieces by Brahms, MacDowell and Humperdinck—An Ovation to Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Inevitably, owing to their compositions being the chief numbers on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that gave the third of the Symphony Society's series, under Institute auspices, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, last evening, the audience was summoned to institute a comparison between the styles of Brahms, the European, and MacDowell, the American composers. Technically, comparison would be incongruous, for Dr. Muck had chosen Brahms' second symphony, in D major, opus 73, and MacDowell's second concerto for the piano in D minor, opus 23, pieces differing in every way in interest, in development and in form. But although both pieces were composed in the eighties, they show individual, temperamental and characteristic differences in the writers in a period when orchestra compositions were smoother to the ear than those of recent times.

The MacDowell number, that might have sounded simply as an example of compact writing, if heard by itself, was even brilliant as compared with the tender and meditative symphony by Brahms. The latter was a noble architectural structure seen by moonlight; the other an equally magnificent edifice bathed in the joyous light of day. Dropping metaphor, the themes of each were brief, beautifully worked out in the progressions, and the tone coloring superb. Dr. Muck has never conducted with more skill than he did in these compositions, giving accent and rhythm, and superb shading even, to every phrase. He was especially felicitous in leading up to rallentandos.

Owing to the appearance of Mme. Carreno, the MacDowell number had the greater popular interest. Those who expected to hear this noted pianist in a showy piece were disappointed, for the MacDowell concerto is a closely knitted composition. The piano is here an integral part of the orchestra as to the structural essence of the work. In the prelude to the first movement a brilliant cadenza showed Mme. Carreno's facility and when the second theme was developed there was brilliant passage work for the piano. In the rapid second movement there were three themes, all taken up in turn by the piano, with scale work in which Mme. Carreno showed her artistry by her shading. It is seldom that runs from fortissimo to pianissimo, and the reverse, have been given either with greater skill and delicacy, or strength, of touch. A very slow movement preceded the very swift ending, and in the latter the piano led skillfully up to the strong orchestral effect, the brasses coming in effectively, but not too noisily, and in the three themes there was again fugural embroidery for Carreno's fingers. The audience was insistent in demanding a solo from Mme. Carreno, calling her four times to the platform, but while she smiled and bowed her thanks she retired, leaving a regretful audience. To hear this artist in a gratifyingly sonorous and brilliant work enabling her to show what she can do, music-lovers should have heard her recently, in Brooklyn, at a Damrosch Society concert.

The Brahms symphony was a striking and complete contrast to the modern Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy style of composition. It was amusing to read in the scholarly concert programme, by Philip Hale, that Hugues Imbert, one of the first French critics to appreciate Brahms, wrote: "It is true that the first movement contains some dissonances, which, after a first hearing, are piquant and not at all "disagreeable." What would M. Imbert have thought of the "Domestic Symphony" by Strauss, or of an almost cacophonous d'Indy composition, if he had written in these days? In the Brahms symphony the dissonances continue for a very few measures and against them is offset a long and beautiful stream of melody, with a peculiarly effective orchestration at the close, horns and wood wind and reeds and flute, aiding in the development of the theme, to which a pizzicato on the first violins served in biting emphasis. To the average ear, if there is such a thing, the second movement, in adagio tempo, was the weak spot in the composition, not in the way of want of skill in working out the themes, but in the character of the themes themselves. The movement would have been lighter and equally as effective had not so free use been made of the heavy reeds and wood wind.

The scherzo that followed was one of the most graceful bits, and it was in the third movement that dancing of nymphs or elves before the background of a dense and fairy enchanted forest was easily imagined. It was a delightful caprice, and never was Dr. Muck's baton more happily employed than in bringing out its delicacy.

Humperdinck's overture to his opera, "Die Heirat Wider Willen" (The Forced Marriage) served as a good concluding piece. The opera is a comedy, and the themes which were brought freely into the overture, are, like all of Humperdinka's airs, unhackneyed, fresh and delightful. He is a master of orchestration, and the songs of various characters in the comic opera were so well blended that the piece did not smack of the ordinary opera overture.

If the writer of the programmes, instead of putting in a good deal of irrelevant, though scholarly, instruction should see fit to introduce specific information as to the themes and the way they are worked out by the composer it would be a boon to music lovers. A staff, showing the notes of the principa themes, with a few terse words indicating personal methods of the composers on the programme, could be printed. They would be illuminating, especially if [illegible]

N. Y. Evening Sun - Jan 13.

[illegible] York was first heard by the popular Sunday concert embargo, and finally effected on a hurry call for Sunday symphony revival gave her own first Sunday matinee yesterday before a numerous audience in Carnegie Hall. Late comers found the doors closed on a Beethoven Sonata, but half a dozen Chopin solos earned two more after great applause. Then, following the really splendid performance of Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" and a Brahms rhapsody, the public heart was stirred again by the more glittering climax of Smetana's "Aus Seegestade" and MacDowell's "Etude de Concert."

Carreño's audience must have held a number of old friends, both teachers and amateurs of music, for they rushed up to the platform at last with waving arms and tried to embrace her feet.

Carreño will long be gratefully remembered for having played the MacDowell concerto, No. 2, in both Manhattan and Brooklyn last week, after her week of MacDowell with the Boston Orchestra on tour. By further coincidence, the American composer was twice brought forward again on Saturday.

Richard Czerwonky sat blushing but not unseen in Carl Wendling's chair at the farewell Boston Symphony matinée, when in place of a solo by the absent first violin, Dr. Muck conducted the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, between the suite for two wind choirs, by Handel-Kogel, and the long lost symphony in F, of Hermann Goetz.

MacDowell's "Sonata Tragica" was also performed by Wesley Weyman on Saturday night in Mendelssohn Hall, where Augusta Cottlow had played it not long before.

And if Charles W. Clark of Chicago and Paris failed to sing a MacDowell encore at his Mendelssohn Hall Saturday matinée, he at least ended a novel French English programme with "ecstasy," by Walter Rummel, the famous pianist's son, as artistically as he began it with Brahms.

[illegible] Tribune

The great audiences at the two opera houses on Saturday afternoon somewhat affected the size of the assemblage at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert. Nevertheless, it is not likely that there would have been any vacant seats if the public could have been informed of the change in the programme. As originally announced, it included a Handel concerto for string orchestra and wind choirs, a Mozart concerto, and a symphony by Goetz. The sudden illness of the orchestra's concert-master, Mr. Wendling, who was to have played the Mozart Concerto, induced the conductor to substitute MacDowell's lovely A minor suite. Could this have been known in time the MacDowellites would have been on hand in numbers. Dr. Muck greatly admires this suite, and under his magic wand its romantic, sylvan atmosphere was brought into Carnegie Hall.

MacDowell's music is beginning to receive some of the attention it deserves. Last Thursday Mme. Carreño played his second concerto at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert and won for it and for herself a triumph therewith. Yesterday her first recital in the same hall closed with a brilliant concert étude by America's foremost composer. At Mendelssohn Hall, on Saturday evening, MacDowell's "Tragic Sonata" (which Mr. Harold Bauer will soon play here) was on the programme, interpreted by Mr. Wesley Weyman. He played it with careful attention to nuance, at the same time bringing out its highest emotional qualities. He followed the composer's example in making no pause between the slow movement and the finale. Mr. Weyman is a pianist of high ideals and poetic temperament. His programmes are always interesting; they never follow the beaten track nor, on the other hand, are they erratic or eccentric. His Saturday's programme contained three other names to conjure with: Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt. He has done much to help New Yorkers to an appreciation of Liszt. It is worth noting that no one left the hall before the end of the recital.

SUN
Address COLUMBUS, O
Date JAN 12 1908

The next important musical event will be the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 30. The program will be a novel one, consisting of "Wallenstein," a trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, by d'Indy; E. A. MacDowell's suite in A minor, consisting of (1) "In a Haunted Forest; (2) "Summer Idyl; (3) "In October"; (4) "The Shepherdess' Song"; (5) "Forest Sprites," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana." The Boston Symphony orchestra has beena great factor in the cause of pure music. "A permanent orchestra, maintained solely for concert purposes." Such was the motto given in the orchestra in its first year, and it has never [illegible] from, either in spirit [illegible]

N. Y. Globe - Jan 13.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra forsook the Bruckners and the Bischoffs and their ilk and settled down to Handel, MacDowell, and Götz for its concert Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Handel was represented by his F major concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra as arranged by G. F. Kogel; Götz, by his once famous F major symphony. The MacDowell suite in A minor was a late substitute for Mozart's A major violin concerto, which Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, found himself not well enough to play.

There was much to enjoy in this programme as played by the men from Boston. The virtuosity of the wind players as well as the smoothness and brilliance of the strings, appeared to advantage in the Handel concerto. And how good it is to hear something by Mr. George Frideric Handel—"by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music," as Mr. Philip Hale reminds us in the words of Mr. Runciman—besides "The Messiah" and the "Harmonious Blacksmith" variation. MacDowell's "Woodland Suite" is not his greatest music, but it is charming—who but MacDowell could have written "The Song of the Shepherdess?"—and it was played admirably. Dr. Muck deserves thanks for presenting beautiful music by MacDowell at both the recent New York concerts of his orchestra, whatever he may deserve for forcing the unwelcome Bischoff on us.

The extraordinary vogue of the Götz symphony many years ago is difficult to understand to-day. Only the allegretto now seems better than respectable. The symphony was played most persuasively, though in the allegretto the solo flute did cover itself with more glory than the solo horn.

N. Y. Mail
Jan 13

MUCH MUSIC CROWDED INTO THE WEEK-END

Splendid Concert by Mme. Carreno—The Clark Recital—Hundreds Turned Away from "Louise" at Manhattan.

If concerts were limited early in the week, there was complete atonement later, as a sufficient number were crowded into the week-end. There were four operatic productions on Saturday, in addition to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which presented its splendid programme at Carnegie hall while Charles W. Clark, the American baritone, a favorite in Paris, gave his only song recital at Mendelssohn hall to the great regret of those who could not be in both places at once.

In the evening Wesley Weyman gave a concert in Mendelssohn hall of more than ordinary interest and seriousness of purpose. Mr. Weyman opened his programme with the MacDowell Sonata Tragica, as Harold Bauer will do at his forthcoming recital. MacDowell's concerto was on the programme Thursday night, played by Mme. Carreno with the Boston Symphony, and Saturday afternoon, when Mr. Wendling was unable to play as announced, the number substituted was MacDowell's orchestral suite.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the Wo[illegible]

n [illegible]

ress

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in this city, Jan. 30, promising a treat which all music lovers will appreciate. It is, of course, one of the few great orchestras of the country, and can only be compared to the Thomas orchestra of Chicago.

An unusual program is offered for the Columbus engagement. There are only three numbers; but all of them are new to Columbus, and all said to be of great beauty. The program will open with the dramatic Wallenstein trilogy by D'Indy. Next will come McDowell's Suite in A minor, of which there are five movements. And, finally the program will conclude with Charbrier's Rhapsody Espana. The program is unique and will be a welcome change from the usual arrangement.

---

[112]

Address Daily Times, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date JAN 11 1908

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Orchestra With Mme. Carreno as Soloist.

Patrons of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose fullness of joy depends more or less upon the participation of a soloist at a concert, had occasion for satisfaction last night at the third event of the series. The playing of the orchestra is always reason enough for finding solid enjoyment at these concerts, yet the nature of the programme last night made the presence of Mme. Teresa Carreno particularly welcome. And then her presence is of the gracious kind that is likely to find a welcome on any occasion. The musical list for the evening offered the Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D major, MacDowell's piano Concerto No. 2, in D minor, and the new overture to Humperdinck's opera, "The Forced Marriage."

The symphony heard last night is a far different affair from the first symphony of this composer, which Dr. Muck presented on the occasion of his introduction to a Brooklyn audience at the first concert of the orchestra last season. This second symphony may be taken as evidence that Mr. Brahms could think rationally and give expression to musical thoughts of really delightful import. And your staunch Brahms advocate quotes it strongly to illustrate this fact. There is not much else of Brahms that he could quote in support of the contention, and so this second symphony is the favorite recourse in support of the allegation that Brahms could actually write beautiful music. "There," says your Brahms advocate, "you will not deny that this is really interesting music. Now will you admit that Brahms—"

But the conservative music lover who refuses to enthuse over Brahms is not disturbed in his position by any assertion regarding this second symphony. To him it is simply the exception which justifies his attitude toward the generally unattractive, unsympathetic character of Brahms' music. He contends that the fact that Brahms could write as he did in the symphony heard last night leaves less excuse for the existence of much of the other stuff he wrote. That he chose to devote himself to morbid metaphysical meanderings in the realm of tone is no reason why we should follow him. That he was an ingenious writer cannot be denied, in truth, but therein lies the danger of his musical machinations. We are so apt to accept as worthy that which is cleverly contrived. At least that seems to be the professional viewpoint, and so far members of the Brahms cult are almost exclusively professional musicians, who admire the ingenuity of the man.

This symphony has unmistakable charm, particularly manifest in the first and third movements, and there was masterly efficiency in the rendering by Dr. Muck and his men. The Humperdinck overture, heard for the first time in Brooklyn, is more pretentious than is generally written for a light opera, being more ample and substantial in quality. It is built upon the themes of the opera (for which it is written as an afterthought), and possesses dainty, engaging elements of interest.

Mme. Carreno was fortunate in the choice of her solo number, and Mr. MacDowell's concerto was fortunate in having so sympathetic and capable an interpreter. This work, written twenty years ago, when Mr. MacDowell (alas! now afflicted beyond recovery), was in the full flower of his youthful enthusiasm, is charged to an unusual degree with bouyancy of spirit and fanciful romantic feeling. It is a sparkling exposition of musical thought, and it had a most sympathetic, con amore interpretation by Mme. Carreno. The composition is one to show forth the admirable temperamental qualities in her playing, and she probably felt an uncommon interest in this concerto because she once taught the composer of it. It was beautifully played, and Mme. Carreno was given a cordial ovation.

Address

Date JAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves on its annual Western tourn on Sunday, January 26. It will take, in addition to the conductor and business staff, 84 men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1. The next Baltimore concert will be on February 19.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the oldest and best of America's instrument organizations, is coming to Memorial hall for one appearance on the evening of January 28. Tickets are on sale at the Wilkins-Ayman music store, [illegible] North [illegible]

Address Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date JAN 11 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Pieces by Brahms, MacDowell and Humperdinck—An Ovation to Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Inevitably, owing to their compositions being the chief numbers on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that gave the third of the Symphony Society's series, under Institute auspices, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, last evening, the audience was summoned to institute a comparison between the styles of Brahms, the European, and MacDowell, the American composers. Technically, comparison would be incongruous, for Dr. Muck had chosen Brahms' second symphony, in D major, opus 73, and MacDowell's second concerto for the piano in D minor, opus 23, pieces differing in every way in interest, in development and in form. But although both pieces were composed in the eighties, they show individual, temperamental and characteristic differences in the writers in a period when orchestra compositions were smoother to the ear than those of recent times.

The MacDowell number, that might have sounded simply as an example of compact writing, if heard by itself, was even brilliant as compared with the tender and meditative symphony by Brahms. The latter was a noble architectural structure seen by moonlight; the other an equally magnificent edifice bathed in the joyous light of day. Dropping metaphor, the themes of each were brief, beautifully worked out in the progressions, and the tone coloring superb. Dr. Muck has never conducted with more skill than he did in these compositions, giving accent and rhythm, and superb shading even, to every phrase. He was especially felicitous in leading up to rallentandos.

Owing to the appearance of Mme. Carreno, the MacDowell number had the greater popular interest. Those who expected to hear this noted pianist in a showy piece were disappointed, for the MacDowell concerto is a closely knitted composition. The piano is here an integral part of the orchestra as to the structural essence of the work. In the prelude to the first movement a brilliant cadenza showed Mme. Carreno's facility and when the second theme was developed there was brilliant passage work for the piano. In the rapid second movement there were three themes, all taken up in turn by the piano, with scale work in which Mme. Carreno showed her artistry by her shading. It is seldom that runs from fortissimo to pianissimo, and the reverse, have been given either with greater skill and delicacy, or strength, of touch. A very slow movement preceded the very swift ending, and in the latter the piano led skillfully up to the strong orchestral effect, the brasses coming in effectively, but not too noisily, and in the three themes there was again fugural embroidery for Carreno's fingers. The audience was insistent in demanding a solo from Mme. Carreno, calling her four times to the platform, but while she smiled and bowed her thanks she retired, leaving a regretful audience. To hear this artist in a gratifyingly sonorous and brilliant work enabling her to show what she can do, music-lovers should have heard her recently, in Brooklyn, at a Damrosch Society concert.

The Brahms symphony was a striking and complete contrast to the modern Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy style of composition. It was amusing to read in the scholarly concert programme, by Philip Hale, that Hugues Imbert, one of the first French critics to appreciate Brahms, wrote: "It is true that the first movement contains some dissonances, which, after a first hearing, are piquant and not at all disagreeable." What would M. Imbert have thought of the "Domestic Symphony" by Strauss, or of an almost cacophonous d'Indy composition, if he had written in these days? In the Brahms symphony the dissonances continue for a very few measures and against them is offset a long and beautiful stream of melody, with a peculiarly effective orchestration at the close, horns and wood wind and reeds and flute, aiding in the development of the theme, to which a pizzicato on the first violins served in biting emphasis. To the average ear, if there is such a thing, the second movement, in adagio tempo, was the weak spot in the composition, not in the way of want of skill in working out the themes, but in the character of the themes themselves. The movement would have been lighter and equally as effective had not so free use been made of the heavy reeds and wood wind.

The scherzo that followed was one of the most graceful bits, and it was in the third movement that dancing of nymphs or elves before the background of a dense and fairy enchanted forest was easily imagined. It was a delightful caprice, and never was Dr. Muck's baton more happily employed than in bringing out its delicacy.

Humperdinck's overture to his opera, "Die Heirat Wider Willen" (The Forced Marriage) served as a good concluding piece. The opera is a comedy, and the themes which were brought freely into the overture, are, like all of Humperdinks's airs, unhackneyed, fresh and delightful. He is a master of orchestration, and the songs of various characters in the comic opera were so well blended that the piece did not smack of the ordinary opera overture.

If the writer of the programmes, instead of putting in a good deal of irrelevant, though scholarly, instruction, should see fit to introduce specific information as to the themes and the way they are worked out by the composer it would be a boon to music lovers. A staff, showing the notes of the principal themes, with a few terse words indicating personal methods of the composers, on the programme, could be printed. They would be illuminating, especially if tried at home on the piano before attending the concert. Pianos are as thick as [illegible]

N.Y. Evening Sun - Jan 13.

Teresa Carreño, whose return to New York was first upset by the popular Sunday concert embargo, and finally effected on a hurry call for Sunday symphony revival, gave her own first Sunday matinée yesterday before a numerous audience in Carnegie Hall. Late comers found the doors closed on a Beethoven Sonata, but half a dozen Chopin solos earned two more after great applause. Then, following the really splendid performance of Schumann's "Symphonic Studies" and a Brahms rhapsody, the public heart was stirred again by the more glittering climax of Smetana's "Am Seegestade" and MacDowell's "Etude de Concert."

Carreño's audience must have held a number of old friends, both teachers and amateurs of music, for they rushed up to the platform at last with waving arms and tried to embrace her feet.

Carreño will long be gratefully remembered for having played the MacDowell concerto, No. 2, in both Manhattan and Brooklyn last week, after her week of MacDowell with the Boston Orchestra on tour. By further coincidence, the American composer was twice brought forward again on Saturday.

Richard Czerwonky sat blushing but not unseen in Carl Wendling's chair at the farewell Boston Symphony matinée, when in place of a solo by the absent first violin, Dr. Muck conducted the "Woodland Suite" of MacDowell, between the suite for two wind choirs, by Handel-Kogel, and the long lost symphony in F, of Hermann Goetz.

MacDowell's "Sonata Tragica" was also performed by Wesley Weyman on Saturday night in Mendelssohn Hall, where Augusta Cottlow had played it not long before.

And if Charles W. Clark of Chicago and Paris failed to sing a MacDowell encore at his Mendelssohn Hall Saturday matinée, he at least ended a novel French English programme with "ecstasy," by Walter Rummel, the famous pianist's son, as artistically as he began it with Brahms.

The great audiences at the two opera houses on Saturday afternoon somewhat affected the size of the assemblage at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert. Nevertheless, it is not likely that there would have been any vacant seats if the public could have been informed of the change in the programme. As originally announced, it included a Handel concerto for string orchestra and wind choirs, a Mozart concerto, and a symphony by Goetz. The sudden illness of the orchestra's concert-master, Mr. Wendling, who was to have played the Mozart Concerto, induced the conductor to substitute MacDowell's lovely A minor suite. Could this have been known in time the MacDowellites would have been on hand in numbers. Dr. Muck greatly admires this suite, and under his magic wand its romantic, sylvan atmosphere was brought into Carnegie Hall.

MacDowell's music is beginning to receive some of the attention it deserves. Last Thursday Mme. Carreño played his second concerto at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert and won for it and for herself a triumph therewith. Yesterday her first recital in the same hall closed with a brilliant concert étude by America's foremost composer. At Mendelssohn Hall, on Saturday evening, MacDowell's "Tragic Sonata" (which Mr. Harold Bauer will soon play here) was on the programme, interpreted by Mr. Wesley Weyman. He played it with careful attention to nuance, at the same time bringing out its highest emotional qualities. He followed the composer's example in making no pause between the slow movement and the finale. Mr. Weyman is a pianist of high ideals and poetic temperament. His programmes are always interesting; they never follow the beaten track nor, on the other hand, are they erratic or eccentric. His Saturday's programme contained three other names to conjure with: Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt. He has done much to help New Yorkers to an appreciation of Liszt. It is worth noting that no one left the hall before the end of the recital.

The next important musical event will be the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 30. The program will be a novel one, consisting of "Wallenstein," a trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, by d'Indy; E. A. MacDowell's suite in A minor, consisting of (1) "In a Haunted Forest; (2) "Summer Idyl; (3) "In October"; (4) "The Shepherdess' Song"; (5) "Forest Sprites," and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana." The Boston Symphony orchestra has beena great factor in the cause of pure music. "A permanent orchestra, maintained solely for concert purposes." Such was the motto given in the orchestra in its first year, and it has never been departed from, either in spirit or let-

---

N.Y. Globe. June 13.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra forsook the Bruckners and the Bischoffs and their ilk and settled down to Handel, MacDowell, and Götz for its concert Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Handel was represented by his F major concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, as arranged by G. F. Kogel; Götz, by his once famous F major symphony. The MacDowell suite in A minor was a late substitute for Mozart's A major violin concerto, which Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, found himself not well enough to play.

There was much to enjoy in this programme as played by the men from Boston. The virtuosity of the wind players, as well as the smoothness and brilliance of the strings, appeared to advantage in the Handel concerto. And how good it is to hear something by Mr. George Frideric Handel—"by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music," as Mr. Philip Hale reminds us in the words of Mr. Runciman—besides "The Messiah" and the "Harmonious Blacksmith" variation. MacDowell's "Woodland Suite" is not his greatest music, but it is charming—who but MacDowell could have written "The Song of the Shepherdess?"—and it was played admirably. Dr. Muck deserves thanks for presenting beautiful music by MacDowell at both the recent New York concerts of his orchestra, whatever he may deserve for forcing the unwelcome Bischoff on us.

The extraordinary vogue of the Götz symphony many years ago is difficult to understand to-day. Only the allegretto now seems better than respectable. The symphony was played most persuasively, though in the allegretto the solo flute did cover itself with more glory than the solo horn.

MUCH MUSIC CROWDED INTO THE WEEK-END

Splendid Concert by Mme. Carreno—The Clark Recital—Hundreds Turned Away from "Louise" at Manhattan.

If concerts were limited early in the week, there was complete atonement later, as a sufficient number were crowded into the week-end. There were four operatic productions on Saturday, in addition to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which presented its splendid programme at Carnegie hall while Charles W. Clark, the American baritone, a favorite in Paris, gave his only song recital at Mendelssohn hall to the great regret of those who could not be in both places at once.

In the evening Wesley Weyman gave a concert in Mendelssohn hall of more than ordinary interest and seriousness of purpose. Mr. Weyman opened his programme with the MacDowell Sonata Tragica, as Harold Bauer will do at his forthcoming recital. MacDowell's concerto was on the programme Thursday night, played by Mme. Carreno with the Boston Symphony, and Saturday afternoon, when Mr. Wendling was unable to play as announced, the number substituted was MacDowell's orchestral suite.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

n .....

ress .....

e .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The great Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in this city, Jan. 30, promising a treat which all music lovers will appreciate. It is, of course, one of the few great orchestras of the country, and can only be compared to the Thomas orchestra of Chicago.

An unusual program is offered for the Columbus engagement. There are only three numbers; but all of them are new to Columbus, and all said to be of great beauty. The program will open with the dramatic Wallenstein trilogy by D'Indy. Next will come McDowell's Suite in A minor, of which there are five movements. And, finally the program will conclude with Charbrier's Rhapsody Espana. The program is unique and will be a welcome change from the usual arrangement.

---

[112]

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

BUFFALO, N.Y.

JAN 12 1908

Buffalo has waited two years for a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, this city will have its first opportunity for hearing the celebrated organization under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. This is in all probability Dr. Muck's last year in Boston, as, by order of Kaiser Wilhelm, he must return to Germany at the close of the present season.

How much interest is felt in the coming of the Boston men and their distinguished conductor is shown by the steady demand for seats that is being made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager. Many orders are coming in from out of town, for the orchestra does not play this season in any city near to Buffalo.

As the famous Boston organization has but one out of its season of 31 weeks to devote to concerts in this part of the country, Buffalo is exceedingly fortunate in securing it.

The orchestra is quite a different organization today from what it was when here in October, 1905, and it has probably never reached such a high artistic standard as now. First, and most important is the change of conductors. Mr. Gericke left the orchestra in 1906, after thirteen years of service, five in his first engagement, and eight in his second. In his place came Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Dr. Muck came in the fall of 1906. While his reputation abroad was second to none, his name was little known in America. He came on a year's leave of absence, which was secured after much difficulty and long negotiations directly with Emperor William. His success here last season is musical history. It is quite safe to say that of all the great conductors who have visited America, none has made a more deep and lasting impression than this man. He quickly showed himself a musician of highest attainments; a conductor with a faculty of command born in him; an artist whose sympathies are wide and generous; and a man whom to know is counted a privilege.

Before his first season was half over it was evident that the perplexing problem of finding a conductor worthy of a great musical body like the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been solved, but the trouble was how to keep him. Before coming to America, he had signed a new six-year contract with the Berlin Opera House. It was evident that he could not be retained here long, and all the influence that the orchestra can exert was bent to the task of securing for him an additional year's leave of absence. Dr. Muck frankly said that he would like to stay another year, but that he would not lift a hand to bring this about. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring such influences to bear on the German Emperor as would give him additional leave of absence, well and good. If not, he would have to return to Berlin. After four months of negotiations, the Emperor extended his leave of absence, but what will happen next year is unknown. The managements is using every influence possible to have him released from his contract in Berlin, and it is hoped that this can be done, but the result is doubtful.

Toward the end of last season Dr. Muck expressed the opinion that there were several weak spots in the orchestra that ought to be strengthened. Free hand was given to him, with the result that when the orchestra assembled for rehearsals last fall, it contained seventeen new men. Willy Hess, at his own request, had been granted a year's leave of absence to spend in Germany. This meant a new concert-master, and Dr. Muck brought from Stuttgart, Carl Wendling, who received a year's leave of absence from the King of Wurtemburg. Mr. Wendling was concert-master in Stuttgart, also at the Wagner festivals in Bayreuth, and the months that he has been in Boston shows that both as concert-master and as virtuoso he has ably maintained the high standards set by his predecessors. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist at that Buffalo concert. The orchestra is somewhat larger than it was a year ago. On this trip it will carry 85 musicians, the largest orchestra that has ever come into this part of the country.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. They will be filled in advance of the public sale, which does not open until a few days before the concert. Prices of reserved seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

Courier

Buffalo, N.Y.

JAN 12 1908

With Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its long-desired concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, the first and only opportunity for Buffalo to hear the famous orchestra under its new conductor. Dr. Muck is to remain in this country for only the present season, as, by order of the German Emperor, he must return to Berlin. His leave of absence was originally for one year, but he was granted the second winter in Boston by special dispensation of his royal patron.

That Buffalo appreciates its one opportunity for hearing the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck is demonstrated by the steady demand for seats. Ever since the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would receive mail orders, they have been coming in, including a large representation from out of town. The Boston men do not play in any city close to Buffalo this season.

Dr. Muck belongs to the new school. He is not merely a musician of the highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which come from the German universities. He holds the degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston, in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin. During this time he has enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor, who unwillingly gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to America and is allowing him to remain here with great reluctance.

Dr. Muck is slender and graceful. His views on conducting are particularly interesting, for he believes that the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it and, having given through the orchestra expression to this, his work is done. He is one of the greatest conductors of his time. William J. Henderson in a thoughtful review of the man and his work, said of Dr. Muck in the New York Sun: "He so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible in the manner of conducting."

Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the introduction of a soloist at an orchestra concert is, as a rule, a mistake, as it tends to break the continuity of the musical thought. But for the Buffalo program he will avoid any break in continuity and yet yield to popular taste in having a soloist by presenting in that capacity the concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Prof. Carl Wendling, the fifth man to hold this most important position. Mr. Wendling is concertmeister in the Court Theatre of the King of Wurtemburg and is in this country for only one year. He is one of the great violin virtuosi of the Old World. This, briefly summed up, is the musical treat that Buffalo has offered for the evening of January 27th. Its like will not be heard here in a very long time.

The public sale will not open until shortly before the evening of the concert, but those wishing to secure their seats may order by mail. Orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. The prices of seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

Express

JAN 12 1908

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will be universally considered the most important musical event of the season. The Boston Orchestra will play the next two concerts of the series of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association, and the dates for the appearance of this celebrated band will be at Music Hall on the afternoon of Friday, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

The visit of the Boston Orchestra last season occurred after a number of years' lapse, during which the organization was not heard outside of Boston and the near vicinity. In fact, the engagements near home are so closely crowded together that there remains little time for traveling, and one single week during the entire season is all the open time which the Boston Orchestra has to dispose of for outside dates. Dr. Karl Muck, whose vivid and classical readings made so profound an impression last season, has by special leave of absence, been able to extend the term of his visit to this country for the present year.

Dr. Muck is accounted one of the great conductors of his own country, and his stay here is limited. This will be the only opportunity possible to the music-loving people of this city to hear him direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which his potent direction has inspired with new virility. As a band, the orchestra is, of course, conceded to be the most technically perfect in this country, and perhaps in existence. An ample endowment fund is at the disposal of the managers, which enables all the players to be placed on a salary basis. Difficulties concerning rehearsals do not exist for the Boston Orchestra, neither does the money question enter into any of

News

Buffalo, N.Y.

JAN 12 1908

On January 9th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 170th New York concert, and incidentally its 1,400th performance.

Journal

Buffalo, N.Y.

JAN 12 1908

It is to the courtesy of Kaiser Wilhelm, the German Emperor, that Buffalo owes its one opportunity for hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra play under the magnetic baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who, by special permission of the Kaiser, has been allowed to remain in this country for the present season. Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, and the interest shown in the event is demonstrated by the way in which mail orders are coming in to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager. Large delegations are coming to Buffalo from nearby cities, for the Boston Orchestra is not playing close to Buffalo this season and Dr. Muck and his men will receive the royal welcome to which the splendid organization and its famous leader are entitled. Dr. Muck belongs to the new school. He is not merely a musician of the highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which come from the German universities. He holds the degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. Natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the 14 years preceding his coming to Boston, in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, to which post he must return. He enjoys the personal friendship of the Kaiser and the latter's consent to his favorite's coming to America was reluctantly gained and only through much persuasion.

Dr. Muck is slender and graceful. He is exceptionally quiet in his methods and it is said of him that he is a transparent medium between the audience and the composer. He has accomplished wonders with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has long enjoyed the prestige of being ranked among the few great orchestras of the world. As a rule Dr. Muck does not believe in soloists at his orchestra concerts, but he has arranged to give Buffalo a soloist of international fame in Carl Wendling, the new concertmeister of the Boston Symphony, who is here on a year's leave of absence. Prof. Wendling is one of Europe's greatest violin virtuosi and is the concertmeister in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg. It would seem as if the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra alone were enough to arouse the interest of music lovers in and near Buffalo, but such a combination as this orchestra with its new conductor and its new concertmeister is a musical treat such as Buaffio seldom experiences. Mail orders will be filled in advance of the general sale, which will not open until a few days before the concert. Such orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

From Morning Telegraph New York City

Address

Date JAN 17 1908

SOCIETY GIRLS GIVE SHOW.

Pantomime in Aid of Trade School Draws at Boston.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—Society girls in pantomime, with music by the Symphony Orchestra, was the attraction which filled Jordan Hall yesterday in aid of the trade school for girls.

The production was under the direction of Joseph Lindon Smith and the music for the pantomime was written by Edward B. Hill. There was special interest in the scene from "Peer Gynt," Miss Dorothy Jordan, with the assistance of a number of Vincent Club girls, representing Arab peasants, musicians and dancers, gave "Anitra's Dance."

Press Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 1 2 1908

Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confesses willingly that she has no desire to return to Berlin and that she has never been more content than in the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe College and even seriously meditates going in for a degree; that is, of course, if her husband finally decides to return to Boston after his present engagement, to continue as the conductor of the Orchestra.

[113]

Courier

Buffalo, N.Y.

JAN 12 1908

By special dispensation of Kaiser Wilhelm, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, has been allowed to remain in this country for the present season to act as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, under his magnetic baton, the celebrated organization will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th. It will be Buffalo's one opportunity for hearing Dr. Muck, and the first time in two years that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared here.

The event is occasioning widespread interest. Mail orders from out of town are pouring in on Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, and Buffalo music lovers are also taking advantage of her offer to fill all orders for seats in advance of the public sale.

Ample reason for this interest is not far to seek. Dr. Muck's vogue in America has been tremendous, and it is much to be regretted that this splendid conductor may not be retained in the country that has bestowed upon him such fitting recognition; but the German Kaiser let him go for one year with reluctance, yielded for the present season still more unwillingly, and announced that negotiations for a third season were useless. Dr. Muck has been away quite too long from Berlin and the people clamor for their favorite.

For the fourteen years previous to his coming to America in the fall of 1906, Dr. Muck was first conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, to which post he will return. He is a musician of the new school, a man of broad culture and of wide learning. He is a most unostentatious conductor, and William J. Henderson said of him in the New York Sun that "he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music, the highest achievement possible in the manner of conducting."

Slight of build, elegant and aristocratic, Dr. Muck is the ideal type of the German scholar, musician and gentleman. And the personality of the conductor is reflected in his work, which is polished, brilliant, sincere and musicianly.

Dr. Muck will present as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra its new concertmeister, Prof. Carl Wendling, one of the greatest violin virtuosi of Europe. Prof. Wendling is the concert-meister in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg and is here on a year's leave of absence, so this will be the only opportunity of hearing him.

Small wonder that such a combination of conductor, concert-meister and orchestra should be attracting the attention of music lovers in and near Buffalo. The event merits it all. The public sale of seats for the concert will not open until a few days before the coming of the Boston men, but in the meantime mail orders will be received and filled. They may be sent, accompanied by checks payable to Mai Davis Smith, to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

26

With Dr. Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27, the only appearance of the Boston men in this city for two years. They will not play close to Buffalo again this season and the result is that out-of-town mail orders are pouring in on Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, who is also filling Buffalo mail orders in advance of the general sale.

This will doubtless be Dr. Muck's last season with the Boston orchestra. His stay in America was prolonged by special dispensation of his Imperial Majesty, the German Emperor, and Kaiser Wilhelm refuses to grant the distinguished musician another extension of time.

William J. Henderson in writing of Dr. Muck's recent concert in New York said in the New York Sun: "While directing his orchestra with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master, he so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible in the manner of conduct."

Dr. Muck will present as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra its new concertmaster, Prof. Carl Wendling, concertmaster in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg, who is here on a year's leave of absence. Wendling is one of the greatest violin virtuosi of Europe.

Small wonder that such a combination of director, soloist and orchestra is attracting wide attention. The orchestra is not a virtuoso rather an orchestra of virtuosi and represents the best players that the world can provide.

Mail orders for the concert, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place and will be filled before the opening of the public sale a few days before the concert. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

Buffalo has waited two years for a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, this city will have its first opportunity for hearing the celebrated organization under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. This is in all probability Dr. Muck's last year in Boston, as, by order of Kaiser Wilhelm, he must return to Germany at the close of the present season.

How much interest is felt in the coming of the Boston men and their distinguished conductor is shown by the steady demand for seats that is being made of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager. Many orders are coming from out of town, for the orchestra does not play this season in any city near to Buffalo.

As the famous Boston organization has but one out of its season of 31 weeks to devote to concerts in this part of the country, Buffalo is exceedingly fortunate in securing it.

The orchestra is quite a different organization today from what it was when here in October, 1905, and it has probably never reached such a high artistic standard as now. First, and most important is the change of conductors. Mr. Gericke left the orchestra in 1906, after thirteen years of service, five in his first engagement, and eight in his second. In his place came Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Dr. Muck came in the fall of 1906. While his reputation abroad was second to none, his name was little known in America. He came on a year's leave of absence, which was secured after much difficulty and long negotiations directly with Emperor William. His success here last season is musical history. It is quite safe to say that of all the great conductors who have visited America, none has made a more deep and lasting impression than this man. He quickly showed himself a musician of highest attainments; a conductor with a faculty of command born in him; an artist whose sympathies are wide and generous; and a man whom to know is counted a privilege.

Before his first season was half over it was evident that the perplexing problem of finding a conductor worthy of a great musical body like the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been solved, but the trouble was how to keep him. Before coming to America, he had signed a new six-year contract with the Berlin Opera House. It was evident that he could not be retained here long, and all the influence that the orchestra can exert was bent to the task of securing for him an additional year's leave of absence. Dr. Muck frankly said that he would like to stay another year, but that he would not lift a hand to bring this about. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring such influences to bear on the German Emperor as would give him additional leave of absence, well and good. If not, he would have to return to Berlin. After four months of negotiations, the Emperor extended his leave of absence, but what will happen next year is unknown. The managements is using every influence possible to have him released from his contract in Berlin, and it is hoped that this can be done, but the result is doubtful.

Toward the end of last season Dr. Muck expressed the opinion that there were several weak spots in the orchestra that ought to be strengthened. Free hand was given to him, with the result that when the orchestra assembled for rehearsals last fall, it contained seventeen new men. Willy Hess, at his own request, had been granted a year's leave of absence to spend in Germany. This meant a new concert-master, and Dr. Muck brought from Stuttgart, Carl Wendling, who received a year's leave of absence from the King of Wurtemburg. Mr. Wendling was concert-master in Stuttgart, also at the Wagner festivals in Bayreuth, and the months that he has been in Boston shows that both as concert-master and as virtuoso he has ably maintained the high standards set by his predecessors. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist at that Buffalo concert. The orchestra is somewhat larger than it was a year ago. On this trip it will carry 85 musicians, the largest orchestra that has ever come into this part of the country.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. They will be filled in advance of the public sale, which does not open until a few days before the concert. Prices of reserved seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

On January 9th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 150th New York concert, and incidentally its 1555th performance.

With Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its long-desired concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, the first and only opportunity for Buffalo to hear the famous orchestra under its new conductor. Dr. Muck is to remain in this country for only the present season, as, by order of the German Emperor, he must return to Berlin. His leave of absence was originally for one year, but he was granted the second winter in Boston by special dispensation of his royal patron.

That Buffalo appreciates its one opportunity for hearing the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck is demonstrated by the steady demand for seats. Ever since the local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would receive mail orders, they have been coming in, including a large representation from out of town. The Boston men do not play in any city close to Buffalo this season.

Dr. Muck belongs to the new school. He is not merely a musician of the highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which come from the German universities. He holds the degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston, in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin. During this time he has enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor, who unwillingly gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to America and is allowing him to remain here with great reluctance.

Dr. Muck is slender and graceful. His views on conducting are particularly interesting, for he believes that the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it and, having given through the orchestra expression to this, his work is done. He is one of the greatest conductors of his time. William J. Henderson in a thoughtful review of the man and his work, said of Dr. Muck in the New York Sun: "He so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible in the manner of conducting."

Dr. Muck is of the opinion that the introduction of a soloist at an orchestra concert is, as a rule, a mistake, as it tends to break the continuity of the musical thought. But for the Buffalo program he will avoid any break in continuity and yet yield to popular taste in having a soloist by presenting in that capacity the concert meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Prof. Carl Wendling, the fifth man to hold this most important position. Mr. Wendling is concertmeister in the Court Theatre of the King of Wurtemburg and is in this country for only one year. He is one of the great violin virtuosi of the Old World. This, briefly summed up, is the musical treat that Buffalo has offered for the evening of January 27th. Its like will not be heard here in a very long time.

The public sale will not open until shortly before the evening of the concert; but those wishing to secure their seats may order by mail. Orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. The prices of seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will be universally considered the most important musical event of the season. The Boston Orchestra will play the next two concerts of the series of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association, and the dates for the appearance of this celebrated band will be at Music Hall on the afternoon of Friday, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

The visit of the Boston Orchestra last season occurred after a number of years' lapse, during which the organization was not heard outside of Boston and the near vicinity. In fact, the engagements near home are so closely crowded together that there remains little time for traveling, and one single week during the entire season is all the open time which the Boston Orchestra has to dispose of for outside dates. Dr. Karl Muck, whose vivid and classical readings made so profound an impression last season, has by special leave of absence, been able to extend the term of his visit to this country for the present year.

Dr. Muck is accounted one of the great conductors of his own country, and his stay here is limited. This will be the only opportunity possible to the music-loving people of this city to hear him direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which his potent direction has inspired with new virility. As a band, the orchestra is, of course, conceded to be the most technically perfect in this country, and perhaps in existence. An ample endowment fund is at the disposal of the managers, which enables all the players to be placed on a salary basis. Difficulties concerning rehearsals do not exist for the Boston Orchestra, neither does the money question enter into any of its plans for securing the services of the best men, wherever such are available.

It is to the courtesy of Kaiser Wilhelm, the German Emperor, that Buffalo owes its one opportunity for hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra play under the magnetic baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who, by special permission of the Kaiser, has been allowed to remain in this country for the present season. Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, and the interest shown in the event is demonstrated by the way in which mail orders are coming in to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager. Large delegations are coming to Buffalo from nearby cities, for the Boston Orchestra is not playing close to Buffalo this season and Dr. Muck and his men will receive the royal welcome to which the splendid organization and its famous leader are entitled. Dr. Muck belongs to the new school. He is not merely a musician of the highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which come from the German universities. He holds the degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. Natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the 14 years preceding his coming to Boston, in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, to which post he must return. He enjoys the personal friendship of the Kaiser and the latter's consent to his favorite's coming to America was reluctantly gained and only through much persuasion.

Dr. Muck is slender and graceful. He is exceptionally quiet in his methods and it is said of him that he is a transparent medium between the audience and the composer. He has accomplished wonders with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has long enjoyed the prestige of being ranked among the few great orchestras of the world. As a rule Dr. Muck does not believe in soloists at his orchestra concerts, but he has arranged to give Buffalo a soloist of international fame in Carl Wendling, the new concertmeister of the Boston Symphony, who is here on a year's leave of absence. Prof. Wendling is one of Europe's greatest violin virtuosi and is the concertmeister in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg. It would seem as if the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra alone were enough to arouse the interest of music lovers in and near Buffalo, but such a combination as this orchestra with its new conductor and its new concertmeister is a musical treat such as Buafflo seldom experiences. Mail orders will be filled in advance of the general sale, which will not open until a few days before the concert. Such orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

SOCIETY GIRLS GIVE SHOW.

Pantomime in Aid of Trade School Draws at Boston.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—Society girls in pantomime, with music by the Symphony Orchestra, was the attraction which filled Jordan Hall yesterday in aid of the trade school for girls.

The production was under the direction of Joseph Lindon Smith and the music for the pantomime was written by Edward B. Hill. There was special interest in the scene from "Peer Gynt." Miss Dorothy Jordan, with the assistance of a number of Vincent Club girls, representing Arab peasants, musicians and dancers, gave "Anitra's Dance."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y

Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confesses willingly that she has no desire to return to Berlin and that she has never been more content than in the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe College and even seriously meditates going in for a degree; that is, of course, if her husband finally decides to return to Boston after his present engagement, to continue as the conductor of the Orchestra.

[113]

By special dispensation of Kaiser Wilhelm, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, has been allowed to remain in this country for the present season to act as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, under his magnetic baton, the celebrated organization will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th. It will be Buffalo's one opportunity for hearing Dr. Muck, and the first time in two years that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared here.

The event is occasioning widespread interest. Mail orders from out of town are pouring in on Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, and Buffalo music lovers are also taking advantage of her offer to fill all orders for seats in advance of the public sale.

Ample reason for this interest is not far to seek. Dr. Muck's vogue in America has been tremendous, and it is much to be regretted that this splendid conductor may not be retained in the country that has bestowed upon him such fitting recognition; but the German Kaiser let him go for one year with reluctance, yielded for the present season still more unwillingly, and announced that negotiations for a third season were useless. Dr. Muck has been away quite too long from Berlin and the people clamor for their favorite.

For the fourteen years previous to his coming to America in the fall of 1906, Dr. Muck was first conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, to which post he will return. He is a musician of the new school, a man of broad culture and of wide learning. He is a most unostentatious conductor, and William J. Henderson said of him in the New York Sun that "he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music, the highest achievement possible in the manner of conducting."

Slight of build, elegant and aristocratic, Dr. Muck is the ideal type of the German scholar, musician and gentleman. And the personality of the conductor is reflected in his work, which is polished, brilliant, sincere and musicianly.

Dr. Muck will present as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra its new concertmeister, Prof. Carl Wendling, one of the greatest violin virtuosi of Europe. Prof. Wendling is the concert-meister in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg and is here on a year's leave of absence, so this will be the only opportunity of hearing him.

Small wonder that such a combination of conductor, concert-meister and orchestra should be attracting the attention of music lovers in and near Buffalo. The event merits it all. The public sale of seats for the concert will not open until a few days before the coming of the Boston men, but in the meantime mail orders will be received and filled. They may be sent, accompanied by checks payable to Mai Davis Smith, to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

With Dr. Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting, the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27, the only appearance of the Boston men in this city for two years. They will not play close to Buffalo again this season and the result is that out-of-town mail orders are pouring in on Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, who is also filling Buffalo mail orders in advance of the general sale.

This will doubtless be Dr. Muck's last season with the Boston orchestra. His stay in America was prolonged by special dispensation of his Imperial Majesty, the German Emperor, and Kaiser Wilhelm refuses to grant the distinguished musician another extension of time.

William J. Henderson in writing of Dr. Muck's recent concert in New York said in the New York Sun: "While directing his orchestra with the certainty of an authority and the command of a master, he so effaces his personality that he becomes a perfectly transparent medium between the audience and the music. This is the highest achievement possible in the manner of conduct."

Dr. Muck will present as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra its new concertmaster, Prof. Carl Wendling, concertmaster in the Court Theater of the King of Wurtemburg, who is here on a year's leave of absence. Wendling is one of the greatest violin virtuosi of Europe.

Small wonder that such a combination of director, soloist and orchestra is attracting wide attention. The orchestra is not a virtuoso ... rather an orchestra of virtuosi and represents the best players that the world can provide.

Mail orders for the concert, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place and will be filled before the opening of the public sale a few days before the concert takes place. The prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND

WHOLE TRAINLOAD OF ORCHESTRA TO COME WEST

Eighty-Five Boston Symphony Musicians will Make the Journey with Dr. Muck.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its second successive concert in Indianapolis, under the management of Ona B. Talbot, at Caleb Mills Hall, Wednesday evening, January 29, will leave Boston on the preceding Sunday evening, and will travel in three of the largest size Pullman sleepers. In fact much of its traveling on this trip will be on a special train, because in addition to the three sleepers is a sixty-foot baggage car, needed for the instruments and luggage of the members. The orchestra will bring west eighty-four musicians, and will be in the direct charge of Fred R. Comee, the assistant manager. Mr. Comee is now completing his twentieth year of service with the organization, and is probably the best known man in musical circles, for those people who do not know Comee personally have heard of his stories, for he is a famous raconteur.

Dr. Muck, of course, travels with the orchestra, and this year, as last, he is accompanied by Mrs. Muck, both of whom many residents of Indianapolis met when they were here last season. Mrs. Muck, in the year and a half of her residence in Boston, has become an enthusiastic American and a loyal Bostonian, carrying her loyalty to the extent of going over to Radcliffe to take a course of lectures there. How far Dr. Muck has become enamored of America is one of the mysteries no one has yet been able to solve, because he is probably the most discreet and non-committal man that ever came over the ocean, and he may think all things for or against, and the wonderful mask that is his face will never betray him. But with his wife there is no question about her sentiments, and she frankly says that she hopes she will never have to live in Berlin again. To be sure, this may not mean everything for America, because Mrs. Muck is an Austrian, and the bonds of love between Austrians and Prussians are not very strong. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck remember Indianapolis with a great deal of pleasure, and have spoken often of the pleasant time they had here last year.

Mr. Wendling, the new concertmaster, is a bachelor so far as America is concerned, for he left his young wife in Stuttgart when he came to Boston last fall, as he did not think it was worth while to break up his German home and bring her over here for seven months.

Mrs. Taibot announces that because of the large demand for seats for the reappearance of Dr. Muck and the orchestra, tickets may be had by mail before the opening of the regular box office sale at the Big Four ticket office Monday, January 27.

GLOBE—JANUARY 19, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mozart Novelties at the Symphony.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's three German dances and Beethoven's fourth symphony comprised the 12th Symphony program; three interesting numbers without a soloist, just pure, enjoyable orchestral music which gave Dr Muck's splendid band of instrumentalists the chance to win all the honors of the day and evening.

Three great names, two symphonies and one group of "novelties" written more than a century back surely formed a dignified and solid musical combination, yet there was melody a-plenty in the Mozart dances and the grand old-time symphonies fell pleasingly upon the ear, for many harmonies were woven by the masters through each of their compositions.

A novelty by Mozart seems strange nowadays, yet these three German dances, which were written in 1791, were new to the Symphony programs. They are dainty and quaint bits of musical pleasantry, varied in character to suit the styles of the dancing. The third one, called "The Sleighride," was particularly charming with its post horns and jangle of sleigh bells.

The Haydn symphony, so joyous and thematically prolific, was played with a finesse and smoothness that showed the ensemble work of the orchestra in fine form. In the performance the delightfully pastoral atmosphere of the andante and the menuetto of the third part were notable examples in shadings and changes of rhythms, probably as nearly perfect as one is likely to hear by any body of players.

The Beethoven number deserves equal commendation, for the interpretation was as impressive and appealing in its perfectness as the Haydn symphony. Generally delicate and happy in its makeup, the Beethoven work shows many vigorous moments. And in all the intricacies of the composition in the peculiar treatment of themes in the first part, in the odd phrasing of the scherzo, the blithesome finale and the unexpected fortissimos in the first movement, the orchestra met all requirements. Truly a splendid performance, not only of this, but of the three works.

This week's program will be made up of modern music, representative of modern Germany, modern America and modern France. The first work is Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The second number is a "Suite Fantastique," by Ernest Schelling. This is a work for piano and orchestra, and the composer will be the pianist. Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," will close the program.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Light Symphonies Out of Haydn and Beethoven and Three Dances by Mozart Hitherto Unheard Here—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Unfamiliar French Music—A New String Quartet to Appear—Other Announcements for Next Week and Weeks to Come

For the twelfth pair of concerts Dr. Muck has chosen a classic programme of almost unbroken cheerfulness and good humor, consisting of Haydn's symphony in G usually designated as "Surprise," or "with the drum stroke"; three German dances by Mozart and to conclude Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat Op 60.

It was a matter of surprise to note the large and attentive audience, despite the absence of a soloist. Apparently a group of classics is of conspicuously greater interest than that for instance of some weeks ago, when a programme also without soloist, was noticeably less of a drawing card despite the fact that MacDowell's first suite had not been played here for some years, and that Goetz's fresh and piquant symphony and Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie" were even more in the nature of rarities. The familiar Haydn symphony was given with astonishing exuberance and spontaneity, with unusually precise phrasing and delicate accent; the famous drum stroke, which was a source of consternation and terror to audiences of a hundred years ago, was capitally prepared by the extreme pianissimo of the strings, so that those who were unprepared might easily have started in alarm.

It is undeniable that the German dances by Mozart fitted admirably into the scheme of programme prepared by Dr. Muck. Intrinsically they are not of absorbing musical interest. They are obviously written for an occasion, and as such served their purpose. In the third dance, "the sleigh ride" doubtless having in mind the popularity of sledge parties in Vienna, the introduction of two sets of bells carefully tuned, as well as the post horns, brought a welcome touch of quasi-realistic humor that was distinctly captivating.

It would be difficult to imagine a finer interpretation of the Beethoven symphony. Avoiding, on the one hand a lifeless and uninspired "classical" rendering, it was also far removed from an ultra modern reading, which too often assumes details contrary to the spirit of the composer. Nevertheless there was no lack of warmth and vital emotion; if there were modifications of tempo, they were such as would have doubtless been sanctioned by Beethoven. The brilliant vivacity, the poetry, the humor and the sad serenity of the slow movement were brought to a realization that is seldom to be equalled for perfection, sense of balance and proportion. Especially remarkable was the absolute pianissimo of the strings in the first movement before the return of the first theme; the poetic expressiveness of the clarinet solos in the slow movement; the exquisite grace of the wind instruments in the trio of the third movement, and finally the transparent velocity of the strings in the vivacious finale. Dr. Muck is heartily to be thanked for such a performance of a classic work in days when its outlines are too often distorted, and its sentiment wilfully misunderstood.

E. B. H.

Concerts Next Week

No symphony stands on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week—the last before the orchestra departs for its midwinter journey to the West. Instead, Dr. Muck has chosen three pieces of ultra-modern music—two tone-poems and a "Fantastic Suite." One of the tone-poems is Richard Strauss's familiar "Till Eulenspiegel," the first of his music to be played at the Symphony Concerts this season, and one for which Dr. Muck has warm liking. The other tone-poem is unfamiliar—"Viviane," by Ernest Chausson, originally played here six years ago. Chausson, almost needless to say, is the French composer, pupil of César Franck and companion of Mr. d'Indy and other of the "new" men, whose quartet for piano and strings, and whose symphony have been more recently played here. An accident cut off Chausson in what seemed the very prime of his powers. "Viviane" is a comparatively early work that Chausson at least once rewrote—romantic music cast in Wagnerian yet individual mould. The "Fantastic Suite" is the new piece of the programme, and Ernest Schelling, the imaginative pianist, first heard here three years ago, wrote it for piano and orchestra. It comes to performance next week for the first times in America, and Mr. Schelling himself plays the piano part.

On Thursday evening, at eight, in the Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the orchestra will give the third of its concerts in that city with Goetz's pretty little symphony, Bizet's warm and rich overture, "Our Country," and Saint-Saëns concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra to make the programme. In the concerto Louis Bachner, returned from his years of study in Europe, will play the solo part.

WORLD,

New York City.

JAN 20 1908

Muck to Leave Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing, as announced by Manager C. A. Ellis, "to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin."

CONCERT PLEASES

Classical Programme and Fine Performance Before Large Audience.

MOZART DANCES PLAYED HERE FOR FIRST TIME

Include Post Horn and Sleigh Bells—"The Surprise," Symphony by Haydn.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Karl Muck, conductor, gave its 12th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"..Haydn
Three German Dances (K. 605).....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major.....Beethoven

There is little to be said at this late day about the character of these symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven and there is little to be said about the performance of them except that it was admirable and that it gave great pleasure to the audience. The symphony by Haydn has not been played at these concerts for several years and it was good to hear it.

It was a good thing to remind the younger generation that there were brave men before Agamemnon; that there were musicians 100 years ago, and over 100 years ago, who in their period were regarded as revolutionary and dangerous, who wrote music that still today is fresh and beautiful and in some instances wonderful. The symphony of Haydn, composed in 1791, pleased at once. The symphony of Beethoven, first performed in 1807, at first perplexed if it did not shock the hearers. Old as they are, they are more modern than many works written within the last 25 years, which had their little day of triumph, found prophets swearing immortality, and are now dead—dead as King Pandion, whose bones centuries ago were lapped in lead, as the poet tells us.

On Plenary Inspiration.

No sane person today believes in plenary inspiration. There are hopelessly antiquated pages of Beethoven; there are pages by him and Mozart and Haydn that are tiresome jingle. To bow down before a platitude simply because it came from a great master is to indulge in fetichism. On the other hand, to decry all music that was written before the time of Berlioz or Wagner is equally foolish; it shows both a lack of discriminative appreciation and a pitiable ignorance.

These statements themselves would be platitudes in an ideal world, one in which music were really held to be an art and not a trade, an agreeable occupation. But these statements cannot be repeated too often, when partisanship runs high, when the hide-bound conservatives and the wild-eyed seekers after something new are alike intolerant and aggressive.

The dances composed by Mozart in the last year of his life for masked balls in Vienna were played here for the first time. They were interesting in two ways—first, as an illustration of the dance music of the period; also as a reminder of the social life of the Vienna populace. In the trio of the second dance are harmonic progressions that must have seemed strange at the time and are worthy of the great Mozart. The trio of the third waltz, with its posthorn and sleigh bells—for the trio is entitled "The Sleigh Ride"—is charming by reason of its quaint grace, and the Coda is even still more delightful.

As I have said, the performance throughout was masterly. Special praise might be given to the performance of the andante of Haydn's symphony, of the first movement and the adagio of Beethoven's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom TOWN & COUNTRY

ddress NEW YORK CITY

ate JAN 18 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Muck gave its third evening concert on Thursday, January ninth, and its third afternoon concert on Saturday, January eleventh. At the evening concert the audience was given the difficult task of following for an hour and a quarter a symphony by Hermann Bischoff a contemporary composer whose works had not been given here before. The symphony contains some interesting material, but much that is uninteresting and dull in spite of the splendid and careful reading of Dr. Muck, and the fine response of the men of the orchestra who gave a spirited and beautifully colored performance of the work which is most intricate. This was appreciated by the audience, however, and Dr. Muck had his men rise and acknowledge with him the applause. Madame Carreño was the soloist of the evening and played in a superb manner MacDowell's D minor concerto which is one of that composer's best utterances. The pianiste was most expressive in her feeling for the poetry and eloquence of the work and played it with a dash and brilliancy that called forth the most enthusiastic applause. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

Mr. Carl Wendling was to have been the soloist for Saturday afternoon, playing a concerto by Mozart, but as he was indisposed Dr. Muck substituted MacDowell's suite in A minor, a pleasing, graceful work, which was played with all possible charm. The other numbers of the program were Kogel's arrangement of Haendel's concerto grosso in F for the wind choirs and string orchestra (there were five movements in all and they were played with ravishing tonal effects); and Goetz's symphony in F major, which was unknown to many, not having been played for a very long time. It was most pleasing being melodious and fresh and graceful in spirit.

[114]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the [illegible] concert in Boston), Mozart's symphony No. 4, in B flat major, Beethoven.

Haydn! Mozart! Beethoven! Now and again Dr. Muck becomes conscious with an impulse for a classic [illegible] these are interesting times. Last Wednesday in New York Sam Franko held a concert in Mendelssohn Hall, where a set of dances by Beethoven were given their first orchestral performance in this country. And, apparently, judging by reports of the occasion, the dances were about as worthy of a place on a programme as the majority of novelties that we have been privileged to hear of late.

The Haydn symphony—it is not the first time that Dr. Muck has wrought wonders with music by Haydn—was given a remarkably fresh, brilliant performance.

Did not Beethoven owe far more to Haydn than to Mozart? The matter might be discussed at far greater length than present conditions permit, and the discussion would not, perhaps, be entirely relevant to this occasion, for Mozart was not accorded a most worthy representation by the dances played yesterday.

At any rate, the transition from the "Surprise" symphony to the work by Beethoven was so logical and direct as to require no bridge between—no doubt there was a method in Dr. Muck's madness—and the formative strength that made possible such a superb, ideally wonderful tone-structure as the adagio of this symphony from the germ of an idiotically simple and obvious melody served as well to blaze the path that the mighty Ludwig soon followed with such tremendous results.

Man, alas! must eat, and even the glorious Mozart was frequently forced to descend to hack-work. The first two dances have little, if any, distinction. If their manner is more refined by reason of melodic grace and simplicity, they are not less music for the dance hall than much that you can hear nowadays at festive gatherings. It was not hard, as one listened, to see the eternally revolving couples, the tired musicians and the garish light of early morn creeping in through the crevices at the windows. Only in the last dance, which did not, it appears, originally belong to the group of three, is there one of those moments which seem to the glad auditor as the very essence of all melody, such moments as we find only in Mozart. Here the delicacy and charm of the instrumentation is enhanced by the naive effect of sleigh bells in the trio ("The Sleigh ride").

Why should we say that the fourth symphony represents one of Beethoven's lesser efforts? Again the composer returns to nature, the source of all, and there are few passages in any of his works more replete with the infinite mystery of creation than the introduction of this symphony. The slow movement remains a masterpiece of rare and wondrous beauty. Though permeated with tincture of Haydn the finale is not a whit the less welcome. Its exhilarating vivacity and jollity brought a happy conclusion to the concert. There are those who experience displeasure in descending from the heights of the slow movement; to the writer one of the finest traits of Beethoven's colossal genius is his full-blooded democratic humanity.

Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8, in Symphony Hall, the 13th public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given. The programme consists of Richard Strauss' remarkable rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Suite Fantastique" for piano and orchestra, Ernest Schelling; symphonic poem, "Viviane," by Ernest Chausson. Mr. Schelling's suite was first played in Holland last summer. If we are not mistaken it will be given its first performance in America next Friday afternoon. Mr. Schelling is a Philadelphian, who made his first and only appearance with the orchestra as soloist three years ago. He has been a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, and has studied with Hans Huber in Basle, Switzerland. He is also distinguished as being one of the few people that Paderewski has interested himself in since he—Paderewski—became famous. Chausson's "Viviane" was given its first and only performance in Boston in 1902. When Chausson died of a bicycle accident in 1899, at the age of 34, France lost a man who had given extraordinary promise. "Viviane" was performed for the first time in Paris under Pasdeloup. Afterwards Chausson rewrote and reorchestrated his work, and its first performance in the revised version took place at a Lamoureux concert in 1898. Theodore Thomas brought out the poem in 1898, and it was given at a Philharmonic concert in New York the same year. It is interesting to note that when the first performance took place in Paris the work was practically ignored on account of the fact that Chausson was a Wagnerite, and this was a very poor policy for a Frenchman 23 years ago. The revival of interest in the unusual creations of this composer is due chiefly to Arthur Nikisch, who produced Chausson's symphony in Paris in 1897. Since then the opera, "King Arthur," has been performed in Brussels.

BULLETIN

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

JAN 18 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his conviction that a conductor, in making his concert program, is betwixt the devil and deep sea. "He's cursed if he presents novelties," says Dr. Muck, "and he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played." Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day, and frankly says that little of value has been written and the value of most of it lies only in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is to be had, the new music must be [illegible] does not [illegible]

IND

WHOLE TRAINLOAD OF ORCHESTRA TO COME WEST

Eighty-Five Boston Symphony Musicians will Make the Journey with Dr. Muck.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its second successive concert in Indianapolis, under the management of Ona B. Talbot, at Caleb Mills Hall, Wednesday evening, January 29, will leave Boston on the preceding Sunday evening, and will travel in three of the largest size Pullman sleepers. In fact much of its traveling on this trip will be on a special train, because in addition to the three sleepers is a sixty-foot baggage car, needed for the instruments and luggage of the members. The orchestra will bring west eighty-four musicians, and will be in the direct charge of Fred R. Comee, the assistant manager. Mr. Comee is now completing his twentieth year of service with the organization, and is probably the best known man in musical circles, for those people who do not know Comee personally have heard of his stories, for he is a famous raconteur.

Dr. Muck, of course, travels with the orchestra, and this year, as last, he is accompanied by Mrs. Muck, both of whom many residents of Indianapolis met when they were here last season. Mrs. Muck, in the year and a half of her residence in Boston, has become an enthusiastic American and a loyal Bostonian, carrying her loyalty to the extent of going over to Radcliffe to take a course of lectures there. How far Dr. Muck has become enamored of America is one of the mysteries no one has yet been able to solve, because he is probably the most discreet and non-committal man that ever came over the ocean, and he may think all things for or against, and the wonderful mask that is his face will never betray him. But with his wife there is no question about her sentiments, and she frankly says that she hopes she will never have to live in Berlin again. To be sure, this may not mean everything for America, because Mrs. Muck is an Austrian, and the bonds of love between Austrians and Prussians are not very strong. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck remember Indianapolis wth a great deal of pleasure, and have spoken often of the pleasant time they had here last year.

Mr. Wendling, the new concertmaster, is a bachelor so far as America is concerned, for he left his young wife in Stuttgart when he came to Boston last fall, as he did not think it was worth while to break up his German home and bring her over here for seven months.

Mrs. Talbot announces that because of the large demand for seats for the reappearance of Dr. Muck and the orchestra, tickets may be had by mail before the opening of the regular box office sale at the Big Four ticket office Monday, January 27.

GLOBE—JANUARY 19, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mozart Novelties at the Symphony.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's three German dances and Beethoven's fourth symphony comprised the 12th Symphony program; three interesting numbers without a soloist, just pure, enjoyable orchestral music which gave Dr Muck's splendid band of instrumentalists the chance to win all the honors of the day and evening.

Three great names, two symphonies and one group of "novelties" written more than a century back surely formed a dignified and solid musical combination, yet there was melody a-plenty in the Mozart dances and the grand old-time symphonies fell pleasingly upon the ear, for many harmonies were woven by the masters through each of their compositions.

A novelty by Mozart seems strange nowadays, yet these three German dances, which were written in 1791, were new to the Symphony programs. They are dainty and quaint bits of musical pleasantry, varied in character to suit the styles of the dancing. The third one, called "The Sleighride," was particularly charming with its post horns and jangle of sleigh bells.

The Haydn symphony, so joyous and thematically prolific, was played with a finesse and smoothness that showed the ensemble work of the orchestra in fine form. In the performance the delightfully pastoral atmosphere of the andante and the menuetto of the third part were notable examples in shadings and changes of rhythms, probably as nearly perfect as one is likely to hear by any body of players.

The Beethoven number deserves equal commendation, for the interpretation was as impressive and appealing in its perfectness as the Haydn symphony. Generally delicate and happy in its makeup, the Beethoven work shows many vigorous moments. And in all the intricacies of the composition in the peculiar treatment of themes in the first part, in the odd phrasing of the scherzo, the blithesome finale and the unexpected fortissimos in the first movement, the orchestra met all requirements. Truly a splendid performance, not only of this, but of the three works.

This week's program will be made up of modern music, representative of modern Germany, modern America and modern France. The first work is Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The second number is a "Suite Fantastique," by Ernest Schelling. This is a work for piano and orchestra, and the composer will be the pianist. Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," will close the program.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY JANUARY 18, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A PROGRAMME FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Light Symphonies Out of Haydn and Beethoven and Three Dances by Mozart Hitherto Unheard Here—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Unfamiliar French Music—A New String Quartet to Appear—Other Announcements for Next Week and Weeks to Come

For the twelfth pair of concerts Dr. Muck has chosen a classic programme of almost unbroken cheerfulness and good humor, consisting of Haydn's symphony in G usually designated as "Surprise," or "with the drum stroke"; three German dances by Mozart and to conclude Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat Op 60.

It was a matter of surprise to note the large and attentive audience, despite the absence of a soloist. Apparently a group of classics is of conspicuously greater interest than that for instance of some weeks ago, when a programme also without soloist, was noticeably less of a drawing card despite the fact that MacDowell's first suite had not been played here for some years, and that Goetz's fresh and piquant symphony and Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie" were even more in the nature of rarities. The familiar Haydn symphony was given with astonishing exuberance and spontaneity, with unusually precise phrasing and delicate accent; the famous drum stroke, which was a source of consternation and terror to audiences of a hundred years ago, was capitally prepared by the extreme pianissimo of the strings, so that those who were unprepared might easily have started in alarm.

It is undeniable that the German dances by Mozart fitted admirably into the scheme of programme prepared by Dr. Muck. Intrinsically they are not of absorbing musical interest. They are obviously written for an occasion, and as such served their purpose. In the third dance, "the sleigh ride" doubtless having in mind the popularity of sledge parties in Vienna, the introduction of two sets of bells carefully tuned, as well as the post horns, brought a welcome touch of quasi-realistic humor that was distinctly captivating.

It would be difficult to imagine a finer interpretation of the Beethoven symphony. Avoiding, on the one hand a lifeless and uninspired "classical" rendering, it was also far removed from an ultra modern reading, which too often assumes details contrary to the spirit of the composer. Nevertheless there was no lack of warmth and vital emotion; if there were modifications of tempo, they were such as would have doubtless been sanctioned by Beethoven. The brilliant vivacity, the poetry, the humor and the sad serenity of the slow movement were brought to a realization that is seldom to be equalled for perfection, sense of balance and proportion. Especially remarkable was the absolute pianissimo of the strings in the first movement before the return of the first theme; the poetic expressiveness of the clarinet solos in the slow movement; the exquisite grace of the wind instruments in the trio of the third movement, and finally the transparent velocity of the strings in the vivacious finale. Dr. Muck is heartily to be thanked for such a performance of a classic work in days when its outlines are too often distorted, and its sentiment wilfully misunderstood.

E. B. H.

Concerts Next Week

No symphony stands on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week—the last before the orchestra departs for its midwinter journey to the West. Instead, Dr. Muck has chosen three pieces of ultra-modern music—two tone-poems and a "Fantastic Suite." One of the tone-poems is Richard Strauss's familiar "Til Eulenspiegel," the first of his music to be played at the Symphony Concerts this season, and one for which Dr. Muck has warm liking. The other tone-poem is unfamiliar—"Viviane," by Ernest Chausson, originally played here six years ago. Chausson, almost needless to say, is the French composer, pupil of César Franck and companion of Mr. d'Indy and other of the "new" men, whose quartet for piano and strings, and whose symphony have been more recently played here. An accident cut off Chausson in what seemed the very prime of his powers. "Viviane" is a comparatively early work that Chausson at least once rewrote—romantic music cast in Wagnerian yet individual mould. The "Fantastic Suite" is the new piece of the programme, and Ernest Schelling, the imaginative pianist, first heard here three years ago, wrote it for piano and orchestra. It comes to performance next week for the first times in America, and Mr. Schelling himself plays the piano part.

On Thursday evening, at eight, in the Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the orchestra will give the third of its concerts in that city with Goetz's pretty little symphony, Bizet's warm and rich overture, "Our Country," and Saint-Saëns concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra to make the programme. In the concerto Louis Bachner, returned from his years of study in Europe, will play the solo part.

WORLD,

ss New York City.

Muck to Leave Boston Symphony.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing, as announced by Manager C. A. Ellis, "to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin."

HERALD—BOSTON, JANUARY 19, 1908

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Classical Programme and Fine Performance Before Large Audience.

MOZART DANCES PLAYED HERE FOR FIRST TIME

Include Post Horn and Sleigh Bells—"The Surprise," Symphony by Haydn.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Karl Muck, conductor, gave its 12th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise"..Haydn
Three German Dances (K. 605).....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major.....Beethoven

There is little to be said at this late day about the character of these symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven and there is little to be said about the performance of them except that it was admirable and that it gave great pleasure to the audience. The symphony by Haydn has not been played at these concerts for several years and it was good to hear it.

It was a good thing to remind the younger generation that there were brave men before Agamemnon; that there were musicians 100 years ago, and over 100 years ago, who in their period were regarded as revolutionary and dangerous, who wrote music that still today is fresh and beautiful and in some instances wonderful. The symphony of Haydn, composed in 1791, pleased at once. The symphony of Beethoven, first performed in 1807, at first perplexed if it did not shock the hearers. Old as they are, they are more modern than many works written within the last 25 years, which had their little day of triumph, found prophets swearing immortality, and are now dead—dead as King Pandion, whose bones centuries ago were lapped in lead, as the poet tells us.

On Plenary Inspiration.

No sane person today believes in plenary inspiration. There are hopelessly antiquated pages of Beethoven; there are pages by him and Mozart and Haydn that are tiresome jingle. To bow down before a platitude simply because it came from a great master is to indulge in fetichism. On the other hand, to decry all music that was written before the time of Berlioz or Wagner is equally foolish; it shows both a lack of discriminative appreciation and a pitiable ignorance.

These statements themselves would be platitudes in an ideal world, one in which music were really held to be an art and not a trade, an agreeable occupation. But these statements cannot be repeated too often, when partisanship runs high, when the hide-bound conservatives and the wild-eyed seekers after something new are alike intolerant and aggressive.

The dances composed by Mozart in the last year of his life for masked balls in Vienna were played here for the first time. They were interesting in two ways—first, as an illustration of the dance music of the period; also as a reminder of the social life of the Vienna populace. In the trio of the second dance are harmonic progressions that must have seemed strange at the time and are worthy of the great Mozart. The trio of the third waltz, with its posthorn and sleigh bells—for the trio is entitled "The Sleigh Ride"—is charming by reason of its quaint grace, and the Coda is even still more delightful.

As I have said, the performance throughout was masterly. Special praise might be given to the performance of the andante of Haydn's symphony, of the first movement and the adagio of Beethoven's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress NEW YORK CITY

ate JAN 18 '08

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Muck gave its third evening concert on Thursday, January ninth, and its third afternoon concert on Saturday, January eleventh. At the evening concert the audience was given the difficult task of following for an hour and a quarter a symphony by Hermann Bischoff a contemporary composer whose works had not been given here before. The symphony contains some interesting material, but much that is uninteresting and dull in spite of the splendid and careful reading of Dr. Muck, and the fine response of the men of the orchestra who gave a spirited and beautifully colored performance of the work which is most intricate. This was appreciated by the audience, however, and Dr. Muck had his men rise and acknowledge with him the applause. Madame Carreño was the soloist of the evening and played in a superb manner MacDowell's D minor concerto which is one of that composer's best utterances. The pianiste was most expressive in her feeling for the poetry and eloquence of the work and played it with a dash and brilliancy that called forth the most enthusiastic applause. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

Mr. Carl Wendling was to have been the soloist for Saturday afternoon, playing a concerto by Mozart, but as he was indisposed Dr. Muck substituted MacDowell's suite in A minor, a pleasing, graceful work, which was played with all possible charm. The other numbers of the program were Kogel's arrangement of Haendel's concerto grosso in F for the wind choirs and string orchestra (there were five movements in all and they were played with ravishing tonal effects); and Goetz's symphony in F major, which was unknown to many, not having been played for a very long time. It was most pleasing being melodious and fresh and graceful in spirit.

[114]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the 12th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra the programme was as follows: Symphony in G major ("Surprise"), Haydn; three German dances (first time in Boston), Mozart; symphony No. 4, in B flat major, Beethoven.

Haydn! Mozart! Beethoven! Now and again Dr. Muck becomes consumed with an impulse for a classic orgy. These are interesting times. Last Wednesday in New York Sam Franko held a concert in Mendelssohn Hall, where a set of dances by Beethoven were given their first orchestral performance in this country. And, apparently, judging by reports of the occasion, the dances were about as worthy of a place on a programme as the majority of novelties that we have been privileged to hear of late.

The Haydn symphony—it is not the first time that Dr. Muck has wrought wonders with music by Haydn—was given a remarkably fresh, brilliant performance.

Did not Beethoven owe far more to Haydn than to Mozart? The matter might be discussed at far greater length than present conditions permit, and the discussion would not, perhaps, be entirely relevant to this occasion, for Mozart was not accorded a most worthy representation by the dances played yesterday.

At any rate, the transition from the "Surprise" symphony to the work by Beethoven was so logical and direct as to require no bridge between—no doubt there was a method in Dr. Muck's madness—and the formative strength that made possible such a superb, ideally wonderful tone-structure as the adagio of this symphony from the germ of an idiotically simple and obvious melody served as well to blaze the path that the mighty Ludwig soon followed with such tremendous results.

Man, alas! must eat, and even the glorious Mozart was frequently forced to descend to hack-work. The first two dances have little, if any, distinction. If their manner is more refined by reason of melodic grace and simplicity, they are not less music for the dance hall than much that you can hear nowadays at festive gatherings. It was not hard, as one listened, to see the eternally revolving couples, the tired musicians and the garish light of early morn creeping in through the crevices at the windows. Only in the last dance, which did not, it appears, originally belong to the group of three, is there one of those moments which seem to the glad auditor as the very essence of all melody, such moments as we find only in Mozart. Here the delicacy and charm of the instrumentation is enhanced by the naive effect of sleigh bells in the trio ("The Sleigh-ride").

Why should we say that the fourth symphony represents one of Beethoven's lesser efforts? Again the composer returns to nature, the source of all, and there are few passages in any of his works more replete with the infinite mystery of creation than the introduction of this symphony. The slow movement remains a masterpiece of rare and wondrous beauty. Though permeated with tincture of Haydn the finale is not a whit the less welcome. Its exhilarating vivacity and jollity brought a happy conclusion to the concert. There are those who experience displeasure in descending from the heights of the slow movement; to the writer one of the finest traits of Beethoven's colossal genius is his full-blooded, democratic humanity.

Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8, in Symphony Hall, the 13th public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given. The programme consists of Richard Strauss' remarkable rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Suite Fantastique" for piano and orchestra, Ernest Schelling; symphonic poem, "Viviane," by Ernest Chausson. Mr. Schelling's suite was first played in Holland last summer. If we are not mistaken it will be given its first performance in America next Friday afternoon. Mr. Schelling is a Philadelphian, who made his first and only appearance with the orchestra as soloist three years ago. He has been a pupil at the Paris Conservatoire, and he studied with Hans Huber in Basle, Switzerland. He is also distinguished as being one of the few people that Paderewski has interested himself in since he—Paderewski—became famous. Chausson's "Viviane" was given its first and only performance in Boston in 1902. When Chausson died of a bicycle accident in 1889, at the age of 34, France lost a man who had given extraordinary promise. "Viviane" was performed for the first time in Paris under Pasdeloup. Afterwards Chausson rewrote and reorchestrated his work, and its first performance in the revised version took place at a Lamoureux concert in 1888. Theodore Thomas brought out the poem in 1898, and it was given at a Philharmonic concert in New York the same year. It is interesting to note that when the first performance took place in Paris the work was practically ignored on account of the fact that Chausson was a Wagnerite, and this was a very poor policy for a Frenchman 23 years ago. The revival of interest in the unusual creations of this composer is due chiefly to Arthur Nikisch, who produced Chausson's symphony in Paris in 1897. Since then the opera, "King Arthur," has been performed in Brussels.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his conviction that a conductor, in making his concert program, is betwixt the devil and deep sea. "He's cursed if he presents novelties," says Dr. Muck, "and he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played." Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day, and frankly says that little of value is being written and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.
"Surprise" Symphony.
Three German Dances."
Fourth Symphony.

At this concert Dr. Muck, as will be seen by the above programme, pushed back the hands of the musical clock at least a hundred years. There was not one mystical terror, not one unresolved dissonance, not one moment of sombre gloom. In Egypt, where the sky is eternaly clear, travelers [illegible] long for a rain-cloud. Before the end of this concert we found ourselves longing for a diminished seventh, for an augmented second, or just a little trouble of any kind.

In the second movement of the Haydn symphony the sudden stroke of a single kettle drum is no longer a "surprise"; the modern auditor would require at least a cannon or a dynamite bomb to astonish him. The sudden accent, however, is reckoned as one of the practical jokes of music. All the great composers have exhibited the element of humor at times. Beethoven's village band and broken-down bassoonist, in the Pastoral Symphony, Mozart's portrayal of an ignorant composer struggling to create a classical composition ("Ein Musikalischer Spass"), Mendelssohn's "Mayor" who sings on one note only, in "Son and Stranger," Bach's "Coffee Cantata," which we believe Mr. Dolmetsch is soon to produce in Boston, are but a few of the examples of composers at play. But Bach was ponderous even in his fun, while Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn were naturally playful and witty.

The reading and execution of the Haydn work were excellent. The Andante was given softer than we have heard it, but that was a merit. The real trouble was that there was too much of sameness in the first part of the programme. One would scarcely enjoy a dinner which began with four courses of soup. This musical banquet had practically four Minuets in its first seven movements, for the Mozart dances (although the figure would be executed in a totally different manner in the ballroom) had almost exactly the minuet swing. They were not waltzes in the modern sense, for the waltz, although always marked ¾, is in reality a 6-4 rhythm, while these dances were, like the Minuet, a true ¾ rhythm. The canonic work in the second dance was the best point in these pieces. As regards the last one, with its sleigh-bells and its post-horn calls, we can only say that our own Sousa does better in this kind of thing. The dances were given for the first—and only,—time in Boston.

At the end of the seven bright, melodic and innocuous movements the audience went out into the corridors and longed for Reger, D'Indy & Co., Dealers in cryptograms, musical puzzles and dissonances, Manufacturers of tonal mysteries and horrors. They had had a trifle too much of musical sunshine.

After this diaphanous part Beethoven's symphony seemed fiercely modern. When it was written the great Weber jumped upon it furiously, declaring it the work of a musical madman.

Dr. Muck did not spare a single repeat; exposition, Scherzo themes, everything that had a couple of dots attached to it was repeated. The work was exquisitely played. The canons and the ingenious development, in the first movement, the bold syncopations in the third, the brilliant violin figures echoed in all the strings, in the finale, all these were splendidly done.

This symphony has, like a wasp, its sting in its tail, for at the end the contra-basses have a figure that is ferociously difficult. The musicians of this part deserve especial praise for their execution of this trying Coda, which is very seldom clearly played. When this was first performed Weber wrote a most satirical article on this use of the contra-basses, in the "Cecilia," a musical journal of that day in which he pictured the contra-basses attempting to go on strike. Poor Beethoven could only swear at the author,—for he was a master of Billingsgate,—but he retorted with something more potent than words, for he wrote an equally difficult contra-bass passage, or series of passages, in his very next symphony,—see the Trio of the Scherzo of the fifth symphony.

If the reviewer confesses boredom at this concert, as a whole, it must speedily be added that the public did not seem to share this attitude, for there was considerable applause and there was no marked exodus until the very end.

At the next concert the pendulum is to swing in the opposite direction and every measure of the music will be in the most modern vein of French and German radicalism.

Louis C. Elson.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 1 8 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day and frankly says that little of value is being written and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music to-day.

EVE[illegible] POST,
New York City.
JAN 1[illegible] 1908

Notes

At the Metropolitan Opera House [illegible] Eames, Ca[illegible] and Scotti [illegible] their capital imperso[illegible] "Tosca" last night. At [illegible] Manhattan the [illegible] of all admirers was M. Renaud as Mephisto in Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust."

Programme-makers have troubles of their own. The following largo lamentoso comes to us from Boston: "Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be treated with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day, and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music to-day."

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
JAN 19 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwixt devil and deep sea. He is cursed if he presents novelties, he is cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertory. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public, which is ever asking for new music, is in the small minority, but the loudness of its demands make it a factor which must be dealt with. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day and says frankly that little of value is being written, the measure of excellence lying in the technical proficiency of the composer. But if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius among modern composers.

[illegible]dard Union,
Brock[illegible] N. Y.
JAN 19 1908

Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confesses willingly that she has no desire to return to Berlin, and that she has never been more content than in the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe College, and even seriously meditates going in for a degree; that is, of course, if her husband finally decides to return to Boston after his present engagement to continue as the conductor of the orchestra.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY
JANUARY 23, 1908

WILL NOT LET DR. MUCK RETURN TO BOSTON

German Emperor Unwilling to Further Extend Absence From Berlin After This Season.

Dr. Karl Muck will not direct the Boston sympheny orchestra after the present season, owing to the unwillingness of the German emperor to extend his absence from his Berlin duties.

Manager Ellis last night made this brief announcement:—

"Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with much regret, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

Dr. Muck is on his second year with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His original leave of absence from Berlin was for one year only, but at the end of the year the German emperor, after much urgent pleading on the part of the Boston management, consented to spare his services for another year.

There is already much speculation in musical circles as to who will succeed him. It is understood that Former Conductor [illegible] It is understood that if Former Conductor [illegible] he would do so.

It is claimed by many that the Boston Symphony Orchestra reached a higher state of technical efficiency than under [illegible] other leader.

MUCK IS TO QUIT SYMPHONY

Kaiser Refuses Further Stay—Mahler May Succeed

To the deep regret of the people of Boston comes the news that all efforts toward inducing Kaiser Wilhelm to countenance the further absence of Dr. Carl Muck from the Royal Opera at Berlin after the close of our Symphony season next spring have failed.

Persistent rumors, which are unconfirmed, mention Gustave Mahler, now with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, as Dr. Muck's probable successor.

Mr. Mahler, since the death of a daughter in Vienna, has no wish to return to that city, and he is said to be in a state of mind favorable to an extended visit here.

MUCK'S POPULARITY.

When Dr. Muck, the noted conductor, first stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, at the beginning of the season 1906-7, he quickly gained a firm foothold in the affections of Boston people.

This place he has maintained as much by a strong, unobtrusive, but magnetic personality as by such magnificently vital performances as that of Beethoven's fifth symphony, with which he opened his first season here, and which came upon the ears of the surfeited audiences somewhat in the manner of an exhilarating electric shock.

Mrs. Muck, too, who is slightly ill at the present time, has mingled most pleasantly with the social and musical life of the city. She and her distinguished husband have invariably been a centre of attraction wherever they have appeared.

Harmony In Orchestra

Not only has Dr. Muck added materially to his reputation by the many superb performances which have taken place under his baton, but he has won the warm affection and esteem of all who have enjoyed personal contact with him.

There has been the most gratifying harmony in the ranks of the orchestra throughout his conductor's regime, and the men have obeyed his slightest wishes with that enthusiasm and confidence which can only come from absolute faith in the abilities and respect for the personal character of a leader.

HERALD—THURSDAY,
JANUARY 23, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO LOSE DR. MUCK

Emperor Will Not Extend His Leave of Absence Longer Than This Season.

The following statement is made public by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra:

"Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra with much regret announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

This news, not wholly unanticipated, will cause deep regret in this city and in all cities where the rare ability of Dr. Muck has been fully recognized and warmly applauded.

In Boston, where many have had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with the man himself, the regret will naturally be the keenest; but inasmuch as the Boston Symphony orchestra has long been more than a local institution and a source of civic pride, inasmuch as it has been a potent educational force throughout the land by reason of the excellence of its concerts and the high purpose and noble aim of its generous founder and maintainer, the character of its conductor is a matter of importance to the country at large.

Dr. Muck as musician, conductor and man has added to the prestige of the orchestra. It is not now the time to review his work or to pronounce a formal eulogy. His leave of absence was extended for a year through the kindness of his Emperor, in recognition of Maj. Higginson's conspicuous service to art and as an act of courtesy to the United States. It is easy to see why Emperor William wishes Dr. Muck back in Berlin. The wonder is that he consented to be without him in the opera house and at state concerts for so long a time.

Mr. Ellis says that no arrangements have been made about Dr. Muck's successor. No one should be disheartened by this statement. When the time comes the successor will be found worthy of the responsible and

[illegible] STAR
[illegible]YD
[illegible]

WHAT DR. MUCK SAYS OF BOSTON.

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 18.—Boston Symphony audiences, which have been pronounced "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, has said: "Nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find so disrespectful an audience as that which throngs Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon. I have conducted in many cities in Europe, and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston."

[illegible] BEACON
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] JAN 18 [illegible]

The Boston Symphony.

To secure the direction of Herr Muck a second season, by the Emperor's permission, was felt by the Boston orchestra to be rare good fortune. An orchestra has been called an instrument upon which a conductor plays, but this is but a poor definition of the vital relations existing between a leader and his men. Perhaps the most essential element for success in these relations is that of respect, the acknowledgedment of mastery on the part of the wielder of that magic musical wand called the baton. Liking is second, because the best and highest and most perfect attention and obedience is only accorded to a mental superior, face to face with a master of his craft, a workman recognizes the opportunity for the display of his own highest power,—a display which the master calls forth by the quality that is in him of recognition.

There is really a sort of touchstone available for the auditor as to a conductor's quality, in observation of his men during a number. Who can forget the actual kindling of the faces that turned to Arthur Wickish, as flowers turn to the sun? The atmosphere created by such a regard on the part of the players diffuses itself palpably through the house. The dignity and force of it command attention. That once secured, the rest is easy.

Herr Muck has won his men and through them his public, and it is matter for sincere regret that he must so soon leave us. The program for the 28th has the charm of renewed association in Beethoven's pastoral symphony and the great musical value to a community of the presentation of two new numbers. Strauss has not yet had enough hearings in Detroit to become more than a mere acquaintance, but the concensus of praise for his Death and Transfiguration, from the general audience, who listened to it with the most flattering attention, was remarkable. When a work of such magnitude can make so universal an appeal, the indication is clear that it bears the stamp of genius so distinctly that it enters the front rank of composition.

The masses frequently overlook talent, but they rarely fail to recognize genius. The Merry Pranks of the hero of the Love Poem we shall listen to on the 28th, have a tragic ending when they pass the bounds of endurance and border upon the demoniac and insane. Strange prefiguration of the drawing back of those who love Strauss from the spectacle of his genius prostituted to the beautifying of a libretto not merely discordant, but nauseatingly putrid,—a libretto untrue to fact and still more untrue to the primary and healthful impulses of human nature. Anything true has its element of beauty, but untruth is ugliness pure and simple.

[115]

ADVERTISER, MONDAY

JANUARY 20, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn. "Surprise" Symphony.
Mozart. "Three German Dances."
Beethoven. Fourth Symphony.

At this concert Dr. Muck, as will be seen by the above programme, pushed back the hands of the musical clock at least a hundred years. There was not one mystical horror, not one unresolved dissonance, not one moment of sombre gloom. In Egypt, where the sky is eternaly clear, travelers sometimes long for a rain-cloud. Before the end of the first part of this concert we found ourselves longing for a diminished seventh, for an augmented second, for just a little trouble of any kind.

In the second movement of the Haydn symphony the sudden stroke of a single kettle drum is no longer a "surprise"; the modern auditor would require at least a cannon or a dynamite bomb to astonish him. The sudden accent, however, is reckoned as one of the practical jokes of music. All the great composers have exhibited the element of humor at times. Beethoven's village band and broken-down bassoonist, in the Pastoral Symphony, Mozart's portrayal of an ignorant composer struggling to create a classical composition ("Ein Musikalischer Spass"), Mendelssohn's "Mayor" who sings on one note only, in "Son and Stranger," Bach's "Coffee Cantata," which we believe Mr. Dolmetsch is soon to produce in Boston, are but a few of the examples of composers at play. But Bach was ponderous even in his fun, while Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn were naturally playful and witty.

The reading and execution of the Haydn work were excellent. The Andante was given softer than we have heard it, but that was a merit. The real trouble was that there was too much of sameness in the first part of the programme. One would scarcely enjoy a dinner which began with four courses of soup. This musical banquet had practically four Minuets in its first seven movements, for the Mozart dances (although the figure would be executed in a totally different manner in the ballroom) had almost exactly the minuet swing. They were not waltzes in the modern sense, for the waltz, although always marked ¾, is in reality a 6-4 rhythm, while these dances were, like the Minuet, a true ¾ rhythm. The canonic work in the second dance was the best point in these pieces. As regards the last one, with its sleigh-bells and its post-horn calls, we can only say that our own Sousa does better in this kind of thing. The dances were given for the first—and only,—time in Boston.

At the end of the seven bright, melodic and innocuous movements the audience went out into the corridors and longed for Reger, D'Indy & Co., Dealers in cryptograms, musical puzzles and dissonances, Manufacturers of tonal mysteries and horrors. They had had a trifle too much of musical sunshine.

After this diaphanous part Beethoven's symphony seemed fiercely modern. When it was written the great Weber jumped upon it furiously, declaring it the work of a musical madman.

Dr. Muck did not spare a single repeat; exposition, Scherzo themes, everything that had a couple of dots attached to it was repeated. The work was exquisitely played. The canons and the ingenious development, in the first movement, the bold syncopations in the third, the brilliant violin figures echoed in all the strings, in the finale, all these were splendidly done.

This symphony has, like a wasp, its sting in its tail, for at the end the contra-basses have a figure that is ferociously difficult. The musicians of this part deserve especial praise for their execution of this trying Coda, which is very seldom clearly played. When this was first performed Weber wrote a most satirical article on this use of the contra-basses, in the "Cecilia," a musical journal of that day in which he pictured the contra-basses attempting to go on strike. Poor Beethoven could only swear at the author,—for he was a master of Billingsgate,—but he retorted with something more potent than words, for he wrote an equally difficult contra-bass passage, or series of passages, in his very next symphony,—see the Trio of the Scherzo of the fifth symphony.

If the reviewer confesses boredom at this concert, as a whole, it must speedily be added that the public did not seem to share this attitude, for there was considerable applause and there was no marked exodus until the very end.

At the next concert the pendulum is to swing in the opposite direction and every measure of the music will be in the most modern vein of French and German radicalism.

Louis C. Elson

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 1 8 1908

second recital in that city in [illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwix devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day and frankly says that little of value is being written and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music to-day.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

JAN 14 1908

Notes

At the Metropolitan Opera House [illegible] Eames, Ca[illegible] and Scotti [illegible] their capital impersonations in "Tosca" last night. At the Manhattan the [illegible] of all admirers was M. Renaud as Mephisto in Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust."

Programme-makers have troubles of their own. The following largo lamentoso comes to us from Boston: "Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored répertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be treated with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day, and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music to-day."

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programmes is betwixt devil and deep sea. He is cursed if he presents novelties, he is cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertory. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public, which is ever asking for new music, is in the small minority; but the loudness of its demands make it a factor which must be dealt with. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of to-day and says frankly that little of value is being written, the measure of excellence lying in the technical proficiency of the composer. But if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius among modern composers.

Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, confesses willingly that she has no desire to return to Berlin, and that she has never been more content than in the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe College, and even seriously meditates going in for a degree; that is, of course, if her husband finally decides to return to Boston after his present engagement to continue as the conductor of the orchestra.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY

JANUARY 23, 1908

WILL NOT LET DR. MUCK RETURN TO BOSTON

German Emperor Unwilling to Further Extend Absence From Berlin After This Season.

Dr. Karl Muck will not direct the Boston symphony orchestra after the present season, owing to the unwillingness of the German emperor to extend his absence from his Berlin duties.

Manager Ellis last night made this brief announcement:—

"Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with much regret, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

Dr. Muck is on his second year with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His original leave of absence from Berlin was for one year only, but at the end of the year the German emperor, after much urgent pleading on the part of the Boston management, consented to spare his services for another year.

There is already much speculation in musical circles as to who will succeed him. It is understood that Former Conductor It is understood that if Former Conductor he would do so.

It is claimed by many that the Boston Symphony Orchestra reached a higher state of technical efficiency than under any other leader.

POST, TUESDAY

JANUARY 23, 1908

DR. MUCK IS TO QUIT SYMPHONY

Kaiser Refuses Further Stay—Mahler May Succeed

To the deep regret of the people of Boston comes the news that all efforts toward inducing Kaiser Wilhelm to countenance the further absence of Dr. Carl Muck from the Royal Opera at Berlin after the close of our Symphony season next spring have failed.

Persistent rumors, which are unconfirmed, mention Gustave Mahler, now with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, as Dr. Muck's probable successor.

Mr. Mahler, since the death of a daughter in Vienna, has no wish to return to that city, and he is said to be in a state of mind favorable to an extended visit here.

MUCK'S POPULARITY

When Dr. Muck, the noted conductor, first stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, at the beginning of the season 1906-7, he quickly gained a firm foothold in the affections of Boston people.

This place he has maintained as much by a strong, unobtrusive, but magnetic personality as by such magnificently vital performances as that of Beethoven's fifth symphony, with which he opened his first season here, and which came upon the ears of the surfeited audiences somewhat in the manner of an exhilarating electric shock.

Mrs. Muck, too, who is slightly ill at the present time, has mingled most pleasantly with the social and musical life of the city. She and her distinguished husband have invariably been a centre of attraction wherever they have appeared.

Harmony In Orchestra

Not only has Dr. Muck added materially to his reputation by the many superb performances which have taken place under his baton, but he has won the warm affection and esteem of all who have enjoyed personal contact with him.

There has been the most gratifying harmony in the ranks of the orchestra throughout his conductor's regime, and the men have obeyed his slightest wishes with that enthusiasm and confidence which can only come from absolute faith in the abilities and respect for the personal character of a leader.

HERALD—THURSDAY,

JANUARY 23, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO LOSE DR. MUCK

Emperor Will Not Extend His Leave of Absence Longer Than This Season.

The following statement is made public by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra:

"Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra with much regret announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

This news, not wholly unanticipated, will cause deep regret in this city and in all cities where the rare ability of Dr. Muck has been fully recognized and warmly applauded.

In Boston, where many have had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with the man himself, the regret will naturally be the keenest; but inasmuch as the Boston Symphony orchestra has long been more than a local institution and a source of civic pride, inasmuch as it has been a potent educational force throughout the land by reason of the excellence of its concerts and the high purpose and noble aim of its generous founder and maintainer, the character of its conductor is a matter of importance to the country at large.

Dr. Muck as musician, conductor and man has added to the prestige of the orchestra. It is not now the time to review his work or to pronounce a formal eulogy. His leave of absence was extended for a year through the kindness of his Emperor, in recognition of Maj. Higginson's conspicuous service to art, and as an act of courtesy to the United States. It is easy to see why Emperor William wishes Dr. Muck back in Berlin. The wonder is that he consented to be without him in the opera house and at state concerts for so long a time.

Mr. Ellis says that no arrangements have been made about Dr. Muck's successor. No one should be disheartened by this statement. When the time comes the successor will be found worthy of the responsible and honorable position.

[illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date JAN 1 [illegible]

The Boston Symphony.

To secure the direction of Herr Muck a second season, by the Emperor's permission, was felt by the Boston orchestra to be rare good fortune. An orchestra has been called an instrument upon which a conductor plays, but this is but a poor definition of the vital relations existing between a leader and his men. Perhaps the most essential element for success in these relations is that of respect, the acknowledgement of mastery on the part of the wielder of that magic musical wand called the baton. Liking is second, because the best and highest and most perfect attention and obedience is only accorded to a mental superior, face to face with a master of his craft, a workman recognizes the opportunity for the display of his own highest power,—a display which the master calls forth by the quality that is in him of recognition.

There is really a sort of touchstone available for the auditor as to a conductor's quality, in observation of his men during a number. Who can forget the actual kindling of the faces that turned to Arthur Wickish, as flowers turn to the sun? The atmosphere created by such a regard on the part of the players diffuses itself palpably through the house. The dignity and force of it command attention. That once secured, the rest is easy.

Herr Muck has won his men and through them his public, and it is matter for sincere regret that he must so soon leave us. The program for the 28th has the charm of renewed association in Beethoven's pastoral symphony and the great musical value to a community of the presentation of two new numbers. Strauss has not yet had enough hearings in Detroit to become more than a mere acquaintance, but the concensus of praise for his Death and Transfiguration, from the general audience, who listened to it with the most flattering attention, was remarkable. When a work of such magnitude can make so universal an appeal, the indication is clear that it bears the stamp of genius so distinctly that it enters the front rank of composition.

The masses frequently overlook talent, but they rarely fail to recognize genius. The Merry Works of the hero of the Love Poem we shall listen to on the 28th, have a tragic ending when they [illegible] bounds of endurance and [illegible] upon the demoniac and insane [illegible] prefiguration of the [illegible] of those who love [illegible] the spectacle of his [illegible] prostituted to the beautifying of a libretto not merely discordant, but unsavingly putrid,—a libretto [illegible] to [illegible] and still more untrue to the primary and healthful impulses of human nature. Anything true has its element of beauty, but untruth is ugliness pure and simple.

[illegible]

s [illegible]

[illegible]

WHAT DR. MUCK SAYS OF BOSTON.

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 18.—Boston Symphony audiences, which have been pronounced "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, has said: "Nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find so disrespectful an audience as that which throngs Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon. I have conducted in many cities in Europe, and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston."

384

[115]

DR. MUCK BACK TO BERLIN

Refuses to Extend Leave of Absence of Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Beyond May 1—Mrs. Muck Loath to Quit Boston.

America's great musical institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is again to be bereft of its leader, for Dr. Karl Muck, since his management cannot secure for him any further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements as to his successor have been made.

When Dr. Muck first came to Boston in 1906 he left the post of conductor of the Royal Opera to do so. It was with great difficulty that leave of absence was obtained for him at the time and the Emperor feels that he cannot spare him any longer. It took C. A. Ellis two months in Europe before he could arrange to fill the empty directorship in 1905, and just how long it is going to take this time no one seems to know.

Goal Was Clerkship.

When Dr. Muck came to Boston everyone felt that the management was bringing to America one of the great conductors of Europe. He had served at Zurich, Salzburg, Graz and Prague before he was called to Berlin.

Like many another famous musician he was destined by his father for a very different career, namely that of a mercantile clerk. He was sent to Heidelberg for his education, but the musical strain would out, and after a year's study he left there and entered the musical conservatory at Leipsic, studying under Richter and Beinecke. At the same time, however, he went on with his university studies and took the degree of doctor of philosophy.

His first musical appearance was as a pianist. He was eminently successful in that role, but he had made up his mind to be a conductor and immediately began preparing for that position.

Colleague of Weingartner.

At Prague, his first important post, he conducted the Philharmonic concerts. His maiden appearance in Berlin in 1891 was made as "guest conductor" at the Lessing Theater. He was so successful that he was at once offered the post of conductor of the Royal Opera. As his contract at Prague had still a year to run he was unable to accept until the following year. During his stay in Berlin, which lasted from '91 to '06, he had as his colleagues in the opera Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner. While at the Royal Opera he also conducted Parsifal at Bayreuth.

Besides being a great musician Dr. Muck is also described as being an all-round man of the world. He has enjoyed the friendship of Emperor William for many years.

Mrs. Muck Likes America.

Whatever the conductor will think of leaving Boston, there is no doubt but that Mrs. Muck will be very sorry to go away from here. She has come more closely in touch with American life than the doctor, for she is the English speaker for the twain. He can hardly conduct any business without her as interpreter. Moreover, Mrs. Muck has bound herself to New England by becoming a Radcliffe girl. She was planning to take a degree there, had Mr. Muck's plans been different.

Mrs. Muck likes this country immensely. She confessed last week that she had no desire to return to Berlin and that she has never been more content than in the time she spent in Boston.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

.....

ess New York City.

.....

JAN 22 1908

Dr. Muck wird scheiden.

Der derzeitige Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wird mit dem Ende der Saison nach Berlin zurückkehren.

Boston, Mass., 22. Januar. Heute Abend wurde hier bekannt gegeben, daß Dr. Karl Muck, Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, mit dem Ablauf der gegenwärtigen Saison aus dieser Stellung austreten wird, da ihn seine Pflichten nach Berlin rufen. Die Ankündigung geschah durch C. A. Ellis, den geschäftlichen Leiter des Symphonie-Orchesters, in folgenden Worten:

„Da Dr. Karl Muck außer Stande war, einen weiteren Urlaub und Entbindung von seinen Pflichten in Berlin zu erlangen, so kündigt die geschäftliche Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mit großem Bedauern an, daß Herr Muck sein Verhältniß zu dem Orchester mit dem Ende der gegenwärtigen Saison lösen wird. Verhandlungen für das Engagement eines Dirigenten für denselben sind noch nicht

DR. KARL MUCK. MRS. KARL MUCK.

GLOBE—THURSDAY, JANUARY 23, 1908

THIS DR MUCK'S LAST YEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Great Orchestra's Best Loved Leader Will Return To Berlin Opera at Command of Kaiser.

DR KARL MUCK.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announced yesterday that there is no hope of retaining Dr Karl Muck as conductor for another season. No further extension of his leave of absence from the Imperial opera at Berlin can be obtained. No arrangements for his successor at the head of the symphony orchestra have been made.

This settles definitely a question which has been in the air for months. So far as could be in good taste and diplomacy, efforts to retain Dr Muck here for another season have been made. But when the emperor of Germany commands, Boston obeys, at least in such a case as this.

Dr Muck has conducted the orchestra for two seasons, and has won not only the entire enthusiasm of his hearers, but what is more rare, the absolute devotion of his players. There has been admiration by groups for Nikisch, for even iron-ruling Gericke, and for Paur; but nobody has so entirely won the hearts of the Symphony men as a body as the lean, ascetic and scholarly-looking Bavarian. The loss to the concert-going public of this city is at present inestimable, since nobody knows what the next comer will do.

Dr Muck, taking the perfectly-trained machine that Mr Gericke left, said in effect to the men: "If you are artists, you will know what to do with your instruments. If you are here, it is positive evidence that you are artists." And he allowed much more latitude of expression to the players than they had been accustomed to have, with the consequence that the performances have been more highly colored, more vivid, more emotional than ever before. A performance invariably nevertheless had a distinct individuality.

Dr Muck has conducted two seasons. Mr Ellis went abroad in April, 1906, to find a successor for Mr Gericke. He had a list of some 20 names, but was seriously considering only three men, of whom Dr Muck was one.

It was difficult to secure him; Dr Muck was not at all anxious to leave one of the two most desirable places in Europe to come to this country; money did not count in the problem. He finally said he would come for a year; then followed the difficult task of getting the emperor to grant a leave of absence. Dr Muck had twice before refused to come over.

His success in his first season was so great and so marked that an effort finally succesaful only because the emperor was given to understand that the symphony orchestra was not run as a money making proposition, was made to have Dr Muck's leave extended for another year. This year is now nearly finished.

It is understood that the real reason for his recall is that the Berlin opera does not want to be without more than one first-class conductor; it has Richard Strauss, but no other man in Dr Muck's class.

Karl Muck was born in Darmstadt Oct 22, 1859. After a course at the gymnasium and another at Heidelberg, he studied at Leipsic under Richter and Reinecke. In 1880 he appeared for the first time in public as a pianist at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. He preferred conducting, in spite of his success as a virtuoso, and began his career at Zurich. He afterward conducted at the opera houses in Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz and in 1886 was appointed to the opera house at Prague. There he remained six years, conducting also the Philharmonic concerts.

He was the leader with Neumann's company in its Russian trip to give performances of the "Ring." In 1892 he was called to the Royal opera at Berlin.

[116]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

te ..... JAN 19 1908

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Columbus will bring to the musical season of 1907-1908 a climax that has been missed for many years past. No lover of music in its highest and purest form can afford to miss the opportunity to hear this wonderful organization under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of modern conductors. Now in its twenty-seventh season, it stands today where it has stood since its organization, the foremost orchestra in America and perhaps without a rival in the world. It has been organized and maintained solely for the purpose of giving concerts, and neither effort nor expense has been spared by its founder and its management to make it as nearly perfect as things that are human can be. Individually, it is composed of artists of the highest rank, Europe having been searched high and low to find the best musicians. Collectively, it has a perfection of ensemble which can be found only in such an organization of artists who for many seasons have been rigidly trained and disciplined by the world's greatest conductors.

In Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal opera, Berlin, who is at the head of the orchestra on his second year's leave of absence from his duties in Germany, it has a conductor who is one of the three or four great leaders of orchestra in the world. It may be truly said that in the season and a half that he has been in this country he has made an indelible impression on the musical life of America. His sanity, his continence, and his scholarliness place him almost in a class by himself, and to these rare elements he adds certain qualities of temperament which of themselves would make him a marked man in music.

The program is composed entirely of modern music, D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; MacDowell's suite in A minor, and Chabriers' rhapsody, "Espana." A synopsis of these works, together with the program, will be given in this column next Sunday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JOURNAL

s .....

COLUMBUS, OHIO

JAN 19 1908

Orchestra on Tour.

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, Jan. 26. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, Jan. 31, and Saturday evening, Feb. 1.

Large parties from all surrounding towns will attend the Columbus concert.

EMPEROR TO CALL DR. MUCK BACK TO BERLIN

Refuses to Extend Leave of Absence of Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Beyond May 1—Mrs. Muck Loath to Quit Boston.

America's great musical institution, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is again to be bereft of its leader, for Dr. Karl Muck, since his management cannot secure for him any further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements as to his successor have been made.

When Dr. Muck first came to Boston in 1906 he left the post of conductor of the Royal Opera to do so. It was with great difficulty that leave of absence was obtained for him at the time and the Emperor feels that he cannot spare him any longer. It took C. A. Ellis two months in Europe before he could arrange to fill the empty directorship in 1905, and just how long it is going to take this time no one seems to know.

Goal Was Clerkship.

When Dr. Muck came to Boston everyone felt that the management was bringing to America one of the great conductors of Europe. He had served at Zürich, Salzburg, Graz and Prague before he was called to Berlin.

Like many another famous musician he was destined by his father for a very different career, namely that of a mercantile clerk. He was sent to Heidelberg for his education, but the musical strain would out, and after a year's study he left there and entered the musical conservatory at Leipsic, studying under Richter and Beinecke. At the same time, however, he went on with his university studies and took the degree of doctor of philosophy.

His first musical appearance was as a pianist. He was eminently successful in that role, but he had made up his mind to be a conductor and immediately began preparing for that position.

Colleague of Weingartner.

At Prague, his first important post, he conducted the Philharmonic concerts. His maiden appearance in Berlin in 1891 was made as "guest conductor" at the Lessing Theater. He was so successful that he was at once offered the post of conductor of the Royal Opera. As his contract at Prague had still a year to run he was unable to accept until the following year. During his stay in Berlin, which lasted from '91 to '06, he had as his colleagues in the opera Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner. While at the Royal Opera he also conducted Parsifal at Bayreuth.

Besides being a great musician Dr. Muck is also described as being an all-round man of the world. He has enjoyed the friendship of Emperor William for many years.

Mrs. Muck Likes America.

Whatever the conductor will think of leaving Boston, there is no doubt but that Mrs. Muck will be very sorry to go away from here. She has come more closely in touch with American life than the doctor, for she is the English speaker for the twain. He can hardly conduct any business without her as interpreter. Moreover, Mrs. Muck has bound herself to New England by becoming a Radcliffe girl. She was planning to take a degree there, had Mr. Muck's plans been different.

Mrs. Muck likes this country immensely. She confessed last week that she had no desire to return to Berlin and that she has never been more content than in the time she spent in Boston.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

1 .....

ess ..... New York City.

e .....

Dr. Muck wird scheiden.

Der derzeitige Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wird mit dem Ende der Saison nach Berlin zurückkehren.

Boston, Mass., 22. Januar. Heute Abend wurde hier bekannt gegeben, daß Dr. Karl Muck, Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, mit dem Ablauf der gegenwärtigen Saison aus dieser Stellung austreten wird, da ihn seine Pflichten nach Berlin rufen. Die Ankündigung geschah durch C. A. Ellis, den geschäftlichen Leiter des Symphonie-Orchesters, in folgenden Worten:

„Da Dr. Karl Muck außer Stande war, einen weiteren Urlaub und Entbindung von seinen Pflichten in Berlin zu erlangen, so kündigt die geschäftliche Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mit großem Bedauern an, daß Herr Muck sein Verhältnis zu dem Orchester mit dem Ende der gegenwärtigen Saison lösen wird. Arrangements für das Engagement eines Nachfolgers für denselben sind noch nicht getroffen.

DR. AND MRS. KARL MUCK, WHO GO BACK TO BERLIN

DR. KARL MUCK.

MRS. KARL MUCK.

GLOBE—THURSDAY. JANUARY 23. 1908

THIS DR MUCK'S LAST YEAR WITH SYMPHONY

Great Orchestra's Best Loved Leader Will Return To Berlin Opera at Command of Kaiser.

DR KARL MUCK.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announced yesterday that there is no hope of retaining Dr Karl Muck as conductor for another season. No further extension of his leave of absence from the Imperial opera at Berlin can be obtained. No arrangements for his successor at the head of the symphony orchestra have been made.

This settles definitely a question which has been in the air for months. So far as could be in good taste and diplomacy, efforts to retain Dr Muck here for another season have been made. But when the emperor of Germany commands, Boston obeys, at least in such a case as this.

Dr Muck has conducted the orchestra for two seasons, and has won not only the entire enthusiasm of his hearers, but what is more rare, the absolute devotion of his players. There has been admiration by groups for Nikisch, for even iron-ruling Gericke, and for Paur; but nobody has so entirely won the hearts of the Symphony men as a body as the lean, ascetic and scholarly-looking Bavarian. The loss to the concert-going public of this city is at present inestimable, since nobody knows what the next comer will do.

Dr Muck, taking the perfectly-trained machine that Mr Gericke left, said in effect to the men: "If you are artists, you will know what to do with your individual parts; if you are here, it is sufficient evidence that you are artists." And he allowed much more latitude of expression to the players than they had been accustomed to have, with the consequence that the performances have been more highly colored, more vivid, more enjoyable than ever before. A perfect musical scholar, his readings have invariably nevertheless had a distinct individuality.

Dr Muck has conducted two seasons. Mr Ellis went abroad in April, 1906, to find a successor for Mr Gericke. He had a list of some 20 names, but was seriously considering only three men, of whom Dr Muck was one.

It was difficult to secure him; Dr Muck was not at all anxious to leave one of the two most desirable places in Europe to come to this country; money did not count in the problem. He finally said he would come for a year; then followed the difficult task of getting the emperor to grant a leave of absence. Dr Muck had twice before refused to come over.

His success in his first season was so great and so marked that an effort, finally successful only because the emperor was given to understand that the symphony orchestra was not run as a money making proposition, was made to have Dr Muck's leave extended for another year. This year is now nearly finished.

It is understood that the real reason for his recall is that the Berlin opera does not want to be without more than one first-class conductor; it has Richard Strauss, but no other man in Dr Muck's class.

Karl Muck was born in Darmstadt, Oct 22, 1859. After a course at the gymnasium and another at Heidelberg, he studied at Leipsic under Richter and Reinecke. In 1890 he appeared for the first time in public as a pianist at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. He preferred conducting, in spite of his success as a virtuoso, and began his career at Zurich. He afterward conducted at the opera houses in Calsburg, Bruenn, Graz and in 1886 was appointed to the opera house at Prague. There he remained six years, conducting also the Philharmonic concerts.

He was the leader with Neumann's company in its Russian trip to give performances of the "Ring." In 1892 he was called to the Royal opera at Berlin.

[116]

Louis Bachner Reappears

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of its present Cambridge season in Sanders Theatre last evening. The performance of the seldom heard Goetz symphony, and the equally unfamiliar Bizet overture "Patrie" were pleasing and significant numbers on the programme, but to many possibly the most interesting feature of the evening was the reappearance of Mr. Louis Bachner after an interval of foreign study. As a pupil of Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Bachner created a pleasant impression as a pianist of obvious musical intelligence and delicate discrimination. He has recently returned from work under the guidance of Leopold Godowsky, a pianist of phenomenal European reputation since his last exceedingly successful concerts in this country. Mr. Bachner chose the ever-popular Saint-Saens's concerto in G minor, a work which he had previously played in Cambridge during the season of 1904. While this concerto gives ample display for velocity, crispness of touch, and unusual brilliance, it does not afford much opportunity to judge of the soloist's command of singing phrase and expressive melody. However, Mr. Bachner played with finish, elegance and gratifying fluency of technique. If he hardly sounded the meditative depths of the first movement, he showed grace and finesse of rhythm in the second, as well as an admirable comprehension of its whimsical and fleeting mood. The finale was brilliantly tossed off with more freedom and elasticity than in either of the preceding movements, and the audience was not content until he had been enthusiastically recalled. Taken as a whole, Mr. Bachner's performance was notable not only for the evident and solid intrinsic qualities in which he is firmly grounded, but for the promise which he confidently may be expected to disclose. For he is still young even as pianists go in these days of abundant and precocious talent. Therefore, in spite of the excellences which ma[rk] playing, it will be with more [extra]ordinary interest that his [next] will be [view]ed in the futu[re]. E. B. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

te .....

The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Columbus will bring to the musical season of 1907-1908 a climax that has been missed for many years past. No lover of music in its highest and purest form can afford to miss the opportunity to hear this wonderful organization under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of modern conductors. Now in its twenty-seventh season, it stands today where it has stood since its organization, the foremost orchestra in America and perhaps without a rival in the world. It has been organized and maintained solely for the purpose of giving concerts, and neither effort nor expense has been spared by its founder and its management to make it as nearly perfect as things that are human can be. Individually, it is composed of artists of the highest rank, Europe having been searched high and low to find the best musicians. Collectively, it has a perfection of ensemble which can be found only in such an organization of artists who for many seasons have been rigidly trained and disciplined by the world's greatest conductors.

In Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal opera, Berlin, who is at the head of the orchestra on his second year's leave of absence from his duties in Germany, it has a conductor who is one of the three or four great leaders of orchestra in the world. It may be truly said that in the season and a half that he has been in this country he has made an indelible impression on the musical life of America. His sanity, his continence, and his scholarliness place him almost in a class by himself, and to these rare elements he adds certain qualities of temperament which of themselves would make him a marked man in music.

The program is composed entirely of modern music, D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; MacDowell's suite in A minor, and Chabriers' rhapsody, "Espana." A synopsis of these works, together with the program, will be given in this column next Sunday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

JAN 1

Orchestra on Tour.

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves on its annual Western tour on Sunday, Jan. 26. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays on Friday afternoon, Jan. 31, and Saturday evening, Feb. 1.

Large parties from all surrounding towns will attend the Columbus concert.

NEWS
INDIANAPOLIS, IND

REVIVER OF TILL EULENSPIEGEL

WAS TILL EULENSPIEGEL

ROGUE'S LIFE AND DEATH STORY RELATED IN MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FEATURE

Who was Till Eulenspiegel? He is a traditional figure in all the Germanic and Flemish countries, but there are many, and contradictory, tales about him. His revival has lately been accomplished by Richard Strauss, the modern German composer, who makes him the hero of his tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, at Caleb Mills Hall, on Wednesday evening, January 29. Till, it seems, was a journeyman, a droll ne'er-do-well, who wandered about the country, playing all sorts of coarse tricks for the amusement of himself and all else that found themselves capable of sympathizing with him. Murner, an unfrocked Franciscan, who had the "writing itch," said that Eulenspiegel was born in Brunswick, in 1283, and wandered through Europe, to die of the plague, not very late in the next century.

Bacha, a Belgian, wrote of Eulenspiegel that he was "a rogue that journeyed through the world with nothing but a clever wit in his wallet, a knowing vagabond that always got out of a scrape. He visited all cities and plied all trades. Baker, wheelwright, joiner, musician, mountebank, he lived at the expense of the simple bourgeoise caught by his chatter. A good fellow, with a kindly air, always ready to amuse, Till pleased everybody and was always welcome.

"He was not innately bad. He frankly lived, cheated, stole. When he was grabbed by the collar and hauled along to the gallows he went, as a matter of course, without knowing why. He took life after the manner of a poet and he also took the goods of others. With nose on the scent, empty stomach, gay heart, he went along the road, talking with the passerby, joining gay company, concocting constantly a sly trick to put something between his teeth. And he always succeeded.

Unfaithful to Every Promise.

"A cure's servant, charmed by his behavior, took him in her service; a lord, trusting in his talent as a painter, lodged and fed him for months; or Till suddenly became a physician. Naturally unfaithful to every promise, he insisted on payment in advance and slipped away at the lucky moment. Thus in the Middle Ages this amusing fellow personified the triumph of nimbleness of wit over bourgeois dulness, foolish haughtiness and vanity."

A strong sense of German folk-feeling pervades Richard Strauss's musical interpretation of Till's life and his death on the scaffold. The opening bars stand for something like the "once upon a time" of the fairy books. That which follows, according to Philip Hale, the Boston critic, is not to be treated as narrative poetry, but in a sturdy fashion at once made apparent by a characteristic bassoon figure, which breaks in upon the soft strings. Of equal importance for the development of the tone-story is the immediately following humorous horn theme. Beginning quietly and gradually growing more lively, it is at first heard plain that he does not feel at ease in his borrowed plumage. Soon he makes up his mind and tears off his robe (solo violin, glissande). Now his theme is chivalrously colored. He has become a Don Juan and waylays pretty women.

When He Falls in Love.

One bewitches him and he falls in love. The violins, clarinets and flutes sing a passionate song. But in vain—Till is received with derision and goes away in a rage. How can one treat him so slightingly? Is he not a splendid fellow? Vengeance on the whole human race! Here is a great fanfare of horns. Strange personages draw near (in the 'cellos). A troop of honest, worthy Philistines! In an instant all Till's anger is forgotten and it is his chief joy to make fun of these lords and protectors of blameless decorum, to mock them, as is apparent from the lively fragments of his theme in several instruments. His joking with the

RICHARD STRAUSS.

His orchestral story of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," requiring an orchestra of highest skill, will be told by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Caleb Mills Hall, January 29.

or that have heard it in Boston or New York are assured. The organization makes this year's visit under the management of Ona B. Talbot, as it made that of last season. Tickets for the concert may be obtained from Mrs. Talbot by mail or at the box office sale, which will open at the Big Four office Monday morning, January 27.

---

from TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
JAN 23 1908

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE ORCHESTRA.

Boston Symphony Management Unable to Secure His Further Leave of Absence.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced to-night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. The announcement, as made by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, is as follows:

Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boson Symphony Orchestra with much regret announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

---

ess
JAN 23 1908

Dirigent Muck geht.

Gedenkt Ende der Saison Leitung des Boston Symphonie Orchesters niederzulegen.

Boston, 22. Januar. Wie heute Abend bekannt wurde, wird Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, nach Beendigung der laufenden Saison die Leitung des Orchesters niederlegen und nach Berlin zurückkehren.

Folgende Bekanntmachung wurde heute Abend vom Geschäftsleiter des Orchesters, C. A. Ellis, ausgegeben:

„In Anbetracht der Thatsache, daß Dr. Karl Muck gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren, sieht sich die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters mit Bedauern veranlaßt, bekannt zu geben, daß Dr. Muck mit dem Ende dieser Saison seine Verbindung mit dem Orchester lösen wird. Bisher sind noch keine Arrangements für die Wahl eines Nachfolgers getroffen."

SUN,
From
New York City.
Address
JAN 23 1908
Date

DR. KARL MUCK QUITS BOSTON.

Symphony Orchestra Conductor Called Back to His Duties in Berlin.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

dress
te stabli

DR. MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Will Not Conduct Symphony Orchestra After This Season—Mr. Mahler Denies a Rumor.

From Boston last night it was announced that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season. The announcement, made by Mr. Charles C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, is as follows:—

"Owing to its inability to obtain for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with much regret, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

It has been reported in Boston that Mr. Gustav Mahler, the chief conductor of German operas in the Metropolitan Opera House, might succeed Dr. Muck. "I do not understand English very well and you do not understand me very well, for I am having a great time with this English language," said Mr. Mahler, when asked about the report last night. "But you must say for me that you understood me well enough to know that what I said was that this is not true—that I am not going to the Boston Symphony Society, positively, no! It was what you call all the news to me. Thank you."

Boston will have to guess again.

TIMES,
New York City.
JAN 23 1908

BOSTON TO LOSE DR. MUCK.

Director of Symphony Orchestra to Remain in Berlin Next Season.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—It was announced to-night that Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have

---

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 23 1908

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE.

Must Resign as Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader and Return to Berlin.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Because the music-loving German Kaiser can spare him no longer, Dr. Karl Muck must give up his place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season and return to Berlin. Dr. Muck was secured to lead the symphony in 1906, leaving the Royal Opera of Berlin, of which he was director, after two months' of negotiation by the American manager. No arrangements have yet been made for his successor.

Standard Union,
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 23 1908

DR. CARL MUCK WILL RETURN TO GERMANY.

BOSTON, Jan. 23—Because the Kaiser can spare him no longer Dr. Carl Muck must give up his place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season and return to Berlin. Dr. Muck was secured to lead the symphony in 1906, leaving the Royal Opera of Berlin, of which he was director, after two months of negotiation by the American manager. No arrangements have been made for his successor.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.
JAN 23 1908

Muck Cannot Stay in America.

Dr. Karl Muck will not remain with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston orchestra, said last night in Boston: "Owing to its inability to obtain for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with much regret announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

---

om
ress
JAN 23 1908

Das Neueste über bekannte Personen und Kreise.

— Wie gestern Abend von Boston aus bekannt wurde, wird Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, nach Beendigung der laufenden Saison die Leitung des Orchesters niederlegen und nach Berlin zurückkehren.

— Folgende Bekanntmachung wurde gestern Abend vom Geschäftsleiter des Orchesters, C. A. Ellis, ausgegeben:

„In Anbetracht der Thatsache, daß Dr. Karl Muck gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren, sieht sich die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters mit Bedauern veranlaßt, bekannt zu geben, daß Dr. Muck mit dem Ende dieser Saison seine Verbindung mit dem Orchester lösen wird. Bisher sind noch keine Arrangements für die Wahl eines Nachfolgers getroffen."

— In Boston war gleichzeitig das Gerücht verbreitet, daß Gustav Mahler, der derzeitige Kapellmeister am hiesigen Metropolitan Opernhaus, zum Nachfolger Mucks designirt sei. Als Mahler von dieser Mär gestern Kenntniß erhielt, wandte er sich an den Reporter eines englischen Blattes und ersuchte diesen in recht humorvoller Weise, dieses Gerede thunlichst rasch zu dementiren.

EVENING MAIL,
ess New York City.
JAN 23 1908

It is announced that Dr. Muck will leave the Boston Symphony at the close of this season. It is also stated that no successor has been appointed, but it is well known in Boston that Arthur Nikisch is expected to

---

from ddress
ate

Dr. Karl Muck also now and then brings to town a new work when he conducts his Boston Symphony Orchestra in our Carnegie Hall; but he, too, has not made us acquainted with any new piece that one longs to hear again. His latest offering was what the boy's call "the limit"—at least one may hope so; a symphony lasting an hour and a quarter, during which its composer, Hermann Bischoff, of Munich, says less than Schubert or Beethoven would have said in one minute. Bischoff is an imitator of Richard Strauss, whose specialty is the art of concealing a dearth of ideas under a resplendent garment of orchestration.

At the same concert, South America's best musical product, Mme. Teresa Carreño, played the second concerto of her former pupil, North America's best musical product, Edward MacDowell. It was an entrancing performance, during which, as at her Carnegie Hall recital on the following Sunday, the eminent Venezuelan pianist showed that her art has matured since she was here last, seven years ago. Her playing used to have an unbridled impetuosity which caused her to be called "the Valkyr of the piano." It is now more restrained, tho none the less brilliant, and its poetic qualities are as ingratiating as ever.

[117]

PHANKISH AND POPULAR WAS TILL EULENSPIEGEL

ROGUE'S LIFE AND DEATH STORY RELATED IN MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY FEATURE

Who was Till Eulenspiegel? He is a traditional figure in all the Germanic and Flemish countries, but there are many, and contradictory, tales about him. His revival has lately been accomplished by Richard Strauss, the modern German composer, who makes him the hero of his tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, at Caleb Mills Hall, on Wednesday evening, January 29. Till, it seems, was a journeyman, a droll ne'er-do-well, who wandered about the country, playing all sorts of coarse tricks for the amusement of himself and all else that found themselves capable of sympathizing with him. Murner, an unfrocked Franciscan, who had the "writing itch," said that Eulenspiegel was born in Brunswick, in 1283, and wandered through Europe, to die of the plague, not very late in the next century.

Bacha, a Belgian, wrote of Eulenspiegel that he was "a rogue that journeyed through the world with nothing but a clever wit in his wallet; a knowing vagabond that always got out of a scrape. He visited all cities and plied all trades. Baker, wheelwright, joiner, musician, mountebank, he lived at the expense of the simple bourgeoise caught by his chatter. A good fellow, with a kindly air, always ready to amuse, Till pleased everybody and was always welcome.

"He was not innately bad. He frankly lived, cheated, stole. When he was grabbed by the collar and hauled along to the gallows he went, as a matter of course, without knowing why. He took life after the manner of a poet and he also took the goods of others. With nose on the scent, empty stomach, gay heart, he went along the road, talking with the passerby, joining gay company, concocting constantly a sly trick to put something between his teeth. And he always succeeded.

Unfaithful to Every Promise.

"A cure's servant, charmed by his behavior, took him in her service; a lord, trusting in his talent as a painter, lodged and fed him for months; or Till suddenly became a physician. Naturally unfaithful to every promise, he insisted on payment in advance and slipped away at the lucky moment. Thus in the Middle Ages this amusing fellow personified the triumph of nimbleness of wit over bourgeois dulness, foolish haughtiness and vanity."

A strong sense of German folk-feeling pervades Richard Strauss's musical interpretation of Till's life and his death on the scaffold. The opening bars stand for something like the "once upon a time" of the fairy books. That which follows, according to Philip Hale, the Boston critic, is not to be treated as narrative poetry, but in a sturdy fashion at once made apparent by a characteristic bassoon figure, which breaks in upon the soft strings. Of equal importance for the development of the tone-story is the immediately following humorous horn theme. Beginning quietly and gradually growing more lively, it is at first heard plain that he does not feel at ease in his borrowed plumage. Soon he makes up his mind and tears off his robe (solo violin, glissande). Now his theme is chivalrously colored. He has become a Don Juan and waylays pretty women.

When He Falls in Love.

One bewitches him and he falls in love. The violins, clarinets and flutes sing a passionate song. But in vain—Till is received with derision and goes away in a rage. How can one treat him so slightingly? Is he not a splendid fellow? Vengeance on the whole human race! Here is a great fanfare of horns. Strange personages draw near (in the 'cellos). A troop of honest, worthy Philistines! In an instant all Till's anger is forgotten and it is his chief joy to make fun of these lords and protectors of blameless decorum, to mock them, as is apparent from the lively fragments of his theme in several instruments. His joking with the

REVIVER OF TILL EULENSPIEGEL

RICHARD STRAUSS.

His orchestral story of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," requiring an orchestra of highest skill, will be told by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Caleb Mills Hall, January 29.

or that have heard it in Boston or New York are assured. The organization makes this year's visit under the management of Ona B. Talbot, as it made that of last season. Tickets for the concert may be obtained from Mrs. Talbot by mail or at the box office sale, which will open at the Big Four office Monday morning, January 27.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE ORCHESTRA.

Boston Symphony Management Unable to Secure His Further Leave of Absence.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced to-night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. The announcement, as made by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, is as follows:

Owing to its inability to secure for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boson Symphony Orchestra with much regret announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

---

ess .....

Dirigent Muck geht.

Gedenkt Ende der Saison Leitung des Boston Symphonie Orchesters niederzulegen.

Boston 22. Januar. Wie heute Abend bekannt wurde, wird Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, nach Beendigung der laufenden Saison die Leitung des Orchesters niederlegen und nach Berlin zurückkehren.

Folgende Bekanntmachung wurde heute Abend vom Geschäftsleiter des Orchesters, C. A. Ellis, ausgegeben:

„In Anbetracht der Thatsache, daß Dr. Karl Muck gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren, sieht sich die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters mit Bedauern veranlaßt, bekannt zu geben, daß Dr. Muck mit dem Ende dieser Saison seine Verbindung mit dem Orchester lösen wird. Bisher sind noch keine Arrangements für die Wahl eines Nachfolgers getroffen."

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

dress .....

te.....

DR. MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Will Not Conduct Symphony Orchestra After This Season—Mr. Mahler Denies a Rumor.

From Boston last night it was announced that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season. The announcement, made by Mr. Charles C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, is as follows:—

"Owing to its inability to obtain for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with much regret, announces that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

It has been reported in Boston that Mr. Gustav Mahler, the chief conductor of German operas in the Metropolitan Opera House, might succeed Dr. Muck. "I do not understand English very well and you do not understand me very well, for I am having a great time with this English language," said Mr. Mahler, when asked about the report last night. "But you must say for me that you understood me well enough to know that what I said was that this is not true—that I am not going to the Boston Symphony Society, positively, no! It was what you call all the news to me. Thank you."

Boston will have to guess again.

TIMES,

New York City.

BOSTON TO LOSE DR. MUCK.

Director of Symphony Orchestra to Remain in Berlin Next Season.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—It was announced to-night that Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin.

No arrangements for his successor have been made.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 2 4 1906

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE.

Must Resign as Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader and Return to Berlin.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Because the music-loving German Kaiser can spare him no longer, Dr. Karl Muck must give up his place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season and return to Berlin. Dr. Muck was secured to lead the symphony in 1906, leaving the Royal Opera of Berlin, of which he was director, after two months' of negotiation by the American manager. No arrangements have yet been made for his successor.

Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 2 3 1906

DR. CARL MUCK WILL RETURN TO GERMANY.

BOSTON, Jan. 23—Because the Kaiser can spare him no longer Dr. Carl Muck must give up his place as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season and return to Berlin. Dr. Muck was secured to lead the symphony in 1906, leaving the Royal Opera of Berlin, of which he was director, after two months of negotiation by the American manager. No arrangements have been made for his successor.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

Muck Cannot Stay in America.

Dr. Karl Muck will not remain with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston orchestra, said last night in Boston: "Owing to its inability to obtain for him further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with much regret announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

---

m .....

ress .....

Das Neueste über bekannte Personen und Kreise.

— Wie gestern Abend von Boston aus bekannt wurde, wird Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, nach Beendigung der laufenden Saison die Leitung des Orchesters niederlegen und nach Berlin zurückkehren.

— Folgende Bekanntmachung wurde gestern Abend vom Geschäftsleiter des Orchesters, C. A. Ellis, ausgegeben:

„In Anbetracht der Thatsache, daß Dr. Karl Muck gezwungen ist, nach Berlin zurückzukehren, sieht sich die Leitung des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters mit Bedauern veranlaßt, bekannt zu geben, daß Dr. Muck mit dem Ende dieser Saison seine Verbindung mit dem Orchester lösen wird. Bisher sind noch keine Arrangements für die Wahl eines Nachfolgers getroffen."

— In Boston war gleichzeitig das Gerücht verbreitet, daß Gustav Mahler, der derzeitige Kapellmeister am hiesigen Metropolitan Opernhaus, zum Nachfolger Mucks designirt sei. Als Mahler von dieser Mär gestern Kenntniß erhielt, wandte er sich an den Reporter eines englischen Blattes und ersuchte diesen in recht humorvoller Weise, dieses Gerede thunlichst rasch zu dementiren.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

ess .....

It is announced that Dr. Muck will leave the Boston Symphony at the close of this season. It is also stated that no successor has been appointed, but it is well known in Boston that Arthur Nikisch is expected to return to this post.

---

ess .....

DR. KARL MUCK QUITS BOSTON.

Symphony Orchestra Conductor Called Back to His Duties in Berlin.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

From SUN.

New York City.

Address .....

Date .....

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

Dr. Karl Muck also now and then brings to town a new work when he conducts his Boston Symphony Orchestra in our Carnegie Hall; but [illegible] made us acquainted with [illegible] that one longs to hear again [illegible] offering was what the b[illegible] limit"—at least one may ho[illegible] phony lasting an hour and a quarter, during which its composer, H[illegible] Bischoff, of Munich, says less than [illegible] or Beethoven would have said in one minute. [illegible] imitator of Richard Strauss, whose specialty [illegible] art of concealing a dearth of ideas under a resplendent [illegible] orchestration.

At the same concert South America's best musical product, Mme. Teresa Carreño, played the second concerto of her former pupil, North America's best musical product, Edward MacDowell. It was an entrancing performance, during which, as at her Carnegie Hall recital on the following Sunday, the eminent Venezuelan pianist showed that her art has matured since she was here last, seven years ago. Her playing used to have an unbridled impetuosity which caused her to be called "the Valkyr of the piano." It is now more restrained, tho none the less brilliant, and its poetic qualities are as ingratiating as ever.

[117]

From JOURNAL

Address

Date JAN 18 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra this year includes Columbus in its very small group of Western concert cities, among which are Cincinnati, Buffalo, Indianapolis and Detroit. The program for Jan. 30 is a new one to Columbus and presents, besides the sensational 'Wallenstein Trilogy,' by that modern of moderns, D'Indy, a beautiful pastorale suite by our own Edward MacDowell. This MacDowell suite was begun in Weisbaden and performed first in Germany. Mrs. MacDowell writes:

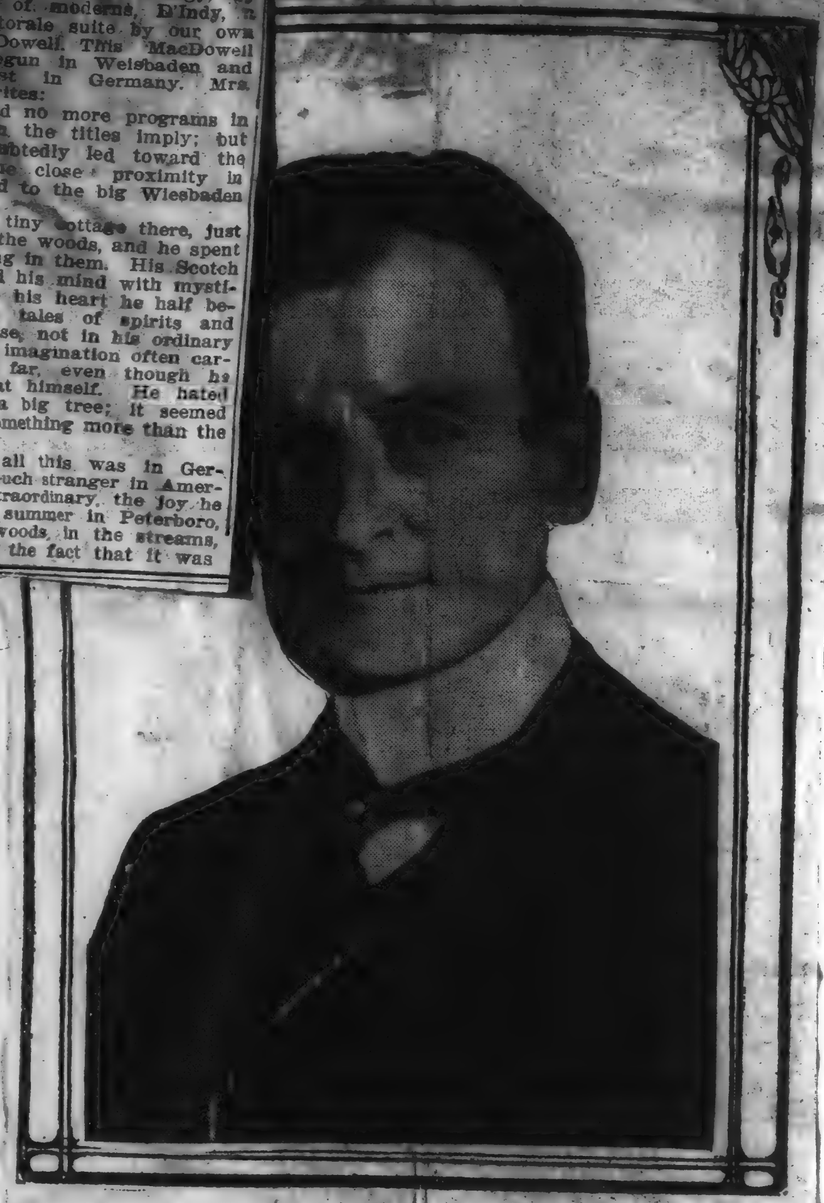
"Edward had no more programs in his mind than the titles imply; but he was undoubtedly led toward the subject by the close proximity in which we lived to the big Wiesbaden Forest.

"We had a tiny cottage there, just at the edge of the woods, and he spent hours wandering in them. His Scotch blood had filled his mind with mysticism. Deep in his heart he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried hm very far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered.

"Strange as all this was in Germany, it was much stranger in America. It was extraordinary, the joy he took that first summer in Peterboro, N. H., in the woods, in the streams, in the sky, and the fact that it was

F FAMOUS ORGANIZATION.

DR. KARL MUCK,



Director Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Plays Here Jan. 30.

CARL WENDLING,

all so new give it a singular charm which the American more often finds in Europe.

"The titles of the movements in this suite are "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess's Song,' 'Forest Spirits.'"

Every patron is urged to be in his seat by 8 o'clock Thursday evening, as the doors of Memorial hall will be closed precisely at 8:15, when the concert begins. The wonderful "Wallenstein's Trilogy," by Vincent D'Indy, is the first number, and no one can afford to miss one note of it. The movements are "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thetla" and "Wallenstein's Death." It is a marvelously realistic work, and one had better be in his seat an hour waiting for the concert than miss the first theme, which is given to the whole orchestra at once.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. NEW YORK'S GREAT NEWSPAPER.

Date

The soloists announced for the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22, are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Anton Van Rooy, baritone. The report is now revived that Dr. Muck will not be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

Esta

From PHILADELPHIA, PA

Address

Date JAN 23 1908

—Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

York, 1

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC

om

ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA

JAN 23 1908

Dr. Muck to Leave Boston.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—It was announced [illegible] Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not [illegible]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From COMMERCIAL UNION

Address CINCINNATI, OHIO

Date JAN 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will play the next concerts of the season at Music Hall on the afternoon of Friday, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is as far from the traditional type of musician as the North Pole is from the South. He belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a musician of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. In a word, in addition to being a great musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

To this end natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906 he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year. During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America was most unwillingly given and the negotiations which last winter resulted in the extension of his leave lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the Kaiser.

Esta ...88.

From PRESS POST

Address COLUMBUS, O.

Date JAN 19 1908

MEMORIAL HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The most significant event in the music life of Columbus will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall Thursday evening, January 30, in a program of unsurpassed beauty and the added charm of novelty, not one of the numbers ever having been heard in this city before. Almost a hundred men, all experts on their chosen instruments, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, who has been loaned to America (Boston) by the emperor of Germany. This orchestra has been called not only a "virtuoso orchestra," but an orchestra of virtuosi.

Dr. Muck has been given a leave of absence from Germany by the emperor for two years only. This is the beginning of the last half year.

From COMMERCIAL

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 19 1908

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th it will be heard for the first time here under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is one of the leading figures in the musical world. He is in America by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.

The Boston Symphony comes here with 85 men, the largest orchestra which has ever been heard in this part of the country. Its fame, however, is not due to numbers, but rather to the fact that it is an orchestra of virtuosi under a great conductor and is more than fortunate in securing for concertmeister this season Prof. Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg. So Buffalo will welcome not alone a new conductor, but a new and very gifted concertmeister.

In selecting the program for the Buffalo concert, Dr. Muck chose compositions old and new, beginning wieh the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which will be a complete novelty. Then comes the Mozart Concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major, No. 5, the program ending with Beethoven's tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony."

The seat sale opens next Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store; but Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been for some time filling mail orders, which she will continue to receive until Wednesday morning, after which all the remaining seats will be thrown into the public sale.

Prices of reserved seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place up to Wednesday morning, but not later.

ess

e JAN 23 1908

DR. MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Will Return to Berlin.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin.

No arrangements for his successor have been made.

STAR.

ss

JAN 23 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programs is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices make it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music today.

STAR.

[illegible] BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible] direction of Dr. [illegible] concert attraction [illegible] Wednesday evening. [illegible] who was at one time conductor [illegible] Royal Opera, at Berlin, has [illegible] closely identified with the musical [illegible] ests of America, and his [illegible] Boston Symphony are looked [illegible] with a great deal of pleasure [illegible] ple of the West. The feature [illegible] Muck's program in this city will be [illegible] great tone poem, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a remarkable [illegible] tion by Richard Strauss. The [illegible] the German folk feeling pervades works of Strauss, and his tone [illegible] picting the life of the prankish [illegible] cially strong. Mrs. Ona B. Talbot [illegible] the orchestra here.

Illustrated EXPRESS

ss [illegible], N. Y.

JAN 19 1908

Not in several seasons has such widespread interest been shown in any musical event in Buffalo as in the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, a week from tomorrow night, the first time that the Boston men have played here under their new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

From in town and out have mail orders for seats poured in. Delegations from nearby towns and cities are coming for the concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo this season and its Western tour, which begins here, is for only a week and includes five cities. The men will come from Boston 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country, and will be accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee, one of the ablest men of his class in America.

During the two seasons he has been in this country Dr. Karl Muck has made a profound impression upon its musical life. His sanity and his fine scholarliness are among his splendid characteristics, and to these are added certain temperamental qualities which of themselves would make him a marked man in music.

When Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a year's leave of absence, which he is spending in Germany, Dr. Muck began searching for a new violinist to fill that important post, and he was fortunate enough to secure the man he preferred above all others, Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, who secured from his royal master permission to come to America for a year. He will be the soloist at the Buffalo concert. A pupil of Joachim, he is a violinist of big attainments and he has met with pronounced success in New York and Boston.

In choosing his Buffalo programme, Dr. Muck included a distinct novelty, for the opening number will be the overture from Humperdinck's The Forced Marriage, which has never been played here. Then there is a concerto for violin and orchestra and the programme ends with the tuneful and melodious Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. While there are but three numbers on the programme, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, making seven movements in all. It reads:

Humperdinck Overture, The Forced Marriage (new).
Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219)
Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, opus. 68, the Pastoral
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; allegro, ma non troppo; scene by the brookside, andante molto moto; jolly gathering of country folk, allegro, tempo d' allegro; thunderstorm, tempest, allegro; shepherds' song, gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm, allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. For several weeks, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving mail orders, which are reserved in advance of the general sale. Mrs. Smith will continue to fill such orders up to Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY

JANUARY 25, 1908

Dr. Muck has arranged a Wagner programme for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony Pension fund, which is to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be, as already announced, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services to the orchestra. Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony hall, Boston.

The Symphony orchestra leaves for the West tomorrow evening on the Boston & Albany at 11.05. A total number in addition to Dr. Muck and the business staff that will be carried will be 82 men. Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Wendling go early in the day, as to avoid night travel. The first concert will be given in Convention Hall, Buffalo, on Monday evening. The orchestra, before its return to Boston on Feb. 3, will visit Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

[118]

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony orchestra this year includes Columbus in its very small group of Western concert cities, among which are Cincinnati, Buffalo, Indianapolis and Detroit. The program for Jan. 30 is a new one to Columbus and presents, besides the sensational "Wallenstein Trilogy,' by that modern of moderns, D'Indy, a beautiful pastorale suite by our own Edward MacDowell. This MacDowell suite was begun in Weisbaden and performed first in Germany. Mrs. MacDowell writes:

"Edward had no more programs in his mind than the titles imply; but he was undoubtedly led toward the subject by the close proximity in which we lived to the big Wiesbaden Forest.

"We had a tiny cottage there, just at the edge of the woods, and he spent hours wandering in them. His Scotch blood had filled his mind with mysticism. Deep in his heart he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried him very far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered.

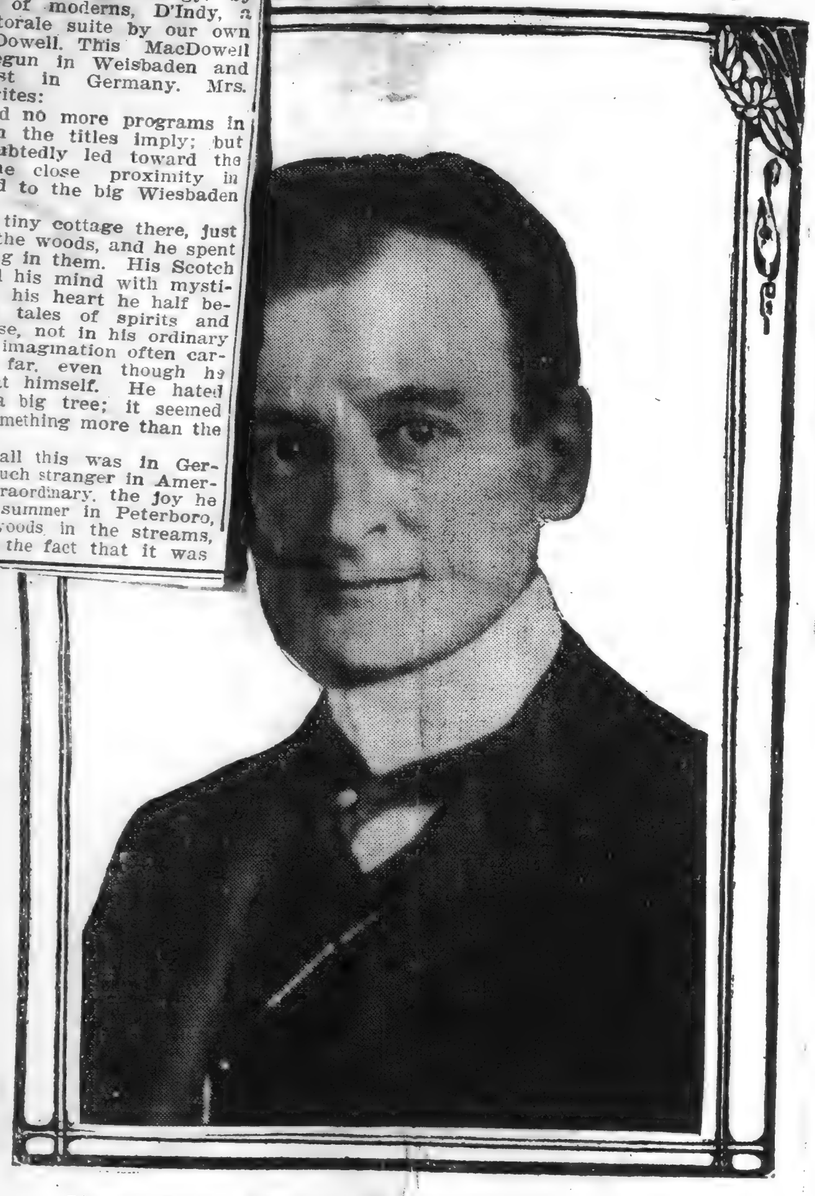
"Strange as all this was in Germany, it was much stranger in America. It was extraordinary, the joy he took that first summer in Peterboro, N. H., in the woods in the streams, in the sky, and the fact that it was all so new give it a singular charm which the American more often finds in Europe.

"The titles of the movements in this suite are "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl." "In October," "The Shepherdess's Song,' 'Forest Spirits.'"

Every patron is urged to be in his seat by 8 o'clock Thursday evening, as the doors of Memorial hall will be closed precisely at 8:15, when the concert begins. The wonderful "Wallenstein's Trilogy," by Vincent D'Indy, is the first number, and no one can afford to miss one note of it. The movements are "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Taetla" and "Wallenstein's Death." It is a marvelously realistic work, and one had better be in his seat an hour waiting for the concert than miss the first theme, which is given to the whole orchestra at once.

F FAMOUS ORGANIZATION.

DR. KARL MUCK,



Director Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Plays Here Jan. 30.

CARL WENDLING,

The Globe
AND Commercial Advertiser.
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER. 1797.

Date

THE soloists announced for the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22, are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Anton Van Rooy, baritone. The report is now revived that Dr. Muck will not be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

Esta

From

Address

Date

—Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

ldress

te

Dr. Muck to Leave Boston.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the pres-

[118]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will play the next concerts of the season at Music Hall on the afternoon of Friday, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

Esta

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is as far from the traditional type of musician as the North Pole is from the South. He belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a musician of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. In a word, in addition to being a great musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

To this end natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906 he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America was most unwillingl given and the negotiations which las winter resulted in the extension of hi leave lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear o the Kaiser.

rom

ddress

ate

MEMORIAL HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The most significant event in the music life of Columbus will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall, Thursday evening, January 30, in a program of unsurpassed beauty and the added charm of novelty, not one of the numbers ever having been heard in this city before. Almost a hundred men, all experts on their chosen instruments, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, who has been loaned to America (Boston) by the emperor of Germany. This orchestra has been called not only a "virtuoso orchestra," but an orchestra of virtuosi.

Dr. Muck has been given a leave of absence from Germany by the emperor for two years only. This is the beginning of the last half year.

k, 1.

1

ess

rom

e 1908

ddress

DR. MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Will Return to Berlin.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin.

No arrangements for his successor have been made.

ess

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programs is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices make it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of th s lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music today.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th it will be heard for the first time here under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is one of the leading figures in the musical world. He is in America by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.

The Boston Symphony comes here with 85 men, the largest orchestra which has ever been heard in this part of the country. Its fame, however, is not due to numbers, but rather to the fact that it is an orchestra of virtuosi under a great conductor and is more than fortunate in securing for concertmeister this season Prof. Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg. So Buffalo will welcome not alone a new conductor, but a new and very gifted concertmeister.

In selecting the program for the Buffalo concert, Dr. Muck chose compositions old and new, beginning wieh the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which will be a complete novelty. Then comes the Mozart Concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major, No. 5, the program ending with Beethoven's tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony."

The seat sale opens next Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store; but Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been for some time filling mail orders, which she will continue to receive until Wednesday morning, after which all the remaining seats will be thrown into the public sale.

Prices of reserved seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place up to Wednesday morning, but not later.

ress

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will be the concert attraction at Caleb Mills Hall Wednesday evening, Jan. 29. Dr. Muck, who was at one time conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin, has become closely identified with the musical interests of America, and his tours with the Boston Symphony are looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the people of the West. The feature of Dr. Muck's program in this city will be the great tone poem, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a remarkable composition by Richard Strauss. The spirit of the German folk feeling pervades the works of Strauss, and his tone poem depicting the life of the prankish Til is especially strong. Mrs. One B. Talbott brings the orchestra here.

ss

Not in several seasons has such widespread interest been shown in any musical event in Buffalo as in the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, a week from tomorrow night, the first time that the Boston men have played here under their new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

From in town and out have mail orders for seats poured in. Delegations from nearby towns and cities are coming for the concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo this season and its Western tour, which begins here, is for only a week and includes five cities. The men will come from Boston 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country, and will be accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee, one of the ablest men of his class in America.

During the two seasons he has been in this country Dr. Karl Muck has made a profound impression upon its musical life. His sanity and his fine scholarliness are among his splendid characteristics, and to these are added certain temperamental qualities which of themselves would make him a marked man in music.

When Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a year's leave of absence, which he is spending in Germany, Dr. Muck began searching for a new violinist to fill that important post, and he was fortunate enough to secure the man he preferred above all others, Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, who secured from his royal master permission to come to America for a year. He will be the soloist at the Buffalo concert. A pupil of Joachim, he is a violinist of big attainments and he has met with pronounced success in New York and Boston.

In choosing his Buffalo programme, Dr. Muck included a distinct novelty, for the opening number will be the overture from Humperdinck's The Forced Marriage, which has never been played here. Then there is a concerto for violin and orchestra and the programme ends with the tuneful and melodious Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. While there are but three numbers on the programme, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, making seven movements in all. It reads:

Humperdinck Overture, The Forced Marriage (new) .....
Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) .....
Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, opus. 68, the Pastoral .....
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; allegro, ma non troppo; scene by the brookside, andante molto moto; jolly gathering of country folk, allegro, in tempo d' allegro; thunderstorm, tempest, allegro; shepherds' song, gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm, allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. For several weeks, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith the local manager, has been receiving mail orders, which are reserved in advance of the general sale. Mrs. Smith will continue to fill such orders up to Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1908.

Dr. Muck has arranged a Wagner programme for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony Pension fund, which is to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be, as already announced, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services to the orchestra. Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony hall, Boston.

The Symphony orchestra leaves for the West tomorrow evening on the Boston & Albany at 11.05. A total number in addition to Dr. Muck and the business staff that will be carried will be 82 men. Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Wendling go early in the day, so as to avoid night travel. The first concert will be given in Convention Hall, Buffalo, on Monday evening. The orchestra, before its return to Boston on Feb. 3, will visit Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

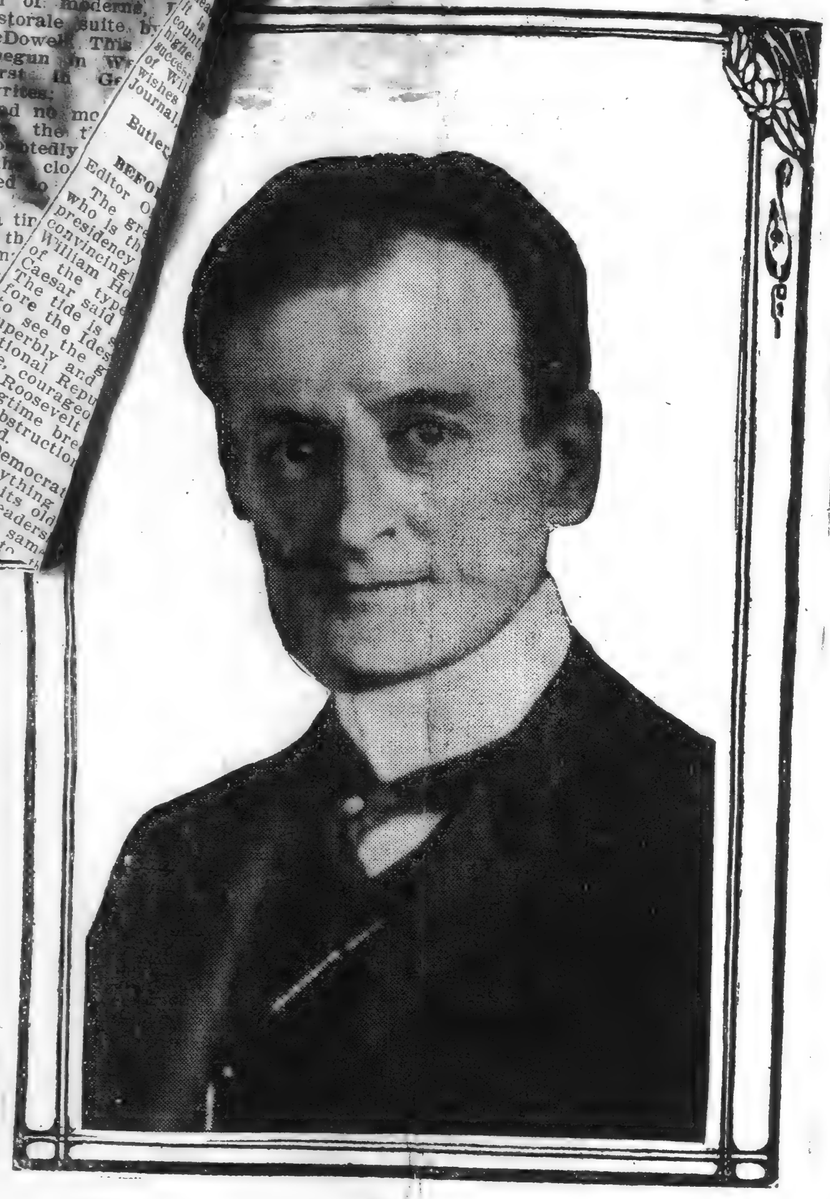
From ...

Address ...

Date ... JAN 1

FAMOUS ORGANIZATION.

DR. KARL MUCK,



Director Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Plays Here Jan. 30.

CARL WENDLING,

The Boston Symphony orchest... this year includes Columbus in... very small group of Western con... cities, among which are Cincin... Buffalo, Indianapolis and Detroit. ... program for Jan. 30 is of new ... Columbus and presents, besid... sensational "Wallenstein Tril... that modern of moderns, ... beautiful pastorale suite, by ... Edward MacDowell. This ... suite was begun in W... performed first in G... MacDowell writes:

"Edward had no me... his mind than the t... he was undoubtedly ... subject by the clo... which we lived ... Forest.

"We had a tir... at the edge of th... hours wanderin... blood had fille... cism. Deep ... lieved the ... fairies—of ... moods, by ... ried hi... might ... cuttin... possi... re... ok ... H., in ... the sky, and ...

all so new give it a singular charm which the American more often finds in Europe.

"The titles of the movements in this suite are "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess's Song,' 'Forest Spirits.'"

Every patron is urged to be in his seat by 8 o'clock Thursday evening, as the doors of Memorial hall will be closed precisely at 8:15, when the concert begins. The wonderful "Wallenstein's Trilogy," by Vincent D'Indy, is the first number, and no one can afford to miss one note of it. The movements are "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thetla" and "Wallenstein's Death." It is a marvelously realistic work, and one had better be in his seat an hour waiting for the concert than miss the first theme, which is given to the whole orchestra at once.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. ESTD 1797 NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER

Date ...

THE soloists announced for the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22, are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Anton Van Rooy, baritone. The report is now revived that Dr. Muck will not be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

Esta ... 4.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

—Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBL...

Om ...

Idress ...

ate ... Jan 24 1908

Dr. Muck to Leave Boston.

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin.

[118]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will play the next concerts of the season at Music Hall on the afternoon of Friday, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is as far from the traditional type of musician as the North Pole is from the South. He belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a musician of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of Doctor Juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. In a word, in addition to being a great musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

To this end natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906 he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America was most unwillingly given and the negotiations which last winter resulted in the extension of his leave lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the Kaiser.

Esta ... 88.

From ... FEB 1908

Address ...

Date ...

MEMORIAL HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The most significant event in the music life of Columbus will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall, Thursday evening, January 30, in a program of unsurpassed beauty and the added charm of novelty, not one of the numbers ever having been heard in this city before. Almost a hundred men, all experts on their chosen instruments, directed by Dr. Karl Muck, who has been loaned to America (Boston) by the emperor of Germany. This orchestra has been called not only a "virtuoso orchestra," but an orchestra of virtuosi.

Dr. Muck has been given a leave of absence from Germany by the emperor for two years only. This is the beginning of the last half year.

k, 1.

...

ess ... rom ... e ... 1908 ddress ...

...

...

ss ...

...

DR. MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Will Return to Berlin.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin.

No arrangements for his successor have been made.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programs is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices make it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music today.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th it will be heard for the first time here under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is one of the leading figures in the musical world. He is in America by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.

The Boston Symphony comes here with 85 men, the largest orchestra which has ever been heard in this part of the country. Its fame, however, is not due to numbers, but rather to the fact that it is an orchestra of virtuosi under a great conductor and is more than fortunate in securing for concertmeister this season Prof. Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg. So Buffalo will welcome not alone a new conductor, but a new and very gifted concertmeister.

In selecting the program for the Buffalo concert, Dr. Muck chose compositions old and new, beginning wieh the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which will be a complete novelty. Then comes the Mozart Concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major, No. 5, the program ending with Beethoven's tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony."

The seat sale opens next Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store; but Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been for some time filling mail orders, which she will continue to receive until Wednesday morning, after which all the remaining seats will be thrown into the public sale.

Prices of reserved seats are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place up to Wednesday morning, but not later.

...

ress ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will be the concert attraction at Caleb Mills Hall Wednesday evening, Jan. 29. Dr. Muck, who was at one time conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin, has become closely identified with the musical interests of America, and his tours with the Boston Symphony are looked forward to with a great deal of pleasure by the people of the West. The feature of Dr. Muck's program in this city will be the great tone poem, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a remarkable composition by Richard Strauss. The spirit of the German folk feeling pervades the works of Strauss, and his tone poem depicting the life of the prankish Til is especially strong. Mrs. Ona B. Talbott brings the orchestra here.

...

ss ...

...

Not in several seasons has such widespread interest been shown in any musical event in Buffalo as in the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, a week from tomorrow night, the first time that the Boston men have played here under their new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

From in town and out have mail orders for seats poured in. Delegations from nearby towns and cities are coming for the concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo this season and its Western tour, which begins here, is for only a week and includes five cities. The men will come from Boston 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country, and will be accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee, one of the ablest men of his class in America.

During the two seasons he has been in this country Dr. Karl Muck has made a profound impression upon its musical life. His sanity and his fine scholarliness are among his splendid characteristics, and to these are added certain temperamental qualities which of themselves would make him a marked man in music.

When Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a year's leave of absence, which he is spending in Germany, Dr. Muck began searching for a new violinist to fill that important post, and he was fortunate enough to secure the man he preferred above all others, Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, who secured from his royal master permission to come to America for a year. He will be the soloist at the Buffalo concert. A pupil of Joachim, he is a violinist of big attainments and he has met with pronounced success in New York and Boston.

In choosing his Buffalo programme, Dr. Muck included a distinct novelty, for the opening number will be the overture from Humperdinck's The Forced Marriage, which has never been played here. Then there is a concerto for violin and orchestra and the programme ends with the tuneful and melodious Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. While there are but three numbers on the programme, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, making seven movements in all. It reads:

Humperdinck Overture, The Forced Marriage (new) .....
Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) .....
Beethoven, symphony in F major, No. 6, opus. 68, the Pastoral .....
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; allegro, ma non troppo; scene by the brookside, andante molto moto; jolly gathering of country folk, allegro, in tempo d' allegro; thunderstorm, tempest, allegro; shepherds' song, gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm, allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. For several weeks, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith the local manager, has been receiving mail orders, which are reserved in advance of the general sale. Mrs. Smith will continue to fill such orders up to Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1908.

Dr. Muck has arranged a Wagner programme for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony Pension fund, which is to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be, as already announced, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services to the orchestra. Tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony hall, Boston.

The Symphony orchestra leaves for the West tomorrow evening on the Boston & Albany at 11.05. A total number in addition to Dr. Muck and the business staff that will be carried will be 82 men. Dr. and Mrs. Muck and Mr. Wendling go early in the day, so as to avoid night travel. The first concert will be given in Convention Hall, Buffalo, on Monday evening. The orchestra, before its return to Boston on Feb. 3, will visit Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 19 1908

...here with 95 men, the larg-
...tra that has ever visited this ...country, the Boston Sym-
...hestra will give a concert in
...Monday evening,
...ent that has aroused
...interest among music lovers
...and of Western New York.
...ll be the first time that the Bos-
...n have played here under their ...conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the ...l Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck is one
...the commanding figures in the ...musical world and during the two sea-
...sons he has been in this country he has ...made a deep impression upon the musical
...life of America. He is an exponent of ...the new school and he is the idol of ...Berlin, where he is the leading con-
...ductor of the Royal Opera. His asso...ciate is Felix Weingartner. It was ...after long negotiation that Kaiser
...allowed Dr. Muck leave of
...for this season. Buffalo is ...an fortunate in hearing him, as
...of its season of 31 weeks the Bos-
...Symphony Orchestra has allowed
...one week for a Western tour, which ...is in Buffalo and includes Detroit,
...Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.
Dr. Muck will introduce a new concert-
...with the Boston Orchestra, who will also be the soloist at the Buffalo concert. He is Prof. Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtem-
...Willy Hess, the Boston concert-
...master, is enjoying a year's vacation in Germany, and when Dr. Muck returned ...last summer he used all his ...powers of persuasion to secure from
...Wurtemberg's sovereign permission to
...the ... violinist to Boston for

...the Kaiser helped in
...leave of absence was
...a very great
The Buffalo program combines
...re and beauty. It opens with the ...verture to Humperdinck's "The Forced ...Marriage," which has never been played
...here, then comes a concerto for violin
...and orchestra, the program concluding
...with a tuneful and melodious "Pastoral ...Symphony" of Beethoven. Both con...certo and symphony are divided into ...parts, so that the program, while only
...three numbers, includes seven move-
...ments. In its entirety it is as follows:

Overture—"The Forced Marriage."
(New) ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op.
68, the "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven
1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country:
Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk:
Allegro. In tempo d' allegro.
Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song: gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' Music Store. For some time, however, Mrs. Mal Davis Smith, the local manager, has been taking mail orders for seats. She will continue to receive and fill them up to Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check, payable to Mal Davis Smith, and sent to No. 24 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

Illustrated EXPRESS
Address ...
Date JAN 19 1908

DR. KARL MUCK.—Photograph by Garo.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leading conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date JAN 26 1908

...ston Symphony
...e given in Car-
...ening, Feb.
...y. 22. The ...ritz Kreisler
...Rooy.

DISTINCT TRIUMPH

His "Fantastic Suite" Produced First Time in America at Symphony Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..Strauss
Fantastic suite for piano and orchestra.....Schelling
"Vivjane," symphonic poem.....Chausson

This concert was one of much interest from the beginning to the end. "Till Eulenspiegel" disputes with "Don Juan" the first position among the symphonic poems of Strauss. The opening of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is colossal in its elemental grandeur; the death music in "Don Quixote" is incomparably beautiful; there are a few pages in "The Life of a Hero" that remind one of Beethoven at his best; the love music in the "Domestic" symphony is memorable; but "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" are continuously impressive, each in its way, and are free from the suspicion of effects made for the sake of effect, designed deliberately to make the bourgeois stare.

These two pieces differ necessarily in spirit. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a rondo of extravagant mirth, of Rabelaisian humor. "Don Juan" is defiantly sensuous with the tragic ending that is inevitable, the end of every man's desire. Yet each work is complete and rounded each symphonic poem is a continuous work of art without digressions that annoy; without panoramic detail that needs a lecturer with his pointer.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was elastic and brilliant. It was a virtuoso performance of a work that, while it is purposely extravagant, is not without emotion, not without the human appeal.

Composer Acted as Pianist.

Mr. Schelling's Suite, composed in 1905-6, and orchestrated in 1907, was performed for the first time at Amsterdam Oct 10 of last year. The composer was the pianist, as he was last night. The Suite was played again in Holland, I believe at Rotterdam. The performance last night was the first in the United States.

Mr. Schelling has characterized his music as "fantastic." In these days the word has lost somewhat its original significance, and in music it too often is without special meaning. A composer fancies that he is fantastic when he is only laborious in search of the bizarre. Mr. Schelling in this suite has true fancy.

The suite is in four movements. The first with its characteristically rhythmed chief motive, its melodic thought, its decided mood of peculiar melancholy is Keltic in spirit. The second movement is a graceful scherzo with a strongly contrasted trio. The third is a highly romantic adagio. The finale is in the form of a Virginia reel based on three themes: the most important of the three is "Dixie"; the second is original; the third is "Old Folks at Home."

This music of Mr. Schelling gave immediate pleasure, nor would this pleasure be abated by a second hearing, for the music has a marked physiognomy. It is modern in sentiment and in expression, but there is no attempt to anticipate the form and expression that may be modern a quarter of a century hence.

Mr. Schelling is Modern.

Mr. Schelling is a man of his generation not a forerunner, not one born too soon. He neither looks backward with slavish respect, nor does he turn his back on that which has already been done. It is not necessarily the mark of a genius to despise the work and spirit of one's own generation, for all contemporaries are not inevitably old fogies, dull eared, slow of appreciation unless they hear familiar sounds in familiar forms. If a man be really a genius, he cannot escape wholly the notice of some that live in his own period.

Mr. Schelling's music has true charm. Its emotional quality is neither superrefined nor obvious. His melodic thoughts in the first three movements have individuality, tenderness that is not flabby, grace that is not too carefully sought out. His harmonic progressions are interesting, at times singularly effective. His instrumentation is often ingenious and almost always euphonious.

For his finale Mr. Schelling chose two themes that are very familiar. "Dixie," originally a negro minstrel walk-around, composed by Dan Emmett before the civil war, became ironically the battle song of the South. It is a stirring tune, a tune that is eminently American in its recklessness, its defiant snapping of fingers at the universe. No one with blood in his veins can hear it without a thrill, no matter how or where it may be performed. The other melody, Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," is the one great folk song of this country.

I am glad that Mr. Schelling had the courage in composing the finale of a serious work to choose these tunes for themes. He wished to give the finale an American flavor, and he took themes that are distinctively American. He treated these themes in admirable fashion, now exposing them, now suggesting them, always the musician.

An Enviable Triumph.

Mr. Schelling's performance of the piano part revealed him as a pianist who has gained in breadth and authority, in emotional expression and elegance of bravura and in the repose that suggests mastery and reserve force. Thus as pianist and composer he won an indisputable and enviable triumph.

Chausson's "Viviane" has been played here before. It was worth the repetition and it is worthy of future hearings. It has been called a pastel, but it is more than that. While it is not so important a work as his symphony, it has a delicate sensuousness, a suggestion of forest atmosphere and woven spells, of unheeded calls to action, of the world well lost for love. Here and there are passages that show the influence of Wagner, but the best pages are those signed by Chausson. The performance was one of rare beauty.

[119]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the thirteenth public rehearsal and concert of our Symphony Orchestra was as follows: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, Schelling; symphonic poem, "Viviane," Chausson. Mr. Ernest Schelling was pianist in the performance of his own suite, which was given for the first time in America on this occasion.

Many extensive and detailed explanations of Strauss' epoch-making rondo have been published by admiring commentators, a proceeding hardly essential, and, indeed, rather harmful than otherwise. Strauss deals with universal types, with basic truths. Let the music, with its laughter and tears, its pity and mockery, its passionate commentary on all things that are, speak for itself.

The "Till Eulenspiegel" is frequently spoken of as a masterpiece of rarest humor. It is all that, and more. The music does not arouse unadulterated merriment; there is more of the grave than the gay in these wanton measures; the note of destiny is sounded; with terrible persistency and ever growing menace it dodges the Rogue's footsteps to the end. Using marvellously subtle but strong touches, the composer tells the tale. As he proceeds you insensibly, but none the less deeply, become more and more impressed with the moral that underlies this diverting raillery. The epilogue, in almost Mozartean strains of infinite tenderness, says: "So it was, in the fable I have told you. My story is ended." Was this in earnest? You smile at the thought of some musical drollery, but the smile fades; you have been set a-thinking.

Now this the music means to me; it may suggest entirely different things to you, but at any rate let not a circumstantial programme come between the composer and those he endeavors to reach by his art. An immortal book should not be illustrated; it is sad that Strauss, a profound philosopher and generalizer, should be subjected to such injury.

The performance, finished to the utmost in every detail, was of unusual excellence in many ways. If memory serves, there was not, at least on Friday afternoon, the peppery vigor about the opening section that made the music so gripping when the composer directed it in this city in 1904. Dr. Muck conducted with a sure and dexterous hand, with a subtlety and finesse that came, at the beginning, dangerously near to dissection. By this means, however, every phrase became very significant and suggestive, no point was lost, the evolution of the musical thought became surpassingly clear and apparent, the fateful climax was extremely poignant and telling.

Mr. Schelling's suite was written in 1905-6, orchestrated in 1907 and given its first performance, the composer being pianist, under Mengelberg at the Konzertgebow, Amsterdam, Oct. 10, 1907. Just why Mr. Schelling chose to call his composition a suite, for to all practical intents and purposes the work, in four movements, follows freely the classic sonata form, is rather a mystery, though we must take into consideration the fact that the mere title of "symphony" is considered a thing of contumely in these days. Did the character of his music influence Mr. Schelling? He has written strains that are, in places, of a poetic, fanciful—in a weird mood one might even say "fantastical"—nature, though to the cool-headed the title may seem unnecessary and far-fetched. But it is not forbidden a symphony to be fantastical.

We are not to forget that Mr. Schelling is an American. The finale of this suite is entitled "Virginia Reel," and the themes are "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home," "Yankee Doodle" and an original theme. It is not the first time that such fantasies have been committed. A very popular one of recent days was a combination "Yankee Doodle" and "The Star Spangled Banner," and this fantasie may still be heard, now and then, brilliantly performed at the vaudeville theatre.

The first movement of Mr. Schelling's suite has an opening theme of somewhat Hungarian character. The episodes and the second theme are duly stated. These themes are respectfully and fluently handled. The scoring is interesting and the piano has a very brilliant part throughout. The second section is graceful and pleasing in its rhythms and melodies, and there is a charming passage for the English horn in the trio. The intermezzo speaks in idyllic vein.

The composition is agreeably, often ingeniously instrumentated, and it is written throughout in a symphonic, orchestral style, despite a very brilliant and difficult piano part. At first hearing, Mr. Schelling appears to have written music which, while always refined and in some passages truly imaginative, is not remarkably potential or extremely individual. This composer is a young man, and he already expresses himself in an interesting way. Doubtless, in the course of his future development, he will give us many works of still more interest and durability than the "Fantastic Suite."

A man of dreams and introspection, Chausson could hardly have chosen a subject more likely to enkindle his imagination than the legend of Merlin and Vivian. "Vivian" was given its first and only other performance in Boston in 1902. It is to be hoped that such another long interval will not elapse before it is repeated. There is another world, a world into which Chausson readily and gladly escaped; and in the forest of Broceliande there was only bliss supreme and eternal. Hence this music of radiant visions and ineffable tenderness; music that is permeated in every measure with an essence as fragile, exquisite, completely conquering, as the compelling spells that Viviane wove over the enraptured Merlin, and these qualities in the music were enhanced by a performance of marvellous delicacy and tonal beauty.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

Dr. Muck at the close of the Symphony season will return immediately to Berlin, there to resume his duties at the Royal Opera. In June the conductor will proceed to Bayreuth to conduct performances of "Parsifal."

...the number ... choice may be ... the previous ... here there is ... for consideration. ... ing rose and ... or consideration. Last is Nikisch, who was here from 1889 to 1893, and Mr. Nikisch is well known to be extremely partish on all matters relating to engagements. Moreover, he is a poor drill-master, and it is remembered that the technical standard of the orchestra was materially lowered during his regime.

Under later conductors, especially Mr. Gericke, our orchestra developed that superb finish and virtuosity which places it second to no other such organization in the world today. When Dr. Muck arrived in this city in 1906, he found, not an ensemble of some hundred musicians awaiting him, but a wonderfully sensitive and well-nigh perfect instrument to be played upon. As we all know, the doctor proved a very capable performer, the men, meanwhile, rejoicing in comparative immunity from the extra rehearsals which were the rule rather than the exception under Mr. Gericke. This year, however, in addition to materially altering the personnel of the band, Dr. Muck has become the most industrious and implacable of drillmasters. The proficiency of the orchestra is now at another high water mark.

Who can carry on the work? The rare man must be master of routine. Also, with the qualities of a hard and tireless worker, he must unite the broadest scholarship, the faculty of bringing himself into sympathy with music of all schools and periods, and a magnetic, inspiring personality. That is demanding a very great deal, but the Symphony audiences of today are not the audiences of 20 years ago, and they would hardly be satisfied with less. Our critical appreciation and wide acquaintance with every variety of orchestral literature has been the astonishment of every great musician who has visited us of late years. Dr. Muck has found it difficult to meet the widely inclusive demands of his auditors.

The field from which to choose is small. The majority of the great conductors of today, such as Dr. Hans Richter and Mr. Henry Wood in London, or Mr. Mottle in Vienna, are firmly established in European cities. They are practically out of the question. Dr. Richard Strauss, who made a furore when he conducted his own compositions in this city in 1904, is a law unto himself. He chiefly appears as a conductor of his own compositions, and it is a painful fact that he values America chiefly for its gold—that he does not especially relish our artistic atmosphere.

Felix Weingartner made a sensation in this city when he conducted a colossal performance of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" two years ago. He is a virtuoso conductor of the very highest rank, but is now engaged at the Vienna Opera, and it is questionable after all whether what we want is a "star" conductor.

There is Gustav Mahler, now of the Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. Mr. Mahler would be a treasure-trove. He expressed his artistic principles with commendable force and earnestness a short time ago, having been accused of nonconformance with tradition. "Tradition," said Mahler, "means sloth!" a musical Declaration of Independence which will go down in the history of the art. That is the sort of man we need and desire, but Mr. Mahler, unfortunately, is likely to be engaged for some time to come with the opera company.

Mengelberg of Amsterdam, a young man, is making a stir in the musical world. He is reputed to be a leader of indisputable talent and industry, and a man of the highest ideals.

Steinbach of Cologne is said to have been once approached on the subject. This may be so, but it is unlikely that Steinbach will be approached again.

Schievolght, if we may believe the musical journals, is a man of parts. There are a number of lesser lights who have displayed fine abilities, but whether they are of sufficient weight to take place at the head of our orchestra is very debatable. And all this amounts merely to discussion. The question is as yet entirely unsolved. Who will it be?

Dr. Muck has arranged a Wagner programme for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony Pension Fund, which is to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be, as already announced, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing two songs, which have done much to make her famous, the "Erde" scene from the last scene of "Das Rheingold," and the "Waltraute" scene from the prelude to "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhauser," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the prelude to "Parsifal."

...TO...
...FEB 1908

...Dieser ... wird mit Ende
...Symphon... die Leitung des Bostoner
...sein. Ueber die Wahl seines Nachfolgers ist
...noch nichts bestimmt. Keinesfalls ist es
...aber Mahler, der mehrfach genannt
...worden ist. Wahrscheinlich wird's wie
...der Arthur Nikisch.

Coming here with 85 men, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, an event that has aroused widespread interest among music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York. This will be the first time that the Boston men have played here under their new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck is one of the commanding figures in the musical world and during the two seasons he has been in this country he has made a deep impressin upon the musical life of America. He is an exponent of the new school and he is the idol of Berlin, where he is the leading conductor of the Royal Opera. His associate is Felix Weingartner. It was only after long negotiation that Kaiser Wilhelm allowed Dr. Muck leave of absence for this season. Buffalo is more than fortunate in hearing him, as out of its season of 31 weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra has allowed but one week for a Western tour, which begins in Buffalo and includes Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. Dr. Muck will introduce a new concertmeister with the Boston Orchestra, who will also be the soloist at the Buffalo concert. He is Prof. Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg. Willy Hess, the Boston concertmeister, is enjoying a year's vacation in Germany, and when Dr. Muck returned home last summer he used all his powers of persuasion to secure from Wurtemberg's sovereign permission to take the [illegible] violinist to Boston for [illegible] year. Even the Kaiser helped in the matter and the leave of absence was secured. Wendling is a very great artist. The Buffalo program combines novelty and beauty. It opens with the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which has never been played here; then comes a concerto for violin and orchestra, the program concluding with a tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony" of Beethoven. Both concerto and symphony are divided into parts, so that the program, while only three numbers, includes seven movements. In its entirety it is as follows:

Overture—"The Forced Marriage." (New) ..... Humperdinck

Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral" .... Beethoven

1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song: gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' Music Store. For some time, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been taking mail orders for seats. She will continue to receive and fill them up to Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to No. 26 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

From [illegible]

Address

Date

DR. KARL MUCK.—Photograph by Garo.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leading conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date JAN 26 1908

The next pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. The soloist on Thursday will be Fritz Kreisler and on Saturday Anton Van Rooy.

HERALD—BOSTON.
JANUARY 26, 1908.

DISTINCT TRIUMPH

His "Fantastic Suite" Produced First Time in America at Symphony Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..Strauss
Fantastic suite for piano and orchestra.....Schelling
"Viviane," symphonic poem.....Chausson

This concert was one of much interest from the beginning to the end. "Till Eulenspiegel" disputes with "Don Juan" the first position among the symphonic poems of Strauss. The opening of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is colossal in its elemental grandeur; the death music in "Don Quixote" is incomparably beautiful; there are a few pages in "The Life of a Hero" that remind one of Beethoven at his best; the love music in the "Domestic" symphony is memorable; but "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan" are continuously impressive, each in its way, and are free from the suspicion of effects made for the sake of effect, designed deliberately to make the bourgeois stare.

These two pieces differ necessarily in spirit. "Till Eulenspiegel" is a rondo of extravagant mirth, of Rabelaisian humor. "Don Juan" is defiantly sensuous with the tragic ending that is inevitable, the end of every man's desire. Yet each work is complete and rounded each symphonic poem is a continuous work of art without digressions that annoy; without panoramic detail that needs a lecturer with his pointer.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was elastic and brilliant. It was a virtuoso performance of a work that, while it is purposely extravagant, is not without emotion, not without the human appeal.

Composer Acted as Pianist.

Mr. Schelling's Suite, composed in 1905-6, and orchestrated in 1907, was performed for the first time at Amsterdam Oct 10 of last year. The composer was the pianist, as he was last night. The Suite was played again in Holland, I believe at Rotterdam. The performance last night was the first in the United States.

Mr. Schelling has characterized his music as "fantastic." In these days the word has lost somewhat its original significance, and in music it too often is without special meaning. A composer fancies that he is fantastic when he is only laborious in search of the bizarre. Mr. Schelling in this suite has true fancy.

The suite is in four movements. The first with its characteristically rhythmed chief motive, its melodic thought, its decided mood of peculiar melancholy is Keltic in spirit. The second movement is a graceful scherzo with a strongly contrasted trio. The third is a highly romantic adagio. The finale is in the form of a Virginia reel based on three themes: the most important of the three is "Dixie"; the second is original; the third is "Old Folks at Home."

This music of Mr. Schelling gave immediate pleasure, nor would this pleasure be abated by a second hearing, for the music has a marked physiognomy. It is modern in sentiment and in expression, but there is no attempt to anticipate the form and expression that may be modern a quarter of a century hence.

Mr. Schelling Is Modern.

Mr. Schelling is a man of his generation not a forerunner, not one born too soon. He neither looks backward with slavish respect, nor does he turn his back on that which has already been done. It is not necessarily the mark of a genius to despise the work and spirit of one's own generation, for all contemporaries are not inevitably old fogies, dull eared, slow of appreciation unless they hear familiar sounds in familiar forms. If a man be really a genius, he cannot escape wholly the notice of some that live in his own period.

Mr. Schelling's music has true charm. Its emotional quality is neither superrefined nor obvious. His melodic thoughts in the first three movements have individuality, tenderness that is not flabby, grace that is not too carefully sought out. His harmonic progressions are interesting, at times singularly effective. His instrumentation is often ingenious and almost always euphonious.

For his finale Mr. Schelling chose two themes that are very familiar. "Dixie," originally a negro minstrel walk-around, composed by Dan Emmett before the civil war, became ironically the battle song of the South. It is a stirring tune, a tune that is eminently American in its recklessness, its defiant snapping of fingers at the universe. No one with blood in his veins can hear it without a thrill, no matter how or where it may be performed. The other melody, Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home," is the one great folk song of this country.

I am glad that Mr. Schelling had the courage in composing the finale of a serious work to choose these tunes for themes. He wished to give the finale an American flavor, and he took themes that are distinctively American. He treated these themes in admirable fashion, now exposing them, now suggesting them, always the musician.

An Enviable Triumph.

Mr. Schelling's performance of the piano part revealed him as a pianist who has gained in breadth and authority, in emotional expression and elegance of bravura and in the repose that suggests mastery and reserve force. Thus as pianist and composer he won an indisputable and enviable triumph.

Chausson's "Viviane" has been played here before. It was worth the repetition and it is worthy of future hearings. It has been called a pastel, but it is more than that. While it is not so important a work as his symphony, it has a delicate sensuousness, a suggestion of forest atmosphere and woven spells, of unheeded calls to action, of the world well lost for love. Here and there are passages that show the influence of Wagner, but the best pages are those signed by Chausson. The performance was one of rare beauty.

POST, JANUARY 28, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the thirteenth public rehearsal and concert of our Symphony orchestra was as follows: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," R. Strauss; "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, Schelling; symphonic poem, "Viviane," Chausson. Mr. Ernest Schelling was pianist in the performance of his own suite, which was given for the first time in America on this occasion.

Many extensive and detailed explanations of Strauss' epoch-making rondo have been published by admiring commentators, a proceeding hardly essential, and, indeed, rather harmful than otherwise. Strauss deals with universal types, with basic truths. Let the music, with its laughter and tears, its pity and mockery, its passionate commentary on all things that are, speak for itself.

The "Till Eulenspiegel" is frequently spoken of as a masterpiece of rarest humor. It is all that, and more. The music does not arouse unadulterated merriment; there is more of the grave than the gay in these wanton measures; the note of destiny is sounded; with terrible persistency and ever growing menace it dodges the Rogue's footsteps to the end. Using marvellously subtle but strong touches, the composer tells the tale. As he proceeds you insensibly, but none the less deeply, become more and more impressed with the moral that underlies this diverting raillery. The epilogue, in almost Mozartean strains of infinite tenderness, says: "So it was, in the fable I have told you. My story is ended." Was this in earnest? You smile at the thought of some musical drollery, but the smile fades; you have been set a-thinking.

Now this the music means to me; it may suggest entirely different things to you, but at any rate let not a circumstantial programme come between the composer and those he endeavors to reach by his art. An immortal book should not be illustrated; it is sad that Strauss, a profound philosopher and generalizer, should be subjected to such injury.

The performance, finished to the utmost in every detail, was of unusual excellence in many ways. If memory serves, there was not, at least on Friday afternoon, the peppery vigor about the opening section that made the music so gripping when the composer directed it in this city in 1904. Dr. Muck conducted with a sure and dexterous hand, with a subtlety and finesse that came, at the beginning, dangerously near to dissection. By this means, however, every phrase became very significant and suggestive, no point was lost, the evolution of the musical thought became surpassingly clear and apparent, the fateful climax was extremely poignant and telling.

Mr. Schelling's suite was written in 1905-6, orchestrated in 1907 and given its first performance, the composer being pianist, under Mengelberg at the Konzertgebow, Amsterdam, Oct. 10, 1907. Just why Mr. Schelling chose to call his composition a suite, for to all practical intents and purposes the work, in four movements, follows freely the classic sonata form, is rather a mystery, though we must take into consideration the fact that the mere title of "symphony" is considered a thing of contumely in these days. Did the character of his music influence Mr. Schelling? He has written strains that are, in places, of a poetic, fanciful—in a weird mood one might even say "fantastical"—nature, though to the cool-headed the title may seem unnecessary and far-fetched. But it is not forbidden a symphony to be fantastical.

We are not to forget that Mr. Schelling is an American. The finale of this suite is entitled 'Virginia Reel," and the themes are "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home," "Yankee Doodle" and an original theme. It is not the first time that such fantasies have been committed. A very popular one of recent days was a combination "Yankee Doodle" and "The Star Spangled Banner," and this fantasie may still be heard, now and then, brilliantly performed at the vaudeville theatre.

The first movement of Mr. Schelling's suite has an opening theme of somewhat Hungarian character. The episodes and the second theme are duly stated. These themes are respectfully and fluently handled. The scoring is interesting and the piano has a very brilliant part throughout. The second section is graceful and pleasing in its rhythms and melodies, and there is a charming passage for the English horn in the trio. The intermezzo speaks in idyllic vein.

The composition is agreeably, often ingeniously instrumentated, and it is written throughout in a symphonic, orchestral style, despite a very brilliant and difficult piano part. At first hearing, Mr. Schelling appears to have written music which, while always refined and in some passages truly imaginative, is not remarkably potential or extremely individual. This composer is a young man, and he already expresses himself in an interesting way. Doubtless, in the course of his future development, he will give us many works of still more interest and durability than the "Fantastic Suite."

A man of dreams and introspection, Chausson could hardly have chosen a subject more likely to enkindle his imagination than the legend of Merlin and Vivian. "Vivian" was given its first and only other performance in Boston in 1902. It is to be hoped that such another long interval will not elapse before it is repeated. There is another world, a world into which Chausson readily and gladly escaped; and in the forest of Broceliande there was only bliss supreme and eternal. Hence this music of radiant visions and ineffable tenderness; music that is permeated in every measure with an essence as fragile, exquisite, completely conquering, as the compelling spells that Viviane wove over the enraptured Merlin, and these qualities in the music were enhanced by a performance of marvellous delicacy and tonal beauty.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

Dr. Muck at the close of the Symphony season will return immediately to Berlin, there to resume his duties at the Royal Opera. In June the conductor will proceed to Bayreuth to conduct performances of "Parsifal."

The question of Dr. Muck's successor [illegible] a difficult problem before the management of the Symphony Orchestra, for the number of men among whom a choice may be made is not legion. Of the previous conductors that have served here there is only one, Mr. Gericke having gone into retirement at all eligible for consideration. That is Nikisch, who was here from 1889 to 1893, and Mr. Nikisch is well known to be extremely kittenish on all matters relating to engagements. Moreover, he is a poor drillmaster, and it is remembered that the technical standard of the orchestra was materially lowered during his regime.

Under later conductors, especially Mr. Gericke, our orchestra developed that superb finish and virtuosity which placed it second to no other such organization in the world today. When Dr. Muck arrived in this city in 1906, he found, not an ensemble of some hundred musicians awaiting him, but a wonderfully sensitive and well-nigh perfect instrument to be played upon. As we all know, the doctor proved a very capable performer, the men, meanwhile, rejoicing in comparative immunity from the extra rehearsals which were the rule rather than the exception under Mr. Gericke. This year, however, in addition to materially altering the personnel of the band, Dr. Muck has become the most industrious and implacable of drillmasters. The proficiency of the orchestra is now at another high water mark.

Who can carry on the work? The rare man must be master of routine. Also, with the qualities of a hard and tireless worker, he must unite the broadest scholarship, the faculty of bringing himself into sympathy with music of all schools and periods, and a magnetic, inspiring personality. That is demanding a very great deal, but the Symphony audiences of today are not the audiences of 20 years ago, and they would hardly be satisfied with less. Our critical appreciation and wide acquaintance with every variety of orchestral literature has been the astonishment of every great musician who has visited us of late years. Dr. Muck has found it difficult to meet the widely inclusive demands of his auditors.

The field from which to choose is small. The majority of the great conductors of today, such as Dr. Hans Richter and Mr. Henry Wood in London, or Mr. Mottle in Vienna, are firmly established in European cities. They are practically out of the question. Dr. Richard Strauss, who made a furore when he conducted his own compositions in this city in 1904, is a law unto himself. He chiefly appears as a conductor of his own compositions, and it is a painful fact that he values America chiefly for its gold—that he does not especially relish our artistic atmosphere.

Felix Weingartner made a sensation in this city when he conducted a colossal performance of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" two years ago. He is a virtuoso conductor of the very highest rank, but is now engaged at the Vienna Opera, and it is questionable after all whether what we want is a "star" conductor.

There is Gustav Mahler, now of the Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. Mr. Mahler would be a treasure-trove. He expressed his artistic principles with commendable force and earnestness a short time ago, having been accused of nonconformance with tradition. "Tradition," said Mahler, "means sloth!" a musical Declaration of Independence which will go down in the history of the art. That is the sort of man we need and desire, but Mr. Mahler, unfortunately, is likely to be engaged for some time to come with the opera company.

Mengelberg of Amsterdam, a young man, is making a stir in the musical world. He is reputed to be a leader of indisputable talent and industry, and a man of the highest ideals.

Steinbach of Cologne is said to have been once approached on the subject. This may be so, but it is unlikely that Steinbach will be approached again.

Schievoight, if we may believe the musical journals, is a man of parts. There are a number of lesser lights who have displayed fine abilities, but whether they are of sufficient weight to take place at the head of our orchestra is very debatable. And all this amounts merely to discussion. The question is as yet entirely unsolved. Who will it be?

Dr. Muck has arranged a Wagner programme for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony Pension Fund, which is to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be, as already announced, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing two songs, which have done much to make her famous, the "Erde" scene from the last scene of "Das Rheingold," and the "Waltraute" scene from the prelude to "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhauser," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the prelude to "Parsifal."

[illegible] Dr. Karl Muck wird mit Ende dieser Saison die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters niederlegen, da sein Berliner Urlaub abgelaufen ist. Ueber die Wahl seines Nachfolgers ist noch nichts bestimmt. Keinesfalls ist es aber Mahler, der mehrfach genannt worden ist. Wahrscheinlich wird's wieder Arthur Nikisch.

[19]

MUSICAL MATTERS

Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Geraldine Farrar Sings in Boston and Melrose This Week.

Recitals by Mme Gadski and Fritz Kriesler.

The novelty on the 13th Symphony program was a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the composer playing the solo part. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss, was the opening number, Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," closing the program. Mr Schelling's work was given for the first time in Boston and it proved to be an ingenious and interesting composition in which the piano part was very prominent and indicated the professional preference of the artist.

It is in four movements, modern in style, in fact frankly American, and shows that Mr Schelling understands ways and means in instrumentation that are pleasing and decidedly original at times. And in the last part he has combined "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and a bit of "Yankee Doodle" and used the resources of the big orchestra to work up a kind of patriotic climax. This certainly is inspiring without being in what might be called the "popular" vein of orchestration.

From the first there are fleeting suggestions of a familiar American tune, but of such a will-o'-the-wisp character that it is difficult to trace. The closing movement is so purely American that the suite might be titled so without being misnamed. There is a multitude of charming bits of melody skilfully juggled among the orchestral forces, with the more connected material alloted to the piano. The first part contains brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, the general "atmosphere" being one of rhythmic buoyancy.

The second movement has in it a duet for piano and horn that is rather odd in arrangement, and which was played excellently, and in the subsequent intermezzo some of the measure given to the wood-winds are delightfully quaint. Mr Schelling throughout the three movements gave plenty of evidence as to his skill as a pianist, and of course, as an interpreter.

The trio of American airs in symphonic guise made the last movement amusing as well as specially interesting, for the three were battling melodiously at frequent intervals. Orchestra and piano each had its chance and each did justice to the "Virginia Reel," as the finale is named by the composer. Mr Schelling's reception was very cordial.

Dr Muck guided his forces skilfully through the elfin-like measures of the Strauss "Merry Pranks," bringing out its wierdly humorous ideas vividly and characteristically. In the "Viviane" of Chausson the orchestra gave one of its splendid interpretations of a pathetic subject which impressively shown in composition finds sympathetic illustration by our band of players.

The orchestra will be away this week, giving the first concert of the tour at Buffalo Monday evening. The other cities to be visited are Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. The 14th program here will include the symphonic sketches by G. W. Chadwick and Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruhling."

Second Pension Fund Concert.

Dr Muck has arranged a Wagner program for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony pension fund, which is to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Feb 9. The soloist, Mrs Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services to the orchestra, will be heard in two songs which have done much to make her famous, the "Erde" scene from "Das Rheingold" and the "Walltraute" scene from the prelude to "Gotterdammerung."

The orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tanhauser," tre funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the prelude to "Parsival." Tickets are now on sale at Symphony hall.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

JAN 26 1908

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and on the afternoon Anton van Rooy.

During the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from January 28 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two: in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27, and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening, January 29. In Buffalo Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concerto stuck for violoncello and orchestra by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the distinguished Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo

---

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Schelling—Fantastic Suite for Piano and Orchestra. Soloist, Mr. Ernest Schelling.
Chausson—"Viviane." Symphonic Poem.

This was decidedly different from the preceding programme. Everything was modern; after gruel and gruel we had pepper and paprika. "Till Eulenspiegel" is in Strauss' best style, it is the quintessence of musical humor and causes the musical jokes of Beethoven (Scherzo of Pastoral Symphony), of Mozart ("A Musical Joke"), of Mendelssohn ("Son and Stranger" and "Midsummer-night's Dream" overture) and Bach ("Coffee Cantata") to pale. Richard Strauss is a humorist on a more gigantic scale. We sometimes think that his "Domestic Symphony" and his mystic utterances about the meaning of his works, are practical jokes played upon the general public.

The mediaeval humor, such as one finds in Rabelais or in Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques," is not always fit for the drawing-room, and we fancy that all of the pranks of the roguish Till could not be presented in Symphony Hall without causing many a blush upon the cheek of many a fair auditress. But the pursuit of the hero by his victims, the ponderous quality of the Philistines whom he mocks, the final capture and execution, can all be easily followed.

The performance was technically excellent. The reading was less equal. Dr. Muck laid especial emphasis upon the pursuit and capture of Till. The thundering accusations and the sneering replies, the final verdict of "Guilty," were dramatically portrayed. The ending was less graphic. Strauss deviates from the old German tale, which allows Till to escape from the hangman. Both Paur and Gericke used to make a very strong point of the final squeak of poor Till, which we missed in this interpretation. But there was enough of excellence in the reading to warrant the continuous applause which followed the close of the work. Especial praise must be given to the horn for the execution of its very difficult figures and also to the clarinette for the way in which the portrayal of Till was presented.

Now followed an American pianist with some striking American music. It is beginning to be demonstrated that America has a folk-song which can be drawn upon for classical composition. Mr. Chadwick showed this long ago (he was the first among the prominent composers to do this) in the Scherzo of his second symphony. Dvorak, of course, gave the chief impulse in this direction, in his "New World" symphony. Henry Schoenefeld, in his "Sunny South" overture (which we ought to have in these concerts) used plantation melodies; and Adolph M. Foerster in his "Dedication March," for orchestra, used "The Old Folks at Home," which Mr. Schelling employs in the finale of this Suite.

All this is much better than the hopeless quest for a national music to be derived from the vague and totally unfamiliar tunes of the Indians. It is possible that even Puccini will give some surprise in the American folk-song matter, in his new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," for inquiries were made of the present writer regarding the American music of fifty years ago, with reference to use in this opera. Unfortunately, however, the repertoire is but a small one and its classical use will soon be exhausted.

But one can give the spirit of the southern plantation music without copying absolute melodies, as may be seen in parts of Dvorak's symphony and in the first movement of this Suite by Schelling. The chief theme of this movement, with its many syncopations, was decidedly Southern and was very attractive. The piano was kept too constantly in the foreground, a fault which is not unusual when the composer is himself a solo pianist.

We liked the Scherzo with its trio "a la Musette" (bagpipe drone effects) and its piquancy evidently found favor with the audience. The English horn was prominent in many portions of the work, but never had so characteristic a melody as Dvorak gave to it in the slow movement of his American symphony.

The final movement began with grotesque effects. The nasal tones of the muted brasses (trumpets and horns) were a striking introduction. Then came a great deal of "Dixie," a little of "Old Folks at Home," and still less of "Yankee Doodle." The figure treatment of portions of "Dixie" was very ingenious, and the piquant movement was very exciting.

Since the work is entitled a "Suite" we may not judge it by symphonic or concerto standard. It was certainly clever ("Be good, sweet man, and let who will be clever") but it was not of the calibre of the best works of MacDowell, or Chadwick, or Hadley, or Kelley, or some other native composers whom we could name. We are grateful for the use of the national material, which is a move in the right direction, but we feel that the composition must always win more applause than many a more subtle and highly developed work simply because its appeal to the general public is too plain to be misunderstood.

The pianist played it "con amore," with a heartiness and abandon that was commendable, and he was splendidly seconded by Dr. Muck and the orchestra. It was small wonder that he was called out again and again at the close of his composition. It is certainly a worthy addition to the repertoire, particularly to the native list, but it is apt to be decidedly over-rated.

The concert closed with Chausson's "Viviane." Chausson was one of the modern Frenchmen who believed in musical beauty. Two of the best men of the modern French musical school died too young to exert their full influence in turning the tide from the bitterness of D'Indy and the vagueness of Debussy. Regarding Chausson and Bizet one can slightly alter the words of Wordsworth and say:—

"The good die first,
But they whose scores are dry as Summer's dust,
Burn to the socket."

Had these two men lived they might have made a real French school of composition that would have been less strained and eccentric than most of it is at present. There is a resemblance in "Viviane" to some of the Wagnerian scores. If we remove the hood of Viviane we find our charming but over-curious friend Elsa of Brabant. But the resemblance does not amount to anything like plagiarism; it is only a composer following the best model of his time instead of seeking out thorny and unfrequented paths on his own account. [illegible] have diverged from this [illegible] but it is safe to [illegible]

The Symphony Orchestra Goes West.

The Symphony Orchestra, eighty-two strong, left Boston last night on what bids fair to become its annual Western journey. It arrives in Buffalo this afternoon and gives a concert there this evening. Tuesday morning it will go on to Detroit, appearing there on Tuesday evening. Thence it travels to Indianapolis for a concert on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning it proceeds to Columbus to play there the same night. From Columbus it journeys to Cincinnati for two concerts—the first on Friday afternoon and the second on Saturday evening. On Sunday morning next it starts for Boston again, reaching here on Monday noon, or as soon thereafter as the Boston & Albany Railroad suffers it to do so. This year the orchestra does not visit Chicago, and Columbus replaces that city in the itinerary. The two concerts that it will give in Cincinnati are a part of the series arranged by the Cincinnati Musical Association to replace those of its own orchestra which the labor union compelled it to abandon. Western managers and Western audiences seemingly care little for "soloists," and in four of the six concerts there will be none. In the other two Mr. Wendling and Mr. Warnke, the first violinist and the first 'cellist, are respectively to play. With the series, moreover, Dr. Muck begins his last appearances in America. Here are the six programmes, taken, with the exception of the solo pieces, from music that the orchestra has played in Boston this season, and duly divided between the classic and the modern composers.

Monday evening in Buffalo—
Humperdinck: Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
Mozart: Concerto for Violin (Mr. Wendling).
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Tuesday evening in Detroit—
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Wednesday evening in Indianapolis—
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Dohnanyi: Concertstuck for Violoncello (Mr. Warnke).
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Thursday evening in Columbus—
D'Indy: "Wallenstein" Trilogy.
MacDowell: Suite in A minor, Op. 42.
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Friday afternoon in Cincinnati—
Händel: Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras.
Mozart: Three German Dances.
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Saturday evening in Cincinnati—
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

From ..... BUFFALO, N. Y.

Address .....

Date .....

A gala event in musical circles is the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall next Monday night, the first visit of the famous organization to this city in two seasons, and also the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck is one of the great musicians of his time, and during the two years he has been in this country he has made a marked impress upon its musical life. He is an exponent of a new school, and under his baton the Boston men have risen to greater triumphs than ever before in the twenty-seven years the orchestra has been in existence.

The soloist next Monday night will be Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is here for one year as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess.

Dr. Muck has announced the following program for next Monday night, a program of great beauty and variety:

Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new) ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven

1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country-folk: Allegro. Intempo d'allegro: Thunderstorm. Tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song. Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Seats are now selling at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager of the orchestra.

From ..... BULLETIN.

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ..... JAN 23 1908

DR. KARL MUCK QUITS BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra Conductor Called Back to His Duties in Berlin.

Boston, Jan. 23.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

[120]

From ..... Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... JAN 25 1908

The last Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, February 21. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler.

The definite announcement regarding the continuance of Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came on Thursday in the word from abroad that the German Kaiser would require Dr. Muck's services at home next season. Some information one way or the other as to Dr. Muck's relation to the Boston Orchestra has been expected, and there will doubtless be some disappointment felt. To remain in this country longer, however, it would probably have been necessary for the conductor to give up permanently his home connections, a step not to be lightly taken by any one in his position, which is one of the highest honor in Berlin. Dr. Muck could no doubt make more money in this country, but this is not a sufficient inducement to one of his standing. During the Western trip of the Boston Orchestra from January 28 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two, in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27, and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening, January 29. In Buffalo, Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concert stuck for violoncello and orchestra, by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo Beckar.

n .....

ress .....

e ..... JAN 23 1908

Dr. Muck will geben.

Nach Ende der Saison kehrt er nach Berlin zurück.

Boston, Mass., 23. Jan. Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wird mit dem Ablauf der gegenwärtigen Saison aus dieser Stellung austreten, da ihn seine Pflichten nach Berlin rufen. Die Ankündigung erfolgte durch C. A. Ellis, den geschäftlichen Leiter des Symphonie-Orchesters, in folgenden Worten:

„Da Dr. Karl Muck außer Stande war, einen weiteren Urlaub und Entbindung von seinen Pflichten in Berlin zu erlangen, so kündigt die geschäftliche Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mit großem Bedauern an, daß Herr Muck sein Verhältniß zu dem Orchester mit dem Ende der gegenwärtigen Saison lösen wird. Arrangements für das Engagement eines Nachfolgers für denselben sind noch nicht getroffen."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH

PHILADELPHIA, PA

ess .....

e ..... JAN 24 1908

Kaiser Recalls Orchestra Leader.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Unwilling to spare him longer from the post of leader of the Royal Opera, Emperor William of Germany has ordered Dr. Karl Muck, who for two years has been conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to return to Berlin.

From ..... INQUIRER,

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ..... JAN 24 1908

—Dr. Muck is to leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra and go back to Berlin. And even Boston does not seem to be terribly cut up over the event.

rk, 188

GLOBE—JANUARY 26, 1908.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Geraldine Farrar Sings in Boston and Melrose This Week.

Recitals by Mme Gadski and Fritz Kriesler.

The novelty on the 13th Symphony program was a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the composer playing the solo part. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss, was the opening number, Chausson's symphonic poem, "Viviane," closing the program. Mr Schelling's work was given for the first time in Boston and it proved to be an ingenious and interesting composition in which the piano part was very prominent and indicated the professional preference of the artist.

It is in four movements, modern in style, in fact frankly American, and shows that Mr Schelling understands ways and means in instrumentation that are pleasing and decidedly original at times. And in the last part he has combined "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and a bit of "Yankee Doodle" and used the resources of the big orchestra to work up a kind of patriotic climax. This certainly is inspiring without being in what might be called the "popular" vein of orchestration.

From the first there are fleeting suggestions of a familiar American tune, but of such a will-o'-the-wisp character that it is difficult to trace. The closing movement is so purely American that the suite might be titled so without being misnamed. There is a multitude of charming bits of melody skilfully juggled among the orchestral forces, with the more connected material alloted to the piano. The first part contains brilliant passage work for the solo instrument, the general "atmosphere" being one of rhythmic buoyancy.

The second movement has in it a duet for piano and horn that is rather odd in arrangement, and which was played excellently, and in the subsequent intermezzo some of the measure given to the wood-winds are delightfully quaint. Mr Schelling throughout the three movements gave plenty of evidence as to his skill as a pianist, and of course, as an interpreter.

The trio of American airs in symphonic guise made the last movement amusing as well as specially interesting, for the three were battling melodiously at frequent intervals. Orchestra and piano each had its chance and each did justice to the "Virginia Reel," as the finale is named by the composer. Mr Schelling's reception was very cordial.

Dr Muck guided his forces skilfully through the elfin-like measures of the Strauss "Merry Pranks," bringing out its wierdly humorous ideas vividly and characteristically. In the "Viviane" of Chausson the orchestra gave one of its splendid interpretations of a pathetic subject which impressively shown in composition finds sympathetic illustration by our band of players.

The orchestra will be away this week, giving the first concert of the tour at Buffalo Monday evening. The other cities to be visited are Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. The 14th program here will include the symphonic sketches by G. W. Chadwick and Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruhling."

Second Pension Fund Concert.

Dr Muck has arranged a Wagner program for the second concert of the season in aid of the Boston Symphony pension fund, which is to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Feb 9. The soloist, Mrs Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who has kindly offered her services to the orchestra, will be heard in two songs which have done much to make her famous, the "Erde" scene from "Das Rheingold" and the "Waltraute" scene from the prelude to "Gotterdammerung."

The orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tanhauser," tre funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," and the prelude to "Parsival." Tickets are now on sale at Symphony hall.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and on the afternoon Anton van Rooy.

During the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from January 23 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two, in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27, and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening, January 29. In Buffalo Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concertstueck for violoncello and orchestra by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the distinguished Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo Becker.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT—MONDAY JANUARY 27, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

R. Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel."
Schelling—Fantastic Suite for Piano and Orchestra. Soloist, Mr. Ernest Schelling.
Chausson—"Viviane," Symphonic Poem.

This was decidedly different from the preceding programme. Everything was modern; after milk and gruel we had pepper and paprika. "Till Eulenspiegel" is in Strauss' best style, it is the quintessence of musical humor and causes the musical jokes of Beethoven (Scherzo of Pastoral Symphony), of Mozart ("A Musical Joke"), of Mendelssohn ("Son and Stranger" and "Midsummer-night's Dream" overture) and Bach ("Coffee Cantata") to pale. Richard Strauss is a humorist on a more gigantic scale. We sometimes think that his "Domestic Symphony" and his mystic utterances about the meaning of his works, are practical jokes played upon the general public.

The mediaeval humor, such as one finds in Rabelais or in Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques," is not always fit for the drawing-room, and we fancy that all of the pranks of the roguish Till could not be presented in Symphony Hall without causing many a blush upon the cheek of many a fair auditress. But the pursuit of the hero by his victims, the ponderous quality of the Philistines whom he mocks, the final capture and execution, can all be easily followed.

The performance was technically excellent. The reading was less equal. Dr. Muck laid especial emphasis upon the pursuit and capture of Till. The thundering accusations and the sneering replies, the final verdict of "Guilty," were dramatically portrayed. The ending was less graphic. Strauss deviates from the old German tale, which allows Till to escape from the hangman. Both Paur and Gericke used to make a very strong point of the final squeak of poor Till, which we missed in this interpretation. But there was enough of excellence in the reading to warrant the continuous applause which followed the close of the work. Especial praise must be given to the horn for the execution of its very difficult figures and also to the clarinette for the way in which the portrayal of Till was presented.

Now followed an American pianist with some striking American music. It is beginning to be demonstrated that America has a folk-song which can be drawn upon for classical composition. Mr. Chadwick showed this long ago (he was the first among the prominent composers to do this) in the Scherzo of his second symphony. Dvorak, of course, gave the chief impulse in this direction, in his "New World" symphony. Henry Schoenefeld, in his "Sunny South" overture (which we ought to have in these concerts) used plantation melodies; and Adolph M. Foerster in his "Dedication March," for orchestra, used "The Old Folks at Home," which Mr. Schelling employs in the finale of this Suite.

All this is much better than the hopeless quest for a national music to be derived from the vague and totally unfamiliar tunes of the Indians. It is possible that even Puccini will give some surprise in the American folk-song matter, in his new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," for inquiries were made of the present writer regarding the American music of fifty years ago, with reference to use in this opera. Unfortunately, however, the repertoire is but a small one and its classical use will soon be exhausted.

But one can give the spirit of the southern plantation music without copying absolute melodies, as may be seen in parts of Dvorak's symphony and in the first movement of this Suite by Schelling. The chief theme of this movement, with its many syncopations, was decidedly Southern and was very attractive. The piano was kept too constantly in the foreground, a fault which is not unusual when the composer is himself a solo pianist.

We liked the Scherzo with its trio "a la Musette" (bagpipe drone effects) and its piquancy evidently found favor with the audience. The English horn was prominent in many portions of the work, but never had so characteristic a melody as Dvorak gave to it in the slow movement of his American symphony.

The final movement began with grotesque effects. The nasal tones of the muted brasses (trumpets and horns) were a striking introduction. Then came a great deal of "Dixie," a little of "Old Folks at Home," and still less of "Yankee Doodle." The figure treatment of portions of "Dixie" was very ingenious, and the piquant movement was very exciting.

Since the work is entitled a "Suite" we may not judge it by symphonic or concerto standard. It was certainly clever ("Be good, sweet man, and let who will be clever") but it was not of the calibre of the best works of MacDowell, or Chadwick, or Hadley, or Kelley, or some other native composers whom we could name. We are grateful for the use of the national material, which is a move in the right direction, but we feel that the composition must always win more applause than many a more subtle and highly developed work simply because its appeal to the general public is too plain to be misunderstood.

The pianist played it "con amore," with a heartiness and abandon that was commendable, and he was splendidly seconded by Dr. Muck and the orchestra. It was small wonder that he was called out again and again at the close of his composition. It is certainly a worthy addition to the repertoire, particularly to the native list, but it is apt to be decidedly over-rated.

The concert closed with Chausson's "Viviane." Chausson was one of the modern Frenchmen who believed in musical beauty. Two of the best men of the modern French musical school died too young to exert their full influence in turning the tide from the bitterness of D'Indy and the vagueness of Debussy. Regarding Chausson and Bizet one can slightly alter the words of Wordsworth and say:—

"The good die first,
But they whose scores are dry as Summer's dust,
Burn to the socket."

Had these two men lived they might have made a real French school of composition that would have been less strained and eccentric than most of it is at present. There is a resemblance in "Viviane" to some of the Wagnerian scores. If we remove the hood of Viviane we find our charming but over-curious friend Elsa of Brabant. But the resemblance does not amount to anything like plagiarism; it is only a composer following the best model of his time instead of seeking out thorny and inaccessible paths on his own account. Chausson would have diverged from this high road had he lived, but it is safe to say that he would never have become ugly.

Louis C. Elson.

The Symphony Orchestra Goes West

The Symphony Orchestra, eighty-two strong, left Boston last night on what bids fair to become its annual Western journey. It arrives in Buffalo this afternoon and gives a concert there this evening. Tuesday morning it will go on to Detroit, appearing there on Tuesday evening. Thence it travels to Indianapolis for a concert on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning it proceeds to Columbus to play there the same night. From Columbus it journeys to Cincinnati for two concerts—the first on Friday afternoon and the second on Saturday evening. On Sunday morning next it starts for Boston again, reaching here on Monday noon, or as soon thereafter as the Boston & Albany Railroad suffers it to do so. This year the orchestra does not visit Chicago, and Columbus replaces that city in the itinerary. The two concerts that it will give in Cincinnati are a part of the series arranged by the Cincinnati Musical Association to replace those of its own orchestra which the labor union compelled it to abandon. Western managers and Western audiences seemingly care little for "soloists," and in four of the six concerts there will be none. In the other two Mr. Wendling and Mr. Warnke, the first violinist and the first 'cellist, are respectively to play. With the series, moreover, Dr. Muck begins his last appearances in America. Here are the six programmes, taken, with the exception of the solo pieces, from music that the orchestra has played in Boston this season, and duly divided between the classic and the modern composers.

Monday evening in Buffalo—
Humperdinck: Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
Mozart: Concerto for Violin (Mr. Wendling).
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Tuesday evening in Detroit—
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Wednesday evening in Indianapolis—
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Dohnanyi: Concertstuck for Violohcello (Mr. Warnke).
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Thursday evening in Columbus—
D'Indy: "Wallenstein" Trilogy.
MacDowell: Suite in A minor, Op. 42.
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

Friday afternoon in Cincinnati—
Händel: Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras.
Mozart: Three German Dances.
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral."

Saturday evening in Cincinnati—
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
Dvorak: Overture, "Carneval."
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Chabrier: Rhapsody, "España."

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

* * *

A gala event in musical circles is the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall next Monday night, the first visit of the famous organization to this city in two seasons, and also the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck is one of the great musicians of his time, and during the two years he has been in this country he has made a marked impress upon its musical life. He is an exponent of a new school, and under his baton the Boston men have risen to greater triumphs than ever before in the twenty-seven years the orchestra has been in existence.

The soloist next Monday night will be Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is here for one year as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess.

Dr. Muck has announced the following program for next Monday night, a program of great beauty and variety:

Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new). ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) .....Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral" .....Beethoven

1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country-folk: Allegro. Intempo d'allegro: Thunderstorm. Tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song. Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Seats are now selling at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager of the orchestra.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

DR. KARL MUCK QUITS BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra Conductor Called Back to His Duties in Berlin.

Boston, Jan. 23.—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

[120]

From Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address .....
Date JAN 25 1908

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, February 21. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler.

The definite announcement regarding the continuance of Dr. Karl Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came on Thursday in the word from abroad that the German Kaiser would require Dr. Muck's services at home next season. Some information one way or the other as to Dr. Muck's relation to the Boston Orchestra has been expected, and there will doubtless be some disappointment felt. To remain in this country longer, however, it would probably have been necessary for the conductor to give up permanently his home connections, a step not to be lightly taken by any one in his position, which is one of the highest honor in Berlin. Dr. Muck could no doubt make more money in this country, but this is not a sufficient inducement to one of his standing. During the Western trip of the Boston Orchestra from January 23 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two, in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27, and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening, January 29. In Buffalo, Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concert stuck for violoncello and orchestra, by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo Beckar.

n .....
ress .....
e JAN 23 1908

Dr. Muck will gehen.

Nach Ende der Saison kehrt er nach Berlin zurück.

Boston, Mass., 23. Jan. Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wird mit dem Ablauf der gegenwärtigen Saison aus dieser Stellung austreten, da ihn seine Pflichten nach Berlin rufen. Die Ankündigung erfolgte durch C. A. Ellis, den geschäftlichen Leiter des Symphonie-Orchesters, in folgenden Worten:

„Da Dr. Karl Muck außer Stande war, einen weiteren Urlaub und Entbindung von seinen Pflichten in Berlin zu erlangen, so kündigt die geschäftliche Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mit großem Bedauern an, daß Herr Muck sein Verhältniß zu dem Orchester mit dem Ende der gegenwärtigen Saison lösen wird. Arrangements für das Engagement eines Nachfolgers für denselben sind noch nicht getroffen."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess PHILADELPHIA, PA
e

Kaiser Recalls Orchestra Leader.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Unwilling to spare him longer from the post of leader of the Royal Opera, Emperor William of Germany has ordered Dr. Karl Muck, who 1884 for two years has been conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to return to Berlin.

From .....
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date .....

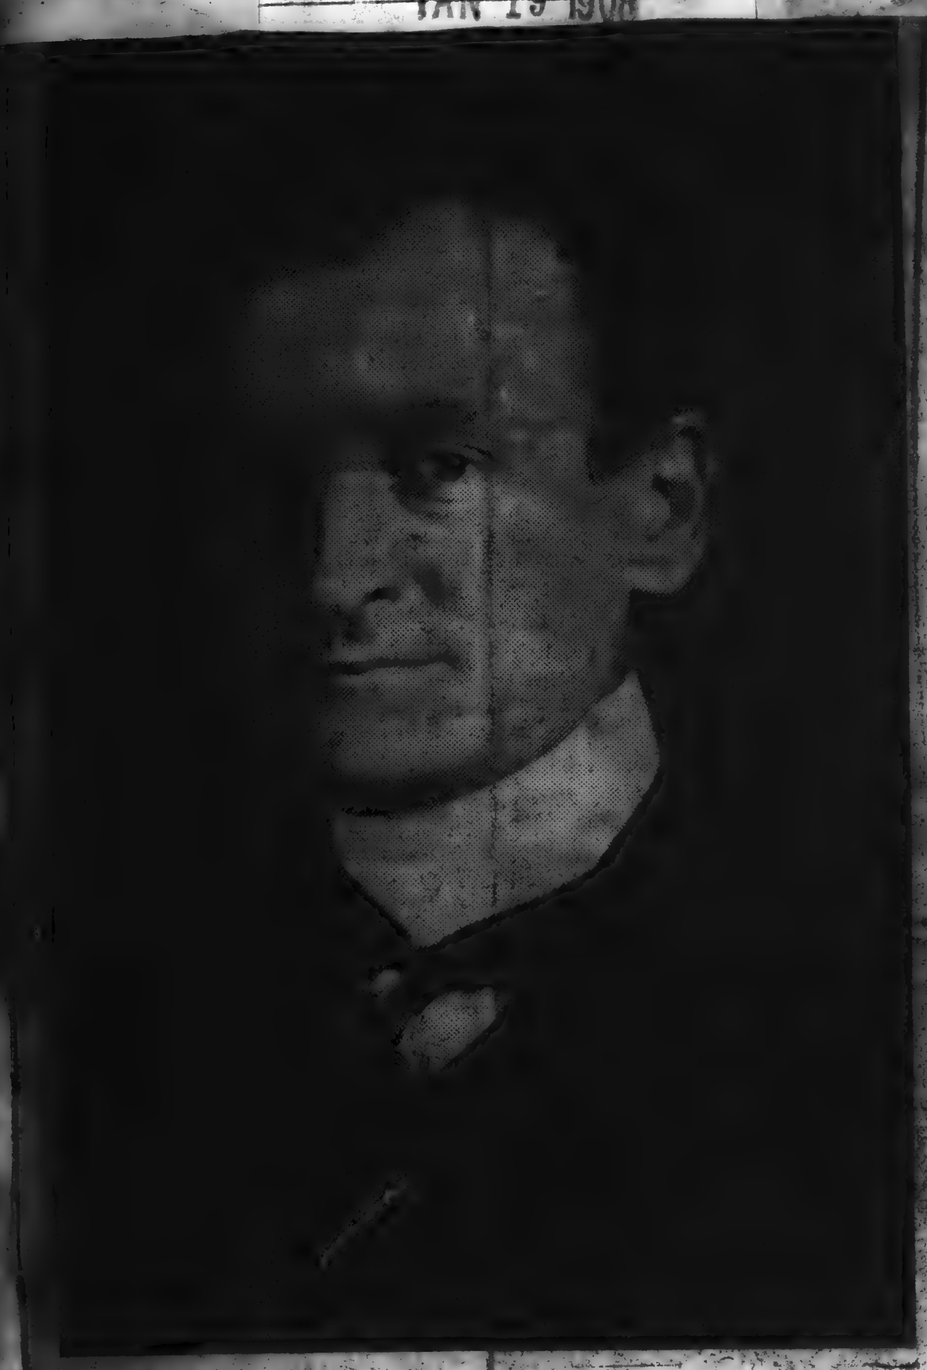
—Dr. Muck is to leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra and go back to Berlin. And even Boston does not seem to be terribly cut up over the event.

—The ..... ork, 188

COURIER.

BUFFALO, N. Y.

JAN 19 1908



DR. KARL MUCK.

Eminent musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th.

For the first time under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, January 27th, an event worthy of the widespread interest it has aroused among the music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York. The orchestra, now in its 27th season, will come here with eighty-five men, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Out of its season of thirty-one weeks, the Boston Symphony has set aside one week for a Western tour, which opens with the Buffalo concert on Monday night and includes only five cities. From here the players go to Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

Dr. Muck, in the two years he has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a marked impression upon the musical life of this country. He is here by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm and this is doubtless his last season. Dr. Muck enjoys the personal friendship of the German Emperor, who is eager for his favorite's return to his post as leading conductor at the Royal Opera, where his associate is Felix Weingartner.

The story of European music in recent years centers about Karl Muck, a picturesque and commanding musician of fine mind and tremendous attainment.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is spending the winter in Germany, so Dr. Muck, while abroad in the summer used his personal powers of persuasion, coupled with a request from the Kaiser, to have the King of Wurtemburg allow his famous young concertmeister, Carl Wendling, a year's absence to fill the place of Mr. Hess. This was accomplished, so Buffalo will hear the gifted young violinist, who is one of Europe's greatest virtuosi. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist here.

Dr. Muck's programme for the Buffalo concert is one of novelty and variety, opening with the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," including a Mozart concerto for orchestra and violin, and finishing with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony." While the programme contains only three numbers, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements. The programme is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture — "The Forced Marriage" (new).
Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kroenel 219).
Beethoven—Symphony in M major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."
1—Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2—Scene by the brook-side; Andante molto moto.
3—Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
4—Shepherd's song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier and Daniels music store, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving mail orders for seats, which will be filled in advance of the general sale. She will continue to receive them until Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check made payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place.

EXPRESS

BUFFALO N. Y.

JAN 1908

Symphony Orchestra
Seat Sale opens this Morning.

At 9 o'clock this morning, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the seat sale opens for the great musical event of the season, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall next Monday evening. Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct, the first time that Boston men have played here under this wonderful musician. The soloist will be the concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, Carl Wendling, one of Europe's leading violinists. The orchestra will come here 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Mai Davis Smith is the local manager of the Boston Symphony Or-

JOURNAL

JAN 23, 1908 E. I

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Symphony Orchestra Cannot Keep Him Beyond Present Season.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. The announcement, as made by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, is as follows:

"Owing to its inability to secure for him a further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with much regret, announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

From ... N. F.

Address ... BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date ... JAN 19 1908

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27, is an announcement which has been received with tremendous enthusiasm by music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York, and the famous organization, now in its 27th season, is assured of a noble welcome when it makes its first appearance here under its new conductor.

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is here by special permission of his royal master, the Emperor of Germany, who has refused to consider allowing his favorite to remain another year in America.

During the two seasons that Dr. Muck has been in this country he has made a deep impression upon the musical life of the new world. He is a musician of the new school, a man of wide interests and of deep learning, occupied with an understanding of and a love for music that has placed him among the few great conductors of his time. To have the Boston Orchestra here under his baton is cause for hearty congratulation. Out of its season of 31 weeks the orchestra allows but one week for a Western tour, which includes only five cities. They travel 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

When Dr. Muck went home last summer he was confronted with the prob-

DR. CARL

Conductor of the Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27.

The program selected by Dr. Muck includes a novelty, in the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which has never been played here and seldom in America. Then comes a concerto for violin and orchestra, the program concluding with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony" of Beethoven. The program in its entirety is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new,)
Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A Major, No. 5 (Kochel 219.)
Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."
1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk; allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; tempest. Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm. Allegretto.

The seat sale opens next Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. For some time, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving and filling mail orders. She will continue to do this until Wednesday morning, after which all unsold seats will be thrown into the general sale. Mail orders must be accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

rom ...

ddress ...

ate ...

TO LOSE DR. MUCK.

Orchestra Director Will Remain In Berlin Next Season.

A dispatch from Boston says it was announced in that city last night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the Orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

York, 1

STAR,

NEWARK, N. J.

JAN 24 1908

hed:

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

[121]

NEWARK, N. J.

JAN 25 08

NEWS OF THE MUSIC WORLD

It has just been announced that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

from ... N. Y. EVENING

address ... 210 FULTON PLACE, B. I

ate ... JAN 24 1908

Demanded at Home.

The announcement, made yesterday, that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not be permitted an extended leave of absence, 18 from the Kaiser's opera, and that consequently this season ends his presence here, must be a cause of particular regret to his associates, as it is a distinct loss to the music world in America. He has been another Seidl in his brief two years here, a leader among conductors. He has introduced his public to much of the newer music and set a standard both as a conductor and as a musician of catholic taste. That he is wanted at home is no wonder. The Kaiser, indeed, thought to have been ex-

DR. KARL MUCK.

Eminent musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th.

For the first time under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, January 27th, an event worthy of the widespread interest it has aroused among the music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York. The orchestra, now in its 27th season, will come here with eighty-five men, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Out of its season of thirty-one weeks, the Boston Symphony has set aside one week for a Western tour, which opens with the Buffalo concert on Monday night and includes only five cities. From here the players go to Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

Dr. Muck, in the two years he has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a marked impression upon the musical life of this country. He is here by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm and this is doubtless his last season. Dr. Muck enjoys the personal friendship of the German Emperor, who is eager for his favorite's return to his post as leading conductor at the Royal Opera, where his associate is Felix Weingartner.

The story of European music in recent years centers about Karl Muck, a picturesque and commanding musician of fine mind and tremendous attainment.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is spending the winter in Germany, so Dr. Muck, while abroad in the summer used his personal powers of persuasion, coupled with a request from the Kaiser, to have the King of Wurtenburg allow his famous young concertmeister, Carl Wendling, a year's absence to fill the place of Mr. Hess. This was accomplished, so Buffalo will hear the gifted young violinist, who is one of Europe's greatest virtuosi. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist here.

Dr. Muck's programme for the Buffalo concert is one of novelty and variety, opening with the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," including a Mozart concerto for orchestra and violin, and finishing with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony." While the programme contains only three numbers, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements. The programme is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture — "The Forced Marriage" (new).
Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kroenel 219).
Beethoven—Symphony in M major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."
1—Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2—Scene by the brook-side; Andante molto moto.
3—Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
4—Shepherd's song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier and Daniels music store. Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving mail orders for seats, which will be filled in advance of the general sale. She will continue to receive them until Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check made payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Seat Sale opens this Morning.

At 9 o'clock this morning, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the seat sale opens for the great musical event of the season, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall next Monday evening.

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct, the first time that the Boston men have played here under this wonderful musician. The soloist will be the concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, Carl Wendling, one of Europe's leading violinists. The orchestra will come here 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Symphony Orchestra Cannot Keep Him Beyond Present Season.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. The announcement, as made by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, is as follows:

"Owing to its inability to secure for him a further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with much regret, announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

From ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

Address .....

Date 1908

Establis

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27, is an announcement which has been received with tremendous enthusiasm by music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York, and the famous organization, now in its 27th season, is assured of a noble welcome when it makes its first appearance here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is here by special permission of his royal master, the Emperor of Germany, who has refused to consider allowing his favorite to remain another year in America.

During the two seasons that Dr. Muck has been in this country he has made a deep impression upon the musical life of the new world. He is a musician of the new school, a man of wide interests and of deep learning, coupled with an understanding of and a love for music that has placed him among the few great conductors of his time. To have the Boston Orchestra here under his baton is cause for hearty congratulation. Out of its season of 31 weeks the orchestra allows but one week for a Western tour, which includes only five cities. They travel 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

When Dr. Muck went home last summer he was confronted with the problem o... for one year, as Prof. W... obtained leave of absence, which he is spending in Germany. Dr. Muck preferred above all others Prof. Carl Wendling, the famous young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who was secured for one year through earnest efforts on the part of Dr. Muck. Prof. Wendling is one of Europe's brilliant violinists and he will be the soloist with the orchestra in Buffalo.

The program selected by Dr. Muck includes a novelty, in the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which has never been played here and seldom in America. Then comes a concerto for violin and orchestra, the program concluding with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony" of Beethoven. The program in its entirety is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new.)
Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A Major, No. 5 (Kochel 219.)
Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."
1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk; allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; tempest. Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm. Allegretto.

The seat sale opens next Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. For some time, however, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving and filling mail orders. She will continue to do this until Wednesday morning, after which all unsold seats will be thrown into the general sale. Mail orders must be accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents.

DR. CARL

Conductor of the Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

TO LOSE DR. MUCK.

Orchestra Director Will Remain In Berlin Next Season.

A dispatch from Boston says it was announced in that city last night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the Orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

York, 1

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

hed: 1

[121]

NEWS OF THE MUSIC WORLD

It has just been announced that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

rom .....

ddress 1

ate .....

Demanded at Home.

The announcement, made yesterday, that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not be permitted an extended leave of absence, 18 from the Kaiser's opera, and that consequently this season ends his presence here, must be a cause of particular regret to his associates, as it is a distinct loss to the music world in America. He has been another Seidl in his brief two years here, a leader among conductors. He has introduced his public to much of the newer music and set a standard both as a conductor and as a musician of catholic taste. That he is wanted at home is no wonder. The Kaiser, indeed, may be thought to have been generous in sparing him for even the period which ends so soon.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Eminent musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th.

For the first time under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, January 27th, an event worthy of the widespread interest it has aroused among the music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York. The orchestra, now in its 27th season, will come here with eighty-five men, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Out of its season of thirty-one weeks, the Boston Symphony has set aside one week for a Western tour, which opens with the Buffalo concert on Monday night and includes only five cities. From here the players go to Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati.

Dr. Muck, in the two years he has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a marked impression upon the musical life of this country. He is here by special permission of Kaiser Wilhelm and this is doubtless his last season. Dr. Muck enjoys the personal friendship of the German Emperor, who is eager for his favorite's return to his post as leading conductor at the Royal Opera, where his associate is Felix Weingartner.

The story of European music in recent years centers about Karl Muck, a picturesque and commanding musician of fine mind and tremendous attainment.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is spending the winter in Germany, so Dr. Muck, while abroad in the summer used his personal powers of persuasion, coupled with a request from the Kaiser, to have the King of Wurtenburg allow his famous young concertmeister, Carl Wendling, a year's absence to fill the place of Mr. Hess. This was accomplished, so Buffalo will hear the gifted young violinist, who is one of Europe's greatest virtuosi. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist here.

Dr. Muck's programme for the Buffalo concert is one of novelty and variety, opening with the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," including a Mozart concerto for orchestra and violin, and finishing with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony." While the programme contains only three numbers, concerto and symphony are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements. The programme is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture — "The Forced Marriage" (new).

Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kroenel 219).

Beethoven—Symphony in M major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

1—Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.

2—Scene by the brook-side; Andante molto moto.

3—Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.

4—Shepherd's song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

The seat sale opens on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at the Denton, Cottier and Daniels music store. Mrs. Mal Davis Smith, the local manager, has been receiving mail orders for seats, which will be filled in advance of the general sale. She will continue to receive them until Wednesday morning, but not later. They must be accompanied by check made payable to Mal Davis Smith, and sent to her at No. 26 Irving place.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Seat Sale opens this Morning.

At 9 o'clock this morning, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, the seat sale opens for the great musical event of the season, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall next Monday evening.

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct, the first time that the Boston men have played here under this wonderful musician. The soloist will be the concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, Carl Wendling, one of Europe's leading violinists. The orchestra will come here 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Mrs. Mal Davis Smith is the local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

KARL MUCK TO LEAVE BOSTON.

Symphony Orchestra Cannot Keep Him Beyond Present Season.

Boston, Jan. 22.—It was announced tonight that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season, owing to his duties in Berlin. The announcement, as made by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, is as follows:

"Owing to its inability to secure for him a further leave of absence from his duties in Berlin, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with much regret, announce that Dr. Karl Muck will sever his connection with the orchestra at the end of the present season. No arrangements for his successor have been made."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Establis

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27, is an announcement which has been received with tremendous enthusiasm by music lovers of Buffalo and of Western New York, and the famous organization, now in its 27th season, is assured of a noble welcome when it makes its first appearance here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Dr. Muck is here by special permission of his royal master, the Emperor of Germany, who has refused to consider allowing his favorite to remain another year in America.

During the two seasons that Dr. Muck has been in this country he has made a deep impression upon the musical life of the new world. He is a musician of the new school, a man of wide interests and of deep learning, coupled with an understanding of and a love for music that has placed him among the few great conductors of his time. To have the Boston Orchestra here under his baton is cause for hearty congratulation. Out of its season of 31 weeks the orchestra allows but one week for a Western tour, which includes only five cities. They travel 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

When Dr. Muck went home last summer he was confronted with the problem of s... for one year, as Prof. W... obtained leave of absence, which he is spending in Germany. Dr. ... ferred above all others Prof. ... Wendling, the famous young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who was secured for one year through earnest efforts on the part of Dr. Muck. Prof. Wendling is one of Europe's brilliant violinists and he will be the soloist with the orchestra in Buffalo.

The program selected by Dr. Muck includes a novelty, in the Overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," which has never been played here and seldom in America. Then comes a concerto for violin and orchestra, the program concluding with the tuneful and melodious "Pastoral Symphony" of Beethoven. The program in its entirety is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new.)

Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A Major, No. 5 (Kochel 219.)

Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country; Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk; allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; tempest. Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm. Allegretto.

The seat sale opens next Thursday ... at the Denton, ... upon an annual appropriation. This ... we are not willing to do. There is no ... politics in our attitude, our organization being made up of Republicans and Democrats and we are practically a unit in our view of the matter."

DR. CARL MUCK.

Conductor of the Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 27.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

TO LOSE DR. MUCK.

Orchestra Director Will Remain In Berlin Next Season.

A dispatch from Boston says it was announced in that city last night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the Orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

York, 1

...per Outing—Buffalo in the World

...8

...hed:

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

[121]

NEWS OF THE MUSIC WORLD

It has just been announced that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not remain with the orchestra after the present season owing to his duties in Berlin. No arrangements for his successor have been made.

From .....

Address 1

Date .....

Demanded at Home.

The announcement, made yesterday, that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not be permitted an extended leave of absence, 18 from the Kaiser's opera, and that consequently this season ends his presence here, must be a cause of particular regret to his associates, as it is a distinct loss to the music world in America. He has been another Seidl in his brief two years here, a leader among conductors. He has introduced his public to much of the newer music and set a standard both as a conductor and as a musician of catholic taste. That he is wanted at home is no wonder. The Kaiser, indeed, may be thought to have been generous in sparing him for even the period which ends so soon.

rom TRIBUNE
ddress New York City.
JAN 26 1908

Woman's Realm

GOTHAM GIRL AT A BOSTON CONCERT.

MISSES NOISY APPLAUSE OF THE HOME GALLERY.

Rush Line Formed at Symphony Hall Contains Much Pathetic Local Color.

Almost every Friday the occupants of the Boston streetcars in Huntington avenue crane their necks as they come near Symphony Hall and snicker audibly at the crowd they are sure to see assembled on the steps of the building.

"There they are!" "Been standing there ever since breakfast!" "Durned fools!" are some of the remarks one hears guffawed all over the car. The conductor grins and jokes with the nearest passengers and tells tales of the marvellous endurance of the musical cranks who are waiting for the hall to be opened. And yet in his voice and in the backward craning faces of the passengers, in spite of their gibes, there is a sort of pride in and patronizing affection for one of the customs of the queer old Hub of "culchah"—the custom of going "rush" to the Boston Symphony concerts.

It is to the great credit of Boston and to the directors of the concerts that one of the best orchestras in America can be heard for the sum of 25 cents—if you love music enough to stand in the cold and wait for it. It was when the new Symphony Hall was erected, a few years ago, that the idea was started. There are so many students and impecunious intellectuals in Boston, for whom the price of $1 50 for a seat is impossible that the management hit upon the plan of throwing open, on rehearsal day, the second balcony, which holds five hundred people, for the uniform price of 25 cents a seat. There are no tickets, no reserved seats; hence the multitude that gathers to wait for the opening of the big front doors and a chance of pouncing on the best places. They are all good seats, however, for the balcony, though the top gallery, is not a peanut gallery. It is in nearly all respects as rich and elegant as the rest of the house, for at the regular performance on Saturday night these seats cost $1 50. And the rehearsal is in reality a first performance, which is attended full as earnestly and crushingly as the Saturday night concert.

A TOUCHING EXPERIENCE.

Not to have gone "rush" to a Symphony rehearsal is to have missed an experience at once humorous and touching.

The rehearsal begins at 2 p. m. As early as 11 o'clock, and even earlier on days when a famous soloist takes part in the afternoon programme, tenuous schoolmarms and pasty, dark haired music masters begin to arrive. Close on their heels press girls from the West, who come to Boston stuffed with dreams of fame and music. These giggle in trios, or behave in a manner more solitary and intense. And then the Harvard students—not the 'rah! 'rah! boys, but the real students—seedy, shy and taciturn, as real students generally are. The foreigner, male or female, who gives German lessons, or tunes pianos, or lives on a little income and expectations, may be seen in numbers. These are always noticeable for their queer clothes of rubbed velvet or fur that has died hard, made in a way that was jaunty in Vienna perhaps fifteen years ago. More prosperous elements of the crowd are the stout, determined matrons who attend the Lowell lectures, and their husbands—the school superintendents or ministers, talkative, fussy and good.

These men generally carry a book of improving essays to read while they stand in line, but spend most of the time greeting new arrivals: "Why, Mrs. Corten, you're here late to-day. Did you enjoy the talk on Plato last night? Most stimulating, I thought. Yes, this afternoon it's Beethoven. Is the line moving?"

Two or three of the doorkeepers of the hall are paid to regulate the crowd and see that all is done with neatness and without wrangling. The building has a Doric front, with a flight of broad steps across the whole face of it. First comers stand on the top step, and at the end of that the line turns and winds along the second step, the third, and so forth. This makes a compact, tidy regiment, which when the doors are opened moves with the decorum of a marching Sunday school.

WAITING NOT DULL.

The waiting is not dull. Conversation twitters merrily, for a Boston crowd has not the deep suspicion for one another of New Yorkers. Indeed, why should these innocent and anæmic souls have anything to fear from one another? It is like some people's idea of heaven. Everything is gentle and chatty and musical. The only drawback is that the pure cold ether of Boston blows rather too searchingly. It makes the women raise their little old muffs imploringly against the cold and turns the Harvard student blue. How some of the girls ever live to come to another concert after sitting for three hours on an icy granite step, as they sometimes do when unable to stand up any longer, is a miracle which only William James or the Christian Scientists can explain. For they do come again. The gatekeepers say it is almost the same crowd every week.

The occasional newcomer feels much ashamed before the assurance and calm of the regular rushers. In the first place, he cannot find the end of [illegible] that doubles back and forth like a [illegible] up and length of the block several times, pursued by amused titters, he is scornfully thrust into his place by the commanding doorkeeper. Then he begins to notice that every one carries an exact quarter of a dollar clutched in his or her fist. He learns that this is the rule, for when the doors are opened and the rush begins a hoggish human might block the whole line for half an hour while he counts the change for a $10 bill.

The newcomer who has to lose his place in the line and march over to the corner drug store to buy some jujubes and get a quarter makes fun for the waiting line. So do the pedestrians who struggle by, the advertisements which an enterprising sandwich man thrusts on everybody as he stands there helpless, and so do the organ grinders who seek to cheer the line.

"Ah-h-h-h-h! I have sighed to r-e-e-e-est me!" sounds with ironic sweetness from the barrel organ, while the assistant vagabond clasps his hands to his sunny heart, rolls his eyes and flashes his teeth at the frostbitten audience before him.

DOORS OPEN AT LAST.

At last the doors are opened. A sort of sacred silence falls, broken only by the shuffle of moving feet and the chink of silver quarters. No tickets, no delay. You throw your quarter at the gateman and scurry through the big white marble vestibule and up the white marble stairs as fast as you can. When five hundred have entered the doors are shut again, and the overflow, which sometimes amounts to two hundred, is left yammering.

The new Symphony Hall is a beautiful, chaste, cold edifice—just what one would naturally look for in Boston. The colors are white and gray and green—all cool, very cool—especially in January and among the Puritans. All animal spirits die within you as you enter that gray and green monument, decorated with statues of Sophocles and Minerva and other soleman people of similar size and whiteness. There are no boxes—emblems of worldly show and insincerity—only rows and rows of gray-green chairs throughout the whole of the house. The auditorium is very long and narrow, with the stage at the narrow end, much smaller than Carnegie Hall in New York. The orchestra just fits, like the soldiers in a box. In this rectangular building the centre of the galleries seems a long way from the stage, but two rows of seats run all the way along the sides of the house to the very platform, so that the end seat is like a stage box. It is for this seat that the rushers contend in their panting flight upstairs.

There is a tremendous scramble for five minutes, and then a flat calm; for, though the five hundred are seated and the gallery is packed, the rest of the house is blank and empty, and it is a whole hour before the concert begins. Most of the early birds are already deep in the perusal of the programme, which we might think was made for their especial benefit, so generous an amount of information does it give. Here, for instance, is a typical programme in a fat book of eighty pages: an analysis of Haydn's symphony in E major, an account of his rise in England, a sketch of his patron, Saloman; after a description of three dances by Mozart, anecdotes about Emperor Joseph II, about Mozart's fondness for dancing, the masked balls in Vienna; then a history of the origin and evolution of the waltz, including court memoirs, poems by Ransard, a description by De Quincey; follows an account of one of Beethoven's love affairs and a dissertation on concert room clapping, and finally a criticism of the Beethoven symphony to be performed. Quite a readable volume, I assure you, that puts to shame New York's programmes full of corset and liquor advertisements.

MUSICIANS APPEAR.

By and by the musicians begin to stroll in and hold little whispered conferences with their instruments—bending their heads attentively to their viols or oboes or what not, waking them up and asking them how they feel, while the instruments give yawns and squeaks and moans. The audience glides through the many doors, and soon the whole house begins to hum with that expectant murmur and excitement that precede a performance. Last of all, when every seat is filled and every eye is fixed on that gold framed space in which are seen the dim black forms of the musicians and the quivering instruments, in darts the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the Kaiser's Approved and Boston's Joy.

It is not alone his power as a conductor which gratifies. It is also his interesting personality, which steals up even to the "rushers" in the distant gallery. This is in spite of the fact that a more intensely reserved leader can hardly be imagined. A small, neat, well made figure, austere and grim in every line of the black coattails, he can hardly be seen to conduct at all. No waggings of the head, tossed hair or frantic gestures take your eye. Some people grumble that he is like a wooden soldier, but that is not discerning. His is a very tense and vibrant figure, full of bottled lightning, which once in a long time shows in a sudden lunge. His baton strokes are like the play of a master fencer who has only to turn his wrist and the trick is done. When at the end of a piece he answers the applause by turning his head over his shoulder for half a second toward the audience he displays a clever, sarcastic countenance, clean shaven, but Teutonized by a pair of horn rimmed eyeglasses. Most Boston women love his dark and saturnine look and the apparent contempt in which he holds them. They say that he refuses to learn English because he would then be obliged to talk to people at receptions. He is a man of intellect, is Herr Muck. You feel it as he speaks his wordless messages to the musicians, and straightway that prosaic, black coated group calls up harmonies. The whole long building burns and thrills with sound, so that the dim lights, the gray-green walls, the dingy people, sink away, while you feel "your hair put on new [illegible] and your soul expand."

[122]

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21. The soloist will be Fri[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

[illegible]sler will be the soloist [illegible] Symphony concert to be given at the Baptist Temple Friday night, Feb. [illegible]

ABSORBED LISTENERS.

The "rushers" are the best listeners you ever sat with. From the time Herr Muck calls attention to the time when the last note has fallen not a sound or motion comes from the five hundred. You look into the line of pale and shadowy faces focussed on the little soldier in the black frock coat. The sound of a waltz fills the air—a waltz, that programme tells us, made by Mozart for the lovely ladies of Vienna. These wan school teachers, seedy students, decayed gentlefolk—of what are they thinking? Of the trio in G major, of dead hopes, of Paradise, of dinner? Somehow you feel mournful about them. They take their pleasures very sadly, compared to the gallery crowd at the grand opera in New York, where the merry Italian barber and the insouciant French waiter shriek "Bravo!" "Bis!" "Encore!" Those, you feel sure, will go home to a family, a bottle of claret and a noisy argument. But these Bostonians, you fear, will repair to single bedrooms and a little water from the tap. When the Puritans relaxed enough to import these joy giving German musicians, I do wish they had also taken as kindly to the German beer.

The First Established and Most Complet Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES. STAR.
From CINCINNATI, O.
Address
Date JAN 21 1908

basso to h[illegible]

The next concerts of the Symphony Orchestra association will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck naturally, has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likable in much of the music that is being written to-day and, although much of it appears on his programmes, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audiences of a symphony orchestra should be kept en rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with rather grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music back with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, it reflects the spirit of the age, as all music does, and is analytical and critical, the result of great skill rather than truly creative, the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart. He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eisenspiegel." Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places beyond the pale of art. Admitting Reger's extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest Munich "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a sincere advocate of Bruckner's genius. He confesses fondness for much of the neo-Russian school and finds much that is admirable in the "younger Frenchmen." But in the end he believes that in the search for true beauty one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. His views on conducting are equally interesting. He believes the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it and, having given, through the orchestra, expression to this, his work is done. The conductor's personality has nothing to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, when the conductor injects his own personality into the interpretation of a work, he arrives at conclusions just the opposite to those of the composers.

BULLETIN.
om
ress
e

Musical Leaders

Some of the nomenclature of the great musical leaders who come over here from abroad is rather peculiar. There is Dr. Muck, for instance, who came from Germany to direct the Boston Symphony. The name is scarcely impressive, but it is reasonable and fairly convincing, which seems more than can be said for the name of the director of La Scala at Milan, who may be brought over to succeed Herr Conreid as director of the Metropolitan Opera House. "Gatti-Casazza" sounds as if it might have been invented by Mr. George Ade for the hero of a "Fable of the Hirsute Musical Moke with the Dreamy Eye and How He Made Good in Kokomo."

But Signor Gatti-Casazza is considered about the best article in his line in all Europe. It Italy he is looked upon as a regular Gazazza, which is first cousin to a Lallapaloosa. The Metropolitan directors feel that if they can secure his services it will make their opera house very k'tish, and that business will pick up so that there will be a much larger influx of the Mazuma.—Providence Journal.

STAR.
[illegible]INGTON, D. C
JAN 26 1908

Dr. Carl Muck will resign from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, owing to orders from the German kaiser to return to the Royal Opera of Berlin.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date JAN 26 1908

Woman's Realm

GOTHAM GIRL AT A BOSTON CONCERT.

MISSES NOISY APPLAUSE OF THE HOME GALLERY.

Rush Line Formed at Symphony Hall Contains Much Pathetic Local Color.

Almost every Friday the occupants of the Boston streetcars in Huntington avenue crane their necks as they come near Symphony Hall and snicker audibly at the crowd they are sure to see assembled on the steps of the building.

"There they are!" "Been standing there ever since breakfast!" "Durned fools!" are some of the remarks one hears guffawed all over the car. The conductor grins and jokes with the nearest passengers and tells tales of the marvellous endurance of the musical cranks who are waiting for the hall to be opened. And yet in his voice and in the backward craning faces of the passengers, in spite of their gibes, there is a sort of pride in and patronizing affection for one of the customs of the queer old Hub of "culchah"—the custom of going "rush" to the Boston Symphony concerts.

It is to the great credit of Boston and to the directors of the concerts that one of the best orchestras in America can be heard for the sum of 25 cents—if you love music enough to stand in the cold and wait for it. It was when the new Symphony Hall was erected, a few years ago, that the idea was started. There are so many students and impecunious intellectuals in Boston for whom the price of $1 50 for a seat is impossible that the management hit upon the plan of throwing open, on rehearsal day, the second balcony, which holds five hundred people, for the uniform price of 25 cents a seat. There are no tickets, no reserved seats; hence the multitude that gathers to wait for the opening of the big front doors and a chance of pouncing on the best places. They are all good seats, however, for the balcony, though the top gallery, is not a peanut gallery. It is in nearly all respects as rich and elegant as the rest of the house, for at the regular performance on Saturday night these seats cost $1 50. And the rehearsal is in reality a first performance, which is attended full as earnestly and crushingly as the Saturday night concert.

A TOUCHING EXPERIENCE.

Not to have gone "rush" to a Symphony rehearsal is to have missed an experience at once humorous and touching.

The rehearsal begins at 2 p. m. As early as 11 o'clock, and even earlier on days when a famous soloist takes part in the afternoon programme, tenuous schoolmarms and pasty, dark haired music masters begin to arrive. Close on their heels press girls from the West, who come to Boston stuffed with dreams of fame and music. These giggle in trios, or behave in a manner more solitary and intense. And then the Harvard students—not the 'rah! 'rah! boys, but the real students—seedy, shy and taciturn, as real students generally are. The foreigner, male or female, who gives German lessons, or tunes pianos, or lives on a little income and expectations, may be seen in numbers. These are always noticeable for their queer clothes of rubbed velvet or fur that has died hard, made in a way that was jaunty in Vienna perhaps fifteen years ago. More prosperous elements of the crowd are the stout, determined matrons who attend the Lowell lectures, and their husbands—the school superintendents or ministers, talkative, fussy and good.

These men generally carry a book of improving essays to read while they stand in line, but spend most of the time greeting new arrivals: "Why, Mrs. Corten, you're here late to-day. Did you enjoy the talk on Plato last night? Most stimulating, I thought. Yes, this afternoon it's Beethoven. Is the line moving?"

Two or three of the doorkeepers of the hall are paid to regulate the crowd and see that all is done with neatness and without wrangling. The building has a Doric front, with a flight of broad steps across the whole face of it. First comers stand on the top step, and at the end of that the line turns and winds along the second step, the third, and so forth. This makes a compact, tidy regiment, which when the doors are opened moves with the decorum of a marching Sunday school.

WAITING NOT DULL.

The waiting is not dull. Conversation twitters merrily, for a Boston crowd has not the deep suspicion for one another of New Yorkers. Indeed, why should these innocent and anæmic souls have anything to fear from one another? It is like some people's idea of heaven. Everything is gentle and chatty and musical. The only drawback is that the pure cold ether of Boston blows rather too searchingly. It makes the women raise their little old muffs imploringly against the cold and turns the Harvard student blue. How some of the girls ever live to come to another concert after sitting for three hours on an icy granite step, as they sometimes do when unable to stand up any longer, is a miracle which only William James or the Christian Scientists can explain. For they do come again. The gatekeepers say it is almost the same crowd every week.

The occasional newcomer feels much ashamed before the assurance and calm of the regular rushers. In the first place, he cannot find the end of this queer line that doubles back and forth like a [illegible]. After he has run the end down the length of the block several times, pursued by amused titters, he is scornfully thrust into his place by the commanding doorkeeper. Then he begins to notice that every one carries an exact quarter of a dollar clutched in his or her fist. He learns that this is the rule, for when the doors are opened and the rush begins a hoggish human might block the whole line for half an hour while he counts the change for a $10 bill.

The newcomer who has to lose his place in the line and march over to the corner drug store to buy some jujubes and get a quarter makes fun for the waiting line. So do the pedestrians who struggle by, the advertisements which an enterprising sandwich man thrusts on everybody as he stands there helpless, and so do the organ grinders who seek to cheer the line.

"Ah-h-h-h-h! I have sighed to r-e-e-e-est me!" sounds with ironic sweetness from the barrel organ, while the assistant vagabond clasps his hands to his sunny heart, rolls his eyes and flashes his teeth at the frostbitten audience before him.

DOORS OPEN AT LAST.

At last the doors are opened. A sort of sacred silence falls, broken only by the shuffle of moving feet and the chink of silver quarters. No tickets, no delay. You throw your quarter at the gateman and scurry through the big white marble vestibule and up the white marble stairs as fast as you can. When five hundred have entered the doors are shut again, and the overflow, which sometimes amounts to two hundred, is left yammering.

The new Symphony Hall is a beautiful, chaste, cold edifice—just what one would naturally look for in Boston. The colors are white and gray and green—all cool, very cool—especially in January and among the Puritans. All animal spirits die within you as you enter that gray and green monument, decorated with statues of Sophocles and Minerva and other solemn people of similar size and whiteness. There are no boxes—emblems of worldly show and insincerity—only rows and rows of gray-green chairs throughout the whole of the house. The auditorium is very long and narrow, with the stage at the narrow end, much smaller than Carnegie Hall in New York. The orchestra just fits, like the soldiers in a box. In this rectangular building the centre of the galleries seems a long way from the stage, but two rows of seats run all the way along the sides of the house to the very platform, so that the end seat is like a stage box. It is for this seat that the rushers contend in their panting flight upstairs.

There is a tremendous scramble for five minutes, and then a flat calm; for, though the five hundred are seated and the gallery is packed, the rest of the house is blank and empty, and it is a whole hour before the concert begins. Most of the early birds are already deep in the perusal of the programme, which we might think was made for their especial benefit, so generous an amount of information does it give. Here, for instance, is a typical programme in a fat book of eighty pages: an analysis of Haydn's symphony in E major, an account of his rise in England, a sketch of his patron, Saloman; after a description of three dances by Mozart, anecdotes about Emperor Joseph II, about Mozart's fondness for dancing, the masked balls in Vienna; then a history of the origin and evolution of the waltz, including court memoirs, poems by Ransard, a description by De Quincey; follows an account of one of Beethoven's love affairs and a dissertation on concert room clapping, and finally a criticism of the Beethoven symphony to be performed. Quite a readable volume, I assure you, that puts to shame New York's programmes full of corset and liquor advertisements.

MUSICIANS APPEAR.

By and by the musicians begin to stroll in and hold little whispered conferences with their instruments—bending their heads attentively to their viols or oboes or what not, waking them up and asking them how they feel, while the instruments give yawns and squeaks and moans. The audience glides through the many doors, and soon the whole house begins to hum with that expectant murmur and excitement that precede a performance. Last of all, when every seat is filled and every eye is fixed on that gold framed space in which are seen the dim black forms of the musicians and the quivering instruments, in darts the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, the Kaiser's Approved and Boston's Joy.

It is not alone his power as a conductor which gratifies. It is also his interesting personality, which steals up even to the "rushers" in the distant gallery. This is in spite of the fact that a more intensely reserved leader can hardly be imagined. A small, neat, well made figure, austere and grim in every line of the black coattails, he can hardly be seen to conduct at all. No waggings of the head, tossed hair or frantic gestures take your eye. Some people grumble that he is like a wooden soldier, but that is not discerning. His is a very tense and vibrant figure, full of bottled lightning, which once in a long time shows in a sudden lunge. His baton strokes are like the play of a master fencer who has only to turn his wrist and the trick is done. When at the end of a piece he answers the applause by turning his head over his shoulder for half a second toward the audience he displays a clever, sarcastic countenance, clean shaven, but Teutonized by a pair of horn rimmed eyeglasses. Most Boston women love his dark and saturnine look and the apparent contempt in which he holds them. They say that he refuses to learn English because he would then be obliged to talk to people at receptions. He is a man of intellect, is Herr Muck. You feel it as he speaks his wordless messages to the musicians, and straightway that prosaic, black coated group calls up harmonies. The whole long building burns and thrills with sound, so that the dim lights, the gray-green walls, the dingy people sink away, while you feel "your hair put on new [illegible] and your soul expand."

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date JAN 25 1908

The next Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Union, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date JAN 25 1908

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given at the Baptist Temple Friday night, Feb. 21.

ABSORBED LISTENERS.

The "rushers" are the best listeners you ever sat with. From the time Herr Muck calls attention to the time when the last note has fallen not a sound or motion comes from the five hundred. You look into the line of pale and shadowy faces focussed on the little soldier in the black frock coat. The sound of a waltz fills the air—a waltz, that programme tells us, made by Mozart for the lovely ladies of Vienna. These wan school teachers, seedy students, decayed gentlefolk—of what are they thinking? Of the trio in G major, of dead hopes, of Paradise, of dinner? Somehow you feel mournful about them. They take their pleasures very sadly, compared to the gallery crowd at the grand opera in New York, where the merry Italian barber and the insouciant French waiter shriek "Bravo!" "Bis!" "Encore!" Those, you feel sure, will go home to a family, a bottle of claret and a noisy argument. But these Bostonians, you fear, will repair to single bedrooms and a little water from the tap. When the Puritans relaxed enough to import these joy giving German musicians, I do wish they had also taken as kindly to the German beer.

The First Established and Most Complet Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date JAN 21 1908

basso to his [illegible]

★

The next concerts of the Symphony Orchestra association will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Dr. Muck, naturally, has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likable in much of the music that is being written to-day and, although much of it appears on his programmes, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audiences of a symphony orchestra should be kept en rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with rather grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music back with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, it reflects the spirit of the age, as all music does, and is analytical and critical, the result of great skill rather than truly creative, the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart. He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eisenspiegel." Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places beyond the pale of art. Admitting Reger's extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest Munich "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a sincere advocate of Bruckner's genius. He confesses fondness for much of the neo-Russian school and finds much that is admirable in the "younger Frenchmen." But in the end he believes that in the search for true beauty one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. His views on conducting are equally interesting. He believes the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it and, having given, through the orchestra, expression to this, his work is done. The conductor's personality has nothing to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, when the conductor injects his own personality into the interpretation of a work, he arrives at conclusions just the opposite to those of the composers.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date [illegible]

Musical Leaders

Some of the nomenclature of the great musical leaders who come over here from abroad is rather peculiar. There is Dr. Muck, for instance, who came from Germany to direct the Boston Symphony. The name is scarcely impressive, but it is reasonable and fairly convincing, which seems more than can be said for the name of the director of La Scala at Milan, who may be brought over to succeed Herr Conreid as director of the Metropolitan Opera House. "Gatti-Casazza" sounds as if it might have been invented by Mr. George Ade for the hero of a "Fable of the Hirsute Musical Moke with the Dreamy Eye and How He Made Good in Kokomo."

But Signor Gatti-Casazza is considered about the best article in his line in all Europe. It Italy he is looked upon as a regular Gazazza, which is first cousin to a Lallapaloosa. The Metropolitan directors feel that if they can secure his services it will make their opera house very k'tish, and that business will pick up so that there will be a much larger influx of the Mazuma.—Providence Journal.

Dr. Carl Muck will resign from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, owing to orders from the German kaiser to return to the Royal Opera of Berlin.

[122]

INDIANAPOLIS, IND
JAN 22 1908

ORCHESTRA OF VIRTUOSI

MEN CHOSEN AND ITS OLD PLAYERS PENSIONED.

PERFECTION IS ATTAINED

secret of the wonderful play- the Boston Symphony Orchestra merely in its being a "virtuoso stra" but an "orchestra of virtuosi" remark of William J. Henderson, musical critic of the New York Sun. of the first published comments of Karl Muck, the conductor of the estra, when he reached America a r ago, was in praise of the way the erent choirs had been selected. The choir is composed of Germans, the wind choir chiefly of Frenchmen were the leading artists of Paris be- they came to America, and the choir of Slavs, Germans, Austrians ericans, the best products of the of Brussels, Prague,

It has often been asked why a representative orchestra like the Boston Symphony does not engage more Americans. The answer is easily made. It is because it is representative that more Americans are not found in it. In other words, it will engage only experienced musicians, men used to orchestral routine, and very few Americans have that routine, therefore it is necessary to send abroad for new material when such is needed.

Care in Selecting Instruments.

The brilliancy of an orchestra is dependent not only on the musicians themselves but on their instruments, and as great care is shown in the selection of the tools the musicians use as in the musicians. There is probably not an orchestra in the world which can show such a collection of splendid violins, violas and cellos as the Boston Symphony. It uses only French instruments in the wood-winds and its brasses are most carefully selected. Care is given even to the instruments of percussion, and this last summer Dr. Muck sent an entirely new outfit from Germany, tympani, glockenspiel, tambourin, cymbals and triangles, the old instruments not suiting him.

Another factor in the success of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the maintenance of an efficient personnel, which means a minimum of changes combined with a minimum of "deadwood." With its pension fund the orchestra is able to retire from time to time such members whose age prevents their giving their best service to the orchestra and by replacing these with young men the efficiency of the orchestra is always kept up to the highest point.

Noted Violinists.

Never has the quality of the individual members of the orchestra been so high as it is to-day. At the first desk of the violins are Wendling, the concert master, and Czerwonky. Wendling is in this country for the first time, having been engaged to fill the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave of absence. Although a young man, Wendling has the reputation in Germany of being one of the best concert masters in the world, and this reputation has been fully sustained by his work in Boston. He is an Alsatian and after studying in the Conservatory of Strassbourg he spent three and a half years with Joachim.

After a year of teaching he became the concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach, which place he held for four years. Then he went to hold a similar position in Stuttgart, whence he came to Boston. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth at the three last festivals and Richter has had him for concert-master at Covent Garden at three of the seasons of German opera there.

Czerwonky is another young man who is in America for his first season. He, too, is a pupil of Joachim and is regarded as one of the most brilliant virtuosi in that country. Other notable artists among the first violins are Roth, Kunz, Hoffmann, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Risch. Barleben, the leader of the second violins, has been soloist with the orchestra in Boston, and was the first to play in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's enormously difficult concerto. Rennert, another second violin, came to Boston from Leipsic last fall, where he was leading viola and assistant conductor of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra. Ferir, the leading viola, has been with the orchestra several years. A Belgian, he is regarded abroad and in this country as being one of the very few great viola players. He is one of the few players on that instrument who has never played a violin. In the violas are such brilliant virtuosi as Hermann, Loeffler, Barth and Keller.

Famous Wood-Wind Players.

The wood-wind of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famous the country over, and in Longy and Lenom, its leading oboes; the Maquarre brothers, the leading flutes; Grisez, the first clarinet; Sadony, the first bassoon; Stumpf, the bass clarinet. It possesses artists who are without equal in America. It has eight of the first horns being Hess, of Boston, and Schmid, of Vienna. Kloepfel and Heim, its leading trumpets, are deservedly famous. In short, the Boston Symphony Orchestra may well be called a perfect orchestra without a flaw, and neither time nor money has been spared to bring it to this end.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Caleb Mills Hall January 29, under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The box office sale of seats for this attraction will open at the Big Four ticket office Monday morning, January 27. Season tickets may be obtained of Mrs. Talbot.

EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

HOPES TO VISIT NIAGARA FALLS

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due Tomorrow.

LAST YEAR IN AMERICA

Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany recalls him to Berlin—His notable Career.

Dr. Carl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, by the order of the German Kaiser, has been recalled to Berlin at the close of his present season in Boston, comes to Buffalo tomorrow night, and if arrangements can be made for him, will spend at least part of Monday at Niagara Falls, which he and Mrs. Muck have seen but once. He will be back here late in the afternoon for his concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening.

Dr. Muck was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, on October 22, 1859. His father, a government official, was a talented amateur musician and gave the future conductor his first lessons, teaching him violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later was a violinist in the local symphony orchestra.

He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he stayed one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the conservatory of music. In the university he worked for his degree of doctor juris in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, while in the conservatory his teachers were Karl Reinecke and Ernst Friedrich Richter. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the Opera of Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1881. Thence he went to Salzburg, where he was the conductor of the opera in 1881-1882; thence to Brunn, where he held a similar position in 1882-1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz in Austria, which he occupied for two years following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave his first uncut performance of Die Meistersinger in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the last musical season in Boston and New York.

His success in Graz was so great that in 1886 he was called to Prague to be conductor of the German Opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra in that city. This post he held until 1892, and while in Prague he was the conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to give in that country the first performances of Wagner's Ring. In 1891 Neumann took an opera company to the Lessing Theater in Berlin, giving the first performances in that city of Cavalleria Rusticana, of The Barber of Bagdad and of Mahler's revised version of The Three Pintos. So profound was the impression he made that he was immediately offered the post of principal conductor of the Berlin Opera, his associate being Felix Weingaertner. This post he still holds. His progress in public esteem has been very rapid since he went to Berlin. In the festivals of 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he was the conductor of Parsifal at Bayreuth. In 1904-5 and 1905-6 he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the celebrated Philharmonic concerts in Vienna and this year, had he not returned to America, he was to have conducted all of them. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival. As guest conductor he has appeared in Saint Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, in Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was the conductor of the German Opera at Covent Garden, London. He has never composed.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

Owing to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening of next week, the Philharmonic Chorus will omit its usual Monday night rehearsal. Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be the soloist at the Philharmonic's third and last concert this season, which will take place on March 16th.

[128]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER
From
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date JAN 23 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE MONDAY

At Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store this morning at 9 o'clock the seat sale opens for the great musical event of the winter, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, Monday evening.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct, the first time that the Boston men have played here under this master musician. The soloist will be the concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, Carl Wendling, one of Europe's greatest violin virtuosi. The orchestra will come here with eighty-five men, the largest orchestra that has ever played in the East.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From
Address
Date
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 24 1908

German Emperor recalls Boston Symphony's Leader.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 23.—Musical Boston is mourning tonight over the announcement from C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Kaiser Wilhelm has recalled to Berlin Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston orchestra. Dr. Muck is the chief conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and it is only by repeated efforts on the part of the American orchestra managers that he has been allowed to remain in this country so long.

All negotiations for his return here another year have been closed, by act of the Kaiser, and Dr. Muck goes back to Berlin at the end of his present season. According to Mr. Ellis, no arrangements have as yet been made for Dr. Muck's successor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A RARE MUSICAL TREAT

Not in many years has Buffalo been offered such a musical treat as is promised for next Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert at Convention Hall.

This will be the first time the celebrated orchestra has ever played here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. It is also the last time, for the conductor has been recalled to his post in Berlin by Kaiser Wilhelm, who refuses to allow him another year in America. He leaves Boston at the end of the present season.

Many parties from out of town are coming here for the Monday night concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo again this season and it is two years since it has been heard here.

Seats are now on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. The local representative of the orchestra is Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The soloist next Monday night will be Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, a violinist of great attainments, who is in this country for one year only.

From
Address
Date
EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 24 1908

The Event will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

The leading musical event of the winter is the concert at Convention Hall next Monday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. The occasion will bring many out-of-town music lovers here, for the orchestra does not play close to Buffalo this season.

Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, will be the soloist. Mr. Wendling is in this country for only one season, having been lent to Boston as concertmeister during the absence abroad of Professor Willy Hess.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, at prices varying from 75 cents to $2.00.

From
Address
Date
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

In a season rich with musical attractions, the crowning event will be the concert at Convention Hall next Monday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Muck, accompanied by Frau Muck, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow night. He will also be accompanied by Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who will be the soloist at the Monday night concert. Mr. Wendling is one of Europe's great violinists and is acting as concertmeister in Boston for this winter during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess.

Monday afternoon the orchestra will arrive, accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee, 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Dr. Muck is an exponent of the new school and he has arranged a program that will be unique in Buffalo, for instead of a mixed assortment of numbers, he has selected only three. The concerto and symphony, however, are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements in all. The program in full is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new.)

Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219.)

Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

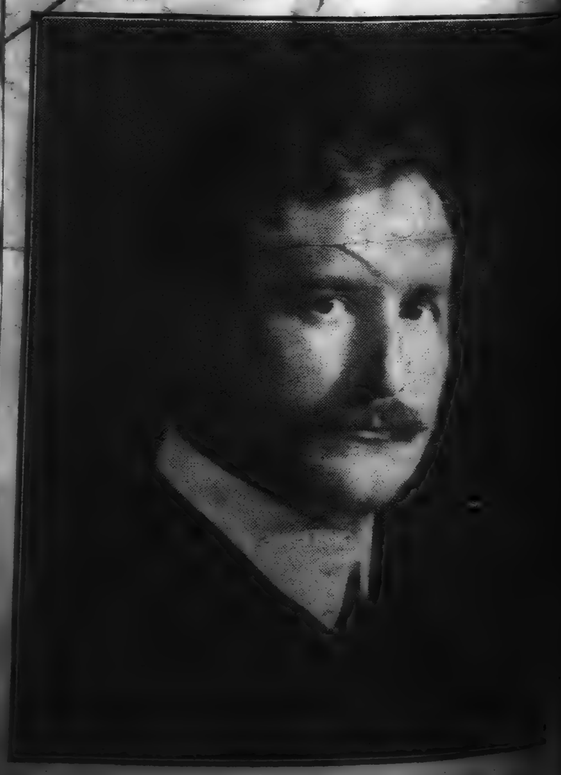
The seat sale is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. The local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

From
Address
Date
Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow night and will spend part of Monday in Niagara Falls, returning for his concert in Convention Hall Monday evening.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Illustrated
From
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 1908

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
From
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

General regret will be felt among musicians in this country at the inability of Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to remain at his present post longer than the end of the season. Of course, at the time of Dr. Muck's appointment it was understood this his leave of absence was only given for the period of a year from the Royal Opera in Berlin, but the eminent conductor has made so many warm friends among American musicians since his residence here, and achieved such signal success with the famous orchestra, that the wish to retain his services has been generally felt. It does not at all follow that because a conductor is successful in Europe he will be in America. There are so many differences in conditions here and abroad that the personality of the man plays almost as important a role in his success in dealing with his men as his gifts as a conductor. While Dr. Muck's programs for the Boston Symphony concerts have been very largely made up from the classical symphonic writers, yet a good percentage of the most modern writers have been drawn upon. One of these latter, Hermann Bischoff, a young Munich composer, was represented by a symphony of such enormous length (one and a quarter hours) that the paralyzed critics were moved to open rebellion afterwards. It is stated that no arrangements have been made for Dr. Muck's successor in Boston.



CARL WENDLING.
Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, soloist at the Boston Orchestra's concert at Convention Hall on January 27th.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 22 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY AN ORCHESTRA OF VIRTUOSI

BEST MEN CHOSEN AND ITS OLD PLAYERS PENSIONED.

HOW PERFECTION IS ATTAINED

What the secret of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may not merely in its being a "virtuoso orchestra" but an "orchestra of virtuosi" was a remark of William J. Henderson, the musical critic of the New York Sun. One of the first published comments of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, when he reached America a year ago, was in praise of the way the different choirs had been selected. The brass choir is composed of Germans, the wood-wind choir chiefly of Frenchmen who were the leading artists of Paris before they came to America, and the string choir of Slavs, Germans, Austrians and Americans, the best products of the famous teachers of Brussels, Prague, Vienna and Berlin.

It has often been asked why a representative orchestra like the Boston Symphony does not engage more Americans. The answer is easily made. It is because it is representative that more Americans are not found in it. In other words, it will engage only experienced musicians, men used to orchestral routine, and very few Americans have that routine, therefore it is necessary to send abroad for new material when such is needed.

Care in Selecting Instruments.

The brilliancy of an orchestra is dependent not only on the musicians themselves but on their instruments, and as great care is shown in the selection of the tools the musicians use as in the musicians. There is probably not an orchestra in the world which can show such a collection of splendid violins, violas and cellos as the Boston Symphony. It uses only French instruments in the wood-winds and its brasses are most carefully selected. Care is given even to the instruments of percussion, and this last summer Dr. Muck sent an entirely new outfit from Germany, tympani, glockenspiel, tambourin, cymbals and triangles, the old instruments not suiting him.

Another factor in the success of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the maintenance of an efficient personnel, which means a minimum of changes combined with a minimum of "deadwood." With its pension fund the orchestra is able to retire from time to time such members whose age prevents their giving their best service to the orchestra and by replacing these with young men the efficiency of the orchestra is always kept up to the highest point.

Noted Violinists.

Never has the quality of the individual members of the orchestra been so high as it is to-day. At the first desk of the violins are Wendling, the concert master, and Czerwonky. Wendling is in this country for the first time, having been engaged to fill the place of Prof. Willy Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave of absence. Although a young man, Wendling has the reputation in Germany of being one of the best concert masters in the world, and this reputation has been fully sustained by his work in Boston. He is an Alsatian and after studying in the Conservatory of Strassbourg he spent three and a half years with Joachim.

After a year of teaching he became the concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach, which place he held for four years. Then he went to hold a similar position in Stuttgart, whence he came to Boston. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth at the three last festivals and Richter has had him for concert-master at Covent Garden at three of the seasons of German opera there.

Czerwonky is another young man who is in America for his first season. He, too, is a pupil of Joachim and is regarded as one of the most brilliant virtuosi in that country. Other notable artists among the first violins are Roth, Kunz, Hoffmann, Krafft, Theodorowicz and Ribarsch. Barleben, the leader of the second violins, has been soloist with the orchestra in Boston, and was the first to play in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's enormously difficult concerto. Rennert, another second violin, came to Boston from Leipsic last fall, where he was leading viola and assistant conductor of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra. Ferir, the leading viola, has been with the orchestra several years. A Belgian, he is regarded abroad and in this country as being one of the very few great viola players. He is one of the few players on that instrument who has never played a violin. In the cellos are such brilliant virtuosi as Warnke, Loeffler, Barth and Keller.

Famous Wood-Wind Players.

The wood-wind of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famous the country over, and in Longy and Lenom, its leading oboes; the Maquarre brothers, the leading flutes; Grisez, the first clarinet; Sadony, the first bassoon; Stumpf, the bass clarinet, it possesses artists who are without equal in America. It has eight horns, the first horns being Hess, of Munich, and Schmid, of Vienna. Kloepfel and Heim, its leading trumpets, are equally famous. In short, the Boston Symphony Orchestra may well be called an orchestra without a flaw, and neither time nor money has been spared to bring about this end.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Caleb Mills Hall January 29, under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The box office sale of seats for this concert will open at the Big Four ticket office on Monday morning, January 27. In the meantime tickets may be obtained by mail from Mrs. Talbot.

EXPRESS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

HOPES TO VISIT NIAGARA FALLS

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due Tomorrow.

LAST YEAR IN AMERICA

Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany recalls him to Berlin—His notable Career.

Dr. Carl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, by the order of the German Kaiser, has been recalled to Berlin at the close of his present season in Boston, comes to Buffalo tomorrow night, and if arrangements can be made for him, will spend at least part of Monday at Niagara Falls, which he and Mrs. Muck have seen but once. He will be back here late in the afternoon for his concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening.

Dr. Muck was born in Wurzburg, Bavaria, on October 22, 1859. His father, a government official, was a talented amateur musician and gave the future conductor his first lessons, teaching him violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later was a violinist in the local symphony orchestra.

He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he stayed one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the conservatory of music. In the university he worked for his degree of doctor juris in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, while in the conservatory his teachers were Karl Reinecke and Ernst Friedrich Richter. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the Opera of Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1881. Thence he went to Salzburg, where he was the conductor of the opera in 1881-1882; thence to Brunn, where he held a similar position in 1882-1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz in Austria, which he occupied for two years following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave his first uncut performance of Die Meistersinger in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the last musical season in Boston and New York.

His success in Graz was so great that in 1886 he was called to Prague to be conductor of the German Opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra in that city. This post he held until 1892, and while in Prague he was the conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to give in that country the first performances of Wagner's Ring. In 1891 Neumann took an opera company to the Lessing Theater in Berlin, giving the first performances in that city of Cavalleria Rusticana, of The Barber of Bagdad and of Mahler's revised version of The Three Pintos. So profound was the impression he made that he was immediately offered the post of principal conductor of the Berlin Opera, his associate being Felix Weingartner. This post he still holds. His progress in public esteem has been very rapid since he went to Berlin. In the festivals of 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he was the conductor of Parsifal at Bayreuth. In 1904-5 and 1905-6 he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the celebrated Philharmonic concerts in Vienna and this year, had he not returned to America, he was to have conducted all of them. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival. As guest conductor he has appeared in Saint Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, in Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was the conductor of the German Opera at Covent Garden, London. He has never composed.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A RARE MUSICAL TREAT

Not in many years has Buffalo been offered such a musical treat as is promised for next Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert at Convention Hall.

This will be the first time the celebrated orchestra has ever played here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. It is also the last time, for the conductor has been recalled to his post in Berlin by Kaiser Wilhelm, who refuses to allow him another year in America. He leaves Boston at the end of the present season.

Many parties from out of town are coming here for the Monday night concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo again this season and it is two years since it has been heard here.

Seats are now on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. The local representative of the orchestra is Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The soloist next Monday night will be Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, a violinist of great attainments, who is in this country for one year only.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

Owing to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Monday evening of next week, the Philharmonic Chorus will omit its usual Monday night rehearsal. Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be the soloist at the Philharmonic's third and last concert this season, which will take place on March 16th.

[123]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... LO, N. Y.
Address ...
Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE MONDAY

At Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store this morning at 9 o'clock the seat sale opens for the great musical event of the winter, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Convention Hall, Monday evening.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, will conduct, the first time that the Boston men have played here under this master musician. The soloist will be the concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, Carl Wendling, one of Europe's greatest violin virtuosi. The orchestra will come here with eighty-five men, the largest orchestra that has ever played in the East.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith is the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From ... EXPRESS
Address ... N. Y.
Date ... JAN 24 1908

German Emperor recalls Boston Symphony's Leader.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 23.—Musical Boston is mourning tonight over the announcement from C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Kaiser Wilhelm has recalled to Berlin Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston orchestra. Dr. Muck is the chief conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and it is only by repeated efforts on the part of the American orchestra managers that he has been allowed to remain in this country so long.

All negotiations for his return here another year have been closed, by act of the Kaiser, and Dr. Muck goes back to Berlin at the end of his present season. According to Mr. Ellis, no arrangements have as yet been made for Dr. Muck's successor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 25 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A RARE MUSICAL TREAT

Not in many years has Buffalo been offered such a musical treat as is promised for next Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert at Convention Hall.

This will be the first time the celebrated orchestra has ever played here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. It is also the last time, for the conductor has been recalled to his post in Berlin by Kaiser Wilhelm, who refuses to allow him another year in America. He leaves Boston at the end of the present season.

Many parties from out of town are coming here for the Monday night concert. The orchestra does not play close to Buffalo again this season and it is two years since it has been heard here.

Seats are now on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. The local representative of the orchestra is Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The soloist next Monday night will be Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, a violinist of great attainments, who is in this country for one year only.

From ... N. Y.
Address ...
Date ... JAN 25 1908

General regret will be felt among musicians in this country at the inability of Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to remain at his present post longer than the end of the season. Of course, at the time of Dr. Muck's appointment it was understood this his leave of absence was only given for the period of a year from the Royal Opera in Berlin, but the eminent conductor has made so many warm friends among American musicians since his residence here, and achieved such signal success with the famous orchestra, that the wish to retain his services has been generally felt. It does not at all follow that because a conductor is successful in Europe he will be in America. There are so many differences in conditions here and abroad that the personality of the man plays almost as important a role in his success in dealing with his men as his gifts as a conductor. While Dr. Muck's programs for the Boston Symphony concerts have been very largely made up from the classical symphonic writers, yet a good percentage of the most modern writers have been drawn upon. One of these latter, Hermann Bischoff, a young Munich composer, was represented by a symphony of such enormous length (one and a quarter hours) that the paralyzed critics were moved to open rebellion afterwards. It is stated that no arrangements have yet been made for Dr. Muck's successor in Boston.

From ... EXPRESS
Address ... CO.
Date ... JAN 2 1908

Gala Event will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The leading musical event of the winter is the concert at Convention Hall next Monday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. The occasion will bring many out-of-town music lovers here, for the orchestra does not play close to Buffalo this season.

Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemburg, will be the soloist. Mr. Wendling is in this country for only one season, having been lent to Boston as concertmeister during the absence abroad of Professor Willy Hess.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store, at prices varying from 75 cents to $2.00.

From ... CO.
Address ... BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date ... JAN 2 1908

In a season rich with musical attractions, the crowning event will be the concert at Convention Hall next Monday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Muck, accompanied by Frau Muck, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow night. He will also be accompanied by Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who will be the soloist at the Monday night concert. Mr. Wendling is one of Europe's great violinists and is acting as concertmeister in Boston for this winter during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess.

Monday afternoon the orchestra will arrive, accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee, 85 strong, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

Dr. Muck is an exponent of the new school and he has arranged a program that will be unique in Buffalo, for instead of a mixed assortment of numbers, he has selected only three. The concerto and symphony, however, are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements in all. The program in full is as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new.)

Mozart—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219.)

Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

The seat sale is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents. The local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow night and will spend part of Monday in Niagara Falls, returning for his concert in Convention Hall Monday evening.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...

CARL WENDLING.
Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, soloist at the Boston Orchestra's concert at Convention Hall on January 27th.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Boston Symphony Concert.

Tomorrow night will be a gala one for Buffalo, as it marks the first appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The great ochestra, 85 strong, will be heard in a concert at Convention Hall that will be memorable in the musical history of the city.

While there have been rumors that Dr. Muck could not remain in America another year, definite announcement was made last Thursday by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Dr. Muck has been recalled to Berlin by the Kaiser, to take effect at the end of the present season, so this will be Buffalo's one opportunity of hearing the master musician with America's greatest orchestra.

Dr. Muck arrives in Buffalo tomorrow night, accompanied by Mrs. Muck. In the party also will be the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concert-meister to the King of Wurtemburg, who, at Dr. Muck's earnest solicitation, was allowed to come to America for this one season as concertmeister with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Wendling is a great violinist and will be the soloist at tomorrow night's concert.

The program in full reads as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new).

Mozart—Concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219).

Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troopo.

Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.

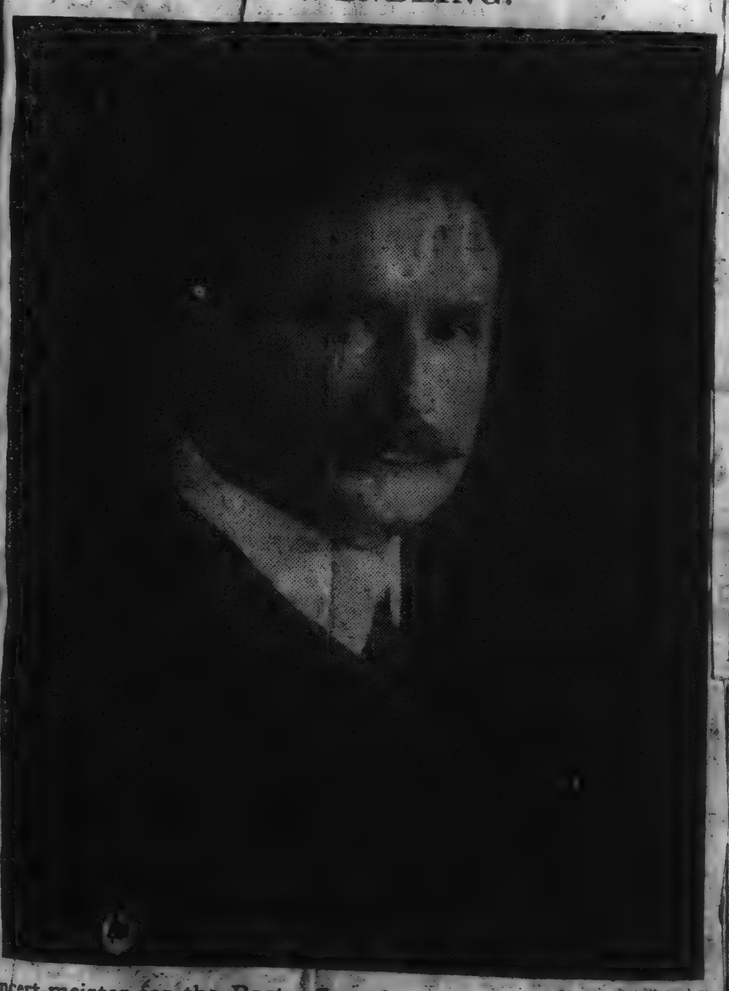
Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro thunderstorm; tempest: Allegro.

Shepherds' song; Gladsome and Thankful Feelings After the Storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes a special request that the audience assemble early, for there must be absolute silence in the hall during the concert and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. The program opens promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

Seats are on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are from 75 cents to $2.

CARL WENDLING.



Concert-meister for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Season of 1907-1908.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night the usual Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic's third and last concert this season will take place on Monday evening, March 16, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist.

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Never in Buffalo has such a concert been offered as that promised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for tomorrow night in Convention Hall. This is the first time that the celebrated organization has been heard under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. It will also be the last, for, as was announced in the cable dispatches last Thursday, the German Kaiser has recalled Dr. Muck to Berlin, refusing to allow his favorite conductor to remain longer away from his post. Dr. Muck returns to Germany at the close of his present season in Boston. During the two years that he has been in America Dr. Muck has made a profound impression upon the musical life of this country. He is an exponent of a new school, but he is a sane exponent, a silent, self-contained man, a brilliant musician and one of the greatest conductors in the world.

Accompanied by Frau Muck, Dr. Muck arrives in Buffalo this evening. Also in the party will be the librarian of the orchestra and Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who has been given a year's leave of absence to act as concertmeister in Boston during the stay abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist tomorrow night. He is one of Europe's greatest violinists and a very charming, young and gifted man. Mrs. May Davis Smith is the local manager.

The programme announced for tomorrow night marks an innovation here, for it is only three numbers, although symphony and concerto are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements in all. Dr. Muck is strongly opposed to what he calls, in his broken English, heterogeneous programmes. He advocates unity of musical thought and the programme he has arranged for Buffalo would, were it given in Berlin, pack the opera house to the doors. His interpretation of the "Pastoral Symphony" is renowned and he opens the concert with the overture to Humperdinck's opera of "The Forced Marriage," which is an absolute novelty here.

When the opera was first produced there was no overture. In place of it was an orchestra introduction of about twenty-five measures, and convent bells were heard. The overture was composed for the production of the opera in Munich in May, 1906, and was then played for the first time. It was performed at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, led by Mr. Nikisch, in November, 1906.

Tomorrow night's programme in its entirety is as follows:

Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new) .....Humperdinck
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral" .....Beethoven
Awakening of serene impression on arrivng in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
Scene by the brook side: Andante molto moto.
Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' alegro.
Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
Shepherd's song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegreto.

It is especially requested that those attending tomorrow night's concert be at Convention Hall early, for the audience will be large and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Absolute silence must be maintained in the hall. The programme will open promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow afternoon, by special train, bringing with him the members of the orchestra eighty-five in number, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

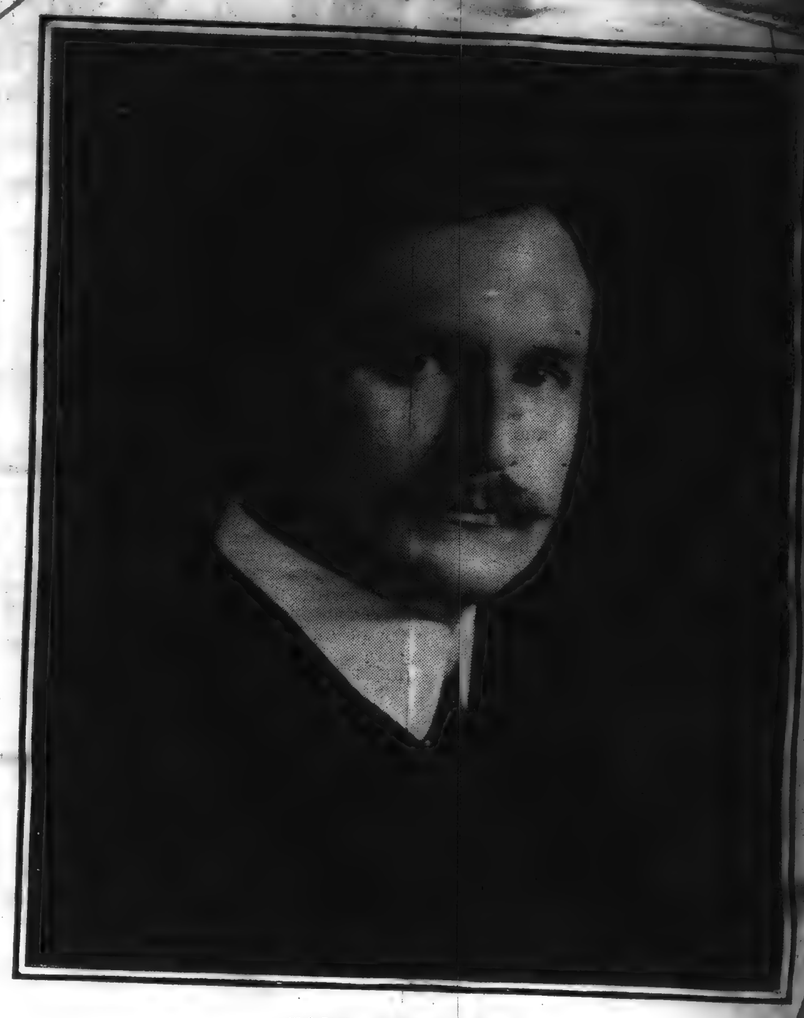
The players go from here to four cities, completing a week's western tour, the only one they will make this season. Tomorrow night's concert will be one of the greatest musical events in the history of Buffalo and should pack Convention Hall to the doors.

The programme to be presented by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto at its annual concert in Buffalo on February 24th, under the local management of Mr. Louis W. Gay, will contain a collection of numbers that will be a veritable feast of music. Mr. Vogt's catholicity of taste and versatility in the works of the great schools of music is revealed in the offerings of the great chorus.

Two numbers with organ accompaniment will be Sir Hubert Pany's setting of Mieton's ode, "Blest Pair of Tirens" and a magnificent setting of the 150th psalm by Caesar Franct. The eight-part choruses will include works by Palestrina and Lotti. The famous "Crucifixus," by the latter composer, being repeated in response to numerous requests.

An eight-part chorus by Cornelius, "The Christmas Song," and the same composer's "Hero Rest," will be novelties on this year's programme, and are among the most beautiful of modern compositions. They are both written with a part for an obgate baritone solo, the chorus part being of the nature of a meditation upon the solo part. Mr. Claude Cunninghom of New York has been especially employed for this part. Other numbers will be Gounod's magnificent six-part chorus "All Ye Who Weep;" Michael Haydn's exquisite passion motette, "Darkness was Over All;" Dr. Walford Davies' stirring setting of Kipling's "Hymn Before Action," and Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of "The Cruiskeen Lawn." In addition to these Mr. Joseph Hofmann will contribute several piano numbers.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908



CARL WENDLING,

Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Give a Concert at Convention Hall Tomorrow Night.

COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

CARL WENDLING.

Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert at Convention Hall tomorrow evening.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night, the usual Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic third and last concert this season will take place on Monday evening, March 16th, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Musical Buffalo is looking forward with keenest anticipation to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at Convention Hall, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. While it has been known that the German emperor was bent upon recalling his favorite to Berlin at the close of the present Boston season, it was not until last Thursday that the rumor of Dr. Muck's retirement became a fact. The Kaiser has refused Dr. Muck another season in America, as the leading conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin can no longer be spared from his post. Buffalo consequently gets but one opportunity for hearing the Boston men under this famous leader. Dr. Muck arrives here this evening, accompanied by his wife, also by the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concert-meister to the King of Wurtemberg, who will be the soloist tomorrow night. Mr. Wendling is in this country for the one season, having been granted a year's leave of absence to act as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Wendling is a great artist and one of Europe's foremost violinists. He is also a very charming man. Early tomorrow afternoon a special train will arrive in Buffalo, bringing the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 85 in number, accompanied by their assistant manager, Fred R. Comee. This begins a week's Western tour by the orchestra, its only one this season. Dr. Muck has arranged a program for Buffalo that marks a new era in musical programs, for this celebrated musician does not believe in a haphazard assortment of numbers old and new, but rather in continuity of musical thought. The opening number in the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," an absolute novelty. This will be followed by a concerte for violin and orchestra, the program ending with the wonderfully melodious Pastoral Symphony. Dr. Muck in Berlin frequently makes up an entire concert of a symphony, and when he does he packs the Opera House to the doors for his interpretation of it is world renowned. The program in its entirety reads:

Overture—"The Forced Marriage" (New) ..... Humperdinck
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 6. Op. 68, the "Pastoral" ..Beethoven
1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the request that the audience assemble early tomorrow night. The program begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing.

Seats are on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. Prices range from 75 cents to $2.

[124]

Boston Symphony Concert.

Tomorrow night will be a gala one for Buffalo, as it marks the first appearance here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The great orchestra, 85 strong, will be heard in a concert at Convention Hall that will be memorable in the musical history of the city.

While there have been rumors that Dr. Muck could not remain in America another year, definite announcement was made last Thursday by C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that Dr. Muck has been recalled to Berlin by the Kaiser, to take effect at the end of the present season, so this will be Buffalo's one opportunity of hearing the master musician with America's greatest orchestra.

Dr. Muck arrives in Buffalo tomorrow night, accompanied by Mrs. Muck. In the party also will be the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concert-meister to the King of Wurtemburg, who, at Dr. Muck's earnest solicitation, was allowed to come to America for this one season as concertmeister with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Wendling is a great violinist and will be the soloist at tomorrow night's concert.

The program in full reads as follows:

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new).

Mozart—Concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219).

Beethoven—Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral."

Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troopo.

Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.

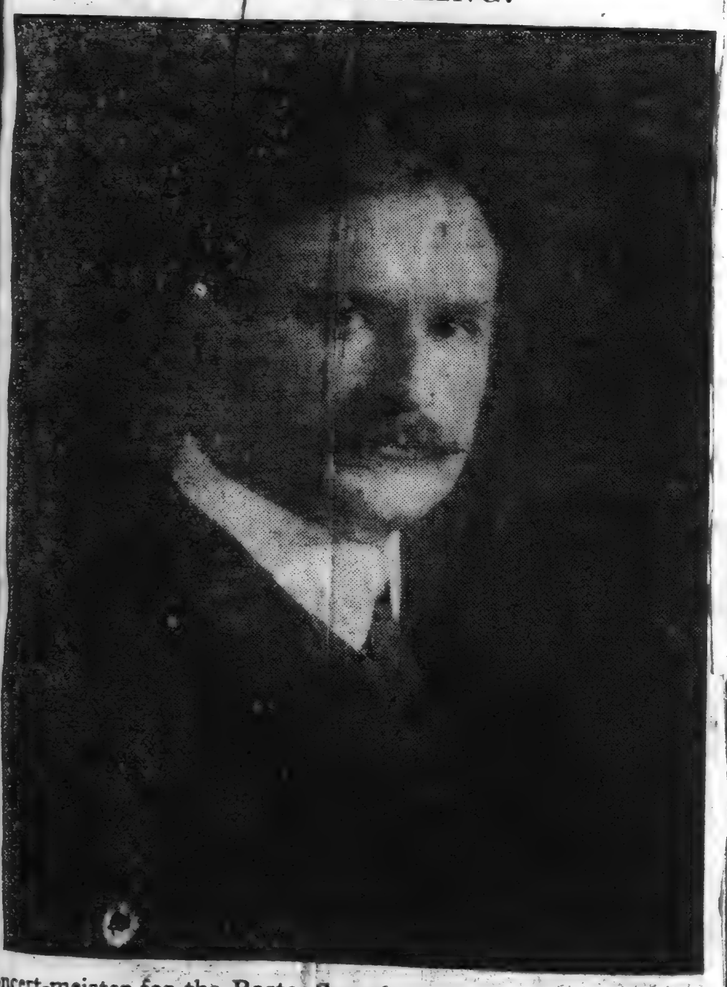
Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro thunderstorm; tempest: Allegro.

Shepherds' song; Gladsome and Thankful Feelings After the Storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes a special request that the audience assemble early, for there must be absolute silence in the hall during the concert and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. The program opens promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

Seats are on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices are from 75 cents to $2.

CARL WENDLING.



Concert-meister for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Season of 1907-1908.

NEWS
JAN 26 1908

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night the usual Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic's third and last concert this season will take place on Monday evening, March 16, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the soloist.

Never in Buffalo has such a concert been offered as that promised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for tomorrow night in Convention Hall. This is the first time that the celebrated organization has been heard under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. It will also be the last, for, as was announced in the cable dispatches last Thursday, the German Kaiser has recalled Dr. Muck to Berlin, refusing to allow his favorite conductor to remain longer away from his post. Dr. Muck returns to Germany at the close of his present season in Boston. During the two years that he has been in America Dr. Muck has made a profound impression upon the musical life of this country. He is an exponent of a new school, but he is a sane exponent, a silent, self-contained man, a brilliant musician and one of the greatest conductors in the world.

Accompanied by Frau Muck, Dr. Muck arrives in Buffalo this evening. Also in the party will be the librarian of the orchestra and Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who has been given a year's leave of absence to act as concertmeister in Boston during the stay abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Wendling will be the soloist tomorrow night. He is one of Europe's greatest violinists and a very charming, young and gifted man. Mrs. May Davis Smith is the local manager.

The programme announced for tomorrow night marks an innovation here, for it is only three numbers, although symphony and concerto are divided into parts, so that there are seven movements in all. Dr. Muck is strongly opposed to what he calls, in his broken English, heterogeneous programmes. He advocates unity of musical thought and the programme he has arranged for Buffalo would, were it given in Berlin, pack the opera house to the doors. His interpretation of the "Pastoral Symphony" is renowned and he opens the concert with the overture to Humperdinck's opera of "The Forced Marriage," which is an absolute novelty here.

When the opera was first produced there was no overture. In place of it was an orchestra introduction of about twenty-five measures, and convent bells were heard. The overture was composed for the production of the opera in Munich in May, 1906, and was then played for the first time. It was performed at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, led by Mr. Nikisch, in November, 1906.

Tomorrow night's programme in its entirety is as follows:

Overture, "The Forced Marriage" (new) .....Humperdinck

Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral" .....Beethoven

Awakening of serene impression on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Scene by the brook side: Andante molto moto.

Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' alegro.

Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.

Shepherd's song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegreto.

It is especially requested that those attending tomorrow night's concert be at Convention Hall early, for the audience will be large and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Absolute silence must be maintained in the hall. The programme will open promptly at 8:15 o'clock.

Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in Buffalo tomorrow afternoon, by special train, bringing with him the members of the orchestra eighty-five in number, the largest orchestra that has ever visited this part of the country.

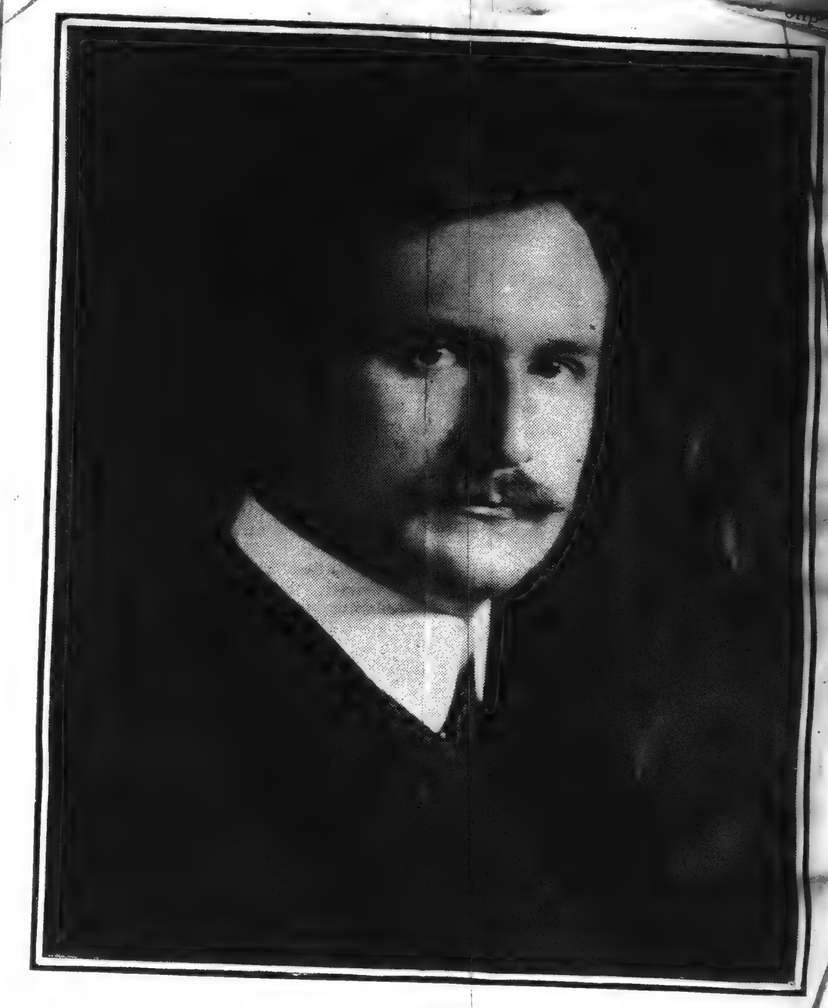
The players go from here to four cities, completing a week's western tour, the only one they will make this season. Tomorrow night's concert will be one of the greatest musical events in the history of Buffalo and should pack Convention Hall to the doors.

The programme to be presented by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto at its annual concert in Buffalo on February 24th, under the local management of Mr. Louis W. Gay, will contain a collection of numbers that will be a veritable feast of music. Mr. Vogt's catholicity of taste and versatility in the works of the great schools of music is revealed in the offerings of the great chorus.

Two numbers with organ accompaniment will be Sir Hubert Pany's setting of Mieton's ode, "Blest Pair of Tirens" and a magnificent setting of the 150th psalm by Caesar Franct. The eight-part choruses will include works by Palestrina and Lotti. The famous "Crucifixus," by the latter composer, being repeated in response to numerous requests.

An eight-part chorus by Cornelius, "The Christmas Song," and the same composer's "Hero Rest," will be novelties on this year's programme, and are among the most beautiful of modern compositions. They are both written with a part for an obgate baritone solo, the chorus part being of the nature of a meditation upon the solo part. Mr. Claude Cunninghom of New York has been especially employed for this part. Other numbers will be Gounod's magnificent six-part chorus, "All Ye Who Weep;" Michael Haydn's exquisite passion motette, "Darkness was Over All;" Dr. Walford Davies' stirring setting of Kipling's "Hymn Before Action," and Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of "The Cruiskeen Lawn." In addition to these Mr. Joseph Hofmann will contribute several piano numbers.

Illustrated TIMES,
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908



CARL WENDLING,

Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Which Will Give a Concert at Convention Hall Tomorrow Night.

CARL WENDLING.

Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert at Convention Hall tomorrow evening.

TIMES,
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 26 1908

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night, the usual Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic third and last concert this season will take place on Monday evening, March 16th, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist.

Musical Buffalo is looking forward with keenest anticipation to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at Convention Hall, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. While it has been known that the German emperor was bent upon recalling his favorite to Berlin at the close of the present Boston season, it was not until last Thursday that the rumor of Dr. Muck's retirement became a fact. The Kaiser has refused Dr. Muck another season in America, as the leading conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin can no longer be spared from his post. Buffalo consequently gets but one opportunity for hearing the Boston men under this famous leader. Dr. Muck arrives here this evening, accompanied by his wife, also by the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by Carl Wendling, the brilliant young concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who will be the soloist tomorrow night. Mr. Wendling is in this country for the one season, having been granted a year's leave of absence to act as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Prof. Willy Hess. Wendling is a great artist and one of Europe's foremost violinists. He is also a very charming man. Early tomorrow afternoon a special train will arrive in Buffalo, bringing the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 85 in number, accompanied by their assistant manager, Fred R. Comee. This begins a week's Western tour by the orchestra, its only one this season. Dr. Muck has arranged a program for Buffalo that marks a new era in musical programs, for this celebrated musician does not believe in a haphazard assortment of numbers old and new, but rather in continuity of musical thought. The opening number in the overture to Humperdinck's "The Forced Marriage," an absolute novelty. This will be followed by a concerto for violin and orchestra, the program ending with the wonderfully melodious Pastoral Symphony. Dr. Muck in Berlin frequently makes up an entire concert of this symphony and when he does Berlin packs the Opera House to the doors, for his interpretation of it is world renowned. The program in its entirety reads:

Overture—"The Forced Marriage" (New) ..... Humperdinck

Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219) ..... Mozart

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Op. 68, the "Pastoral"..Beethoven

1. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
2. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
3. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; tempest: Allegro.
4. Shepherds' song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the request that the audience assemble early tomorrow night. The program begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing.

Seats are on sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. Prices range from 75 cents to $2.

[124]

...CO...ER
...HIO, N. Y
JAN 26 08

...the Boston Symphon... a concert tomorrow night, th... rehearsal of the Philharmoni... has been given up this week... Philharmonic's third and last con... this season will be on Monda... evening, March 16th, when Bonci, th... tenor of the Metropolitan Opera...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Illustrated EXPRESS
...BUFFALO, N. Y
...08

A gala event indeed is the concert at Convention Hall tomorrow evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. The rumor that this is Dr. Muck's last season in America became fact on Thursday, when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that the German Emperor has insisted upon recalling his favorite conductor to Berlin at the end of the present season in Boston.

Coupled with regret at this announcement is gratification that Buffalo is to have this one opportunity for hearing the Boston men with their new leader. Dr. Muck is a wonderful musician and under his baton the Boston men have eclipsed even their own proud records of the past. Buffalo may well anticipate a musical feast.

Dr. Muck, accompanied by Mrs. Muck, will arrive here this evening; so will the librarian of the orchestra and Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is this season acting concertmeister in Boston while Willy ... is abroad. Mr. Wendling is a celebrated violinist and is in this country for only one season. He will be the soloist tomorrow night.

The programme announced by Dr. Muck for tomorrow night marks a distinct departure from the selections arranged for the ordinary orchestra concert in that it contains but three numbers, opening with the overture to Humperdinck's The Forced Marriage. This is an absolute novelty here. The overture was composed for the production of the opera in Munich in May, 1906, and was then played for the first time. It was performed at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, led by Mr. Nikisch, in November, 1906. When the opera was first produced there was no overture, only an orchestral introduction of about 25 measures, and convent bells were heard. The entire programme for tomorrow night reads:

Humperdinck Overture, The Forced Marriage (new)
Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219).
Beethoven, Symphony in F major, No. 6, opus 68, the Pastoral
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro, in tempo d' allegro.
Thunderstorm: tempest: Allegro.
Shepherds' song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Neal Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the special request that the audience tomorrow night assemble early. The concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. There must be complete silence in the hall.

The seat sale is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices range from 75 cents to $2.

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night, the regular Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic's third and last concert this season takes place on Monday evening, March 16th, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist.

JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O
JAN 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three interesting novelties will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the evening of Jan. 30, when this greatest of all American orchestras will give a concert in Memorial hall.

The program contains the Wallenstein trilogy, after the dramatic poem by Schiller, the MacDowell "Suite in A minor," and the "Espana" rhapsody by Chabrier. Though there are but three numbers on the program, the concert will be nearly two hours in length. Everyone is urged to be in his seat in good time, so that not a note of that wonderful "Wallenstein Trilogy" be missed.

WORLD
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 23 1908

...announced ... conductor ... will ... after the ...

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the ...
PRESS COLUMBUS, O.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert, which promises to be the most brilliant of the season, will take place in Memorial hall next Thursday evening. Most of the seats have been reserved, although a few are still left. If any one is counting on attending this concert, who has not secured seats, that matter had better be attended to at once. It begins to look now, as though Columbus is waking up to the fact that these musical events are well worth hearing. They are not intended for musicians alone, but for all who enjoy music. And in these columns, in fact in all music columns, only the finest musical attractions are mentioned, and any which are given especial prominence are sure to be excellent.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has for its leader Dr. Karl Muck, one of the most widely known musical directors of the present day. He belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a musician of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of doctor juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. In a word, in addition to being a great musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

To this end natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906 he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year. During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America was most unwillingly given and the negotiations, which last winter resulted in the extension of his leave, lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the kaiser.

Mrs. Muck confesses that she has no desire to return to Berlin, and that she has never been more content than during the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe college, and even seriously meditates going in for a degree, that is, if her husband finally decides to remain in Boston, after his present engagement, to continue as the conductor of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programs, is betwixt the devil and the deep sea. He is cursed if he presents novelties and he is cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact, that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played.

To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music, is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. De Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today, and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest music, the blame must be laid to the lack of creative genius.

The program which De Muck has decided to present his Columbus audience on Thursday contains the following selections, all entirely new to Columbus:

1. Vincent D'Tudy ..... "Wallenstein"
2. Edward MacDowell. .....
..... Suite, A minor, Op. 42
3. Ernest Charbrier..Rapsody, "Ispana"

The orchestra leaves Friday morning for Cincinnati, where two concerts will be given in Music hall, one Friday evening and the other Saturday evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...SUN
...COLUMBUS, O
...dress
...te JAN 26 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ever since Edward MacDowell, America's most distinguished composer, became the hopeless invalid he was, music-loving people of the whole world have been moved to pay him tardy honor in placing his splendid composition on programs in the best concerts given anywhere. When MacDowell was in a normal physical condition and longed for the place he knew he deserved, it was grudgingly given him. Recognition came quicker, however, in Europe than here at home.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play MacDowell's beautiful pastorale, "Suite in A Minor, Op 42," on Thursday evening at Memorial hall. The various diversions of this wonderful composition are complete in themselves, each separate one a tone-poem of exquisite beauty and form. The parts have names as follows: "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song," "Forest Spirits." The suite is said to be well-nigh illumined under Dr. Karl Muck's intelligent and discriminating direction.

...rk, 1...

...om SUN
...dress ...COLUMBUS, O
...te JAN 26 1908

BY EMMA FEELING.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, considered to be the most perfect orchestral body of musicians in the world, will give a concert at Memorial hall Thursday evening, January 30. The concerts by this orchestra have had a new interest by reason of the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on his second year's leave of absence from the Royal opera of that city, to be conductor of Boston's orchestra. This superb organization was formed in 1881 and having had in the 26 years of its existence some of the foremost conductors of the world, it has been brought to the highest point of perfection. With the splendid accoustics of Memorial hall, the orchestra will be heard at its best, and as the program promises much in interest, being entirely composed of novelties, the concert will be a remarkable event in our musical season.

The program:

D'Indy—"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12.
I. Wallenstein's Camp.
II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
III. The Death of Wallenstein.
MacDowell—Suite in A minor, Op. 24.
I. In a Haunted Forest.
II. Summer Idyl.
III. In October.
IV. The Shepherdess' Song.
V. Forest Spirits.
Chabriere—Rhapsody, "Espana."

Paul Marie Théodore Vincent D'Indy, the composer of the Wallenstein Trilogy, was born at Paris March 27, 1852. The first work of D'Indy, which was performed in Paris was the second part of this trilogy, on January 25, 1874. The work was begun in 1873-74 and finished about 1881, and serves as a preface and musical commentary to the dramas of Schiller. The first complete performance was March 4, 1888, at a Lamoureux concert. The following is Mr. Stanley F. Makower's translation of an "appreciation" by M. Hugues Imbert: "The distinguishing feature of the symphonic music of Vincent D'Indy is that it paints with forcible truth, marvelous vividness, and astonishing vigor the various episodes in the drama of Schiller. For instance, in the first part (Le Camp), after the slow valse, comes the savage dance, with its determined rhythm, the sermon of the Capuchin father given to the bassoon, the theme of Wallenstein energetically illustrated by the trombones, and then the final tumult, in which we hear a few notes of Wallenstein's theme thrown out by the trumpets amid the fortissimi of the orchestra. In this you will recognize the mastery of the musician who has approached very nearly to a musical translation of a scene crowded with movement. You will find not only the painting of events and acts, but the painting of the moral sentiments which animate the persons in the drama. Is there anything more exquisitely tender than the love episode between Max and Thekla (second part)? With what felicity do the two themes of the lovers unite and embrace each other; yet with what inevitability are the ideal transports of the happy pair stifled by the intervention of fate, whose fell design has been suggested in the brief introduction by the horns.

"The third and last episode is the death of Wallenstein. Very dramatic is the opening, in which strange chords, that recall the splendid sonority of the organ, characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny. The chords are the poetical rendering of this beautiful saying of Wallenstein in the Piccolomini (act II, scene 6). Yet the mysterious force which labors in the bowels of nature—the ladder of spirits that stretches from this world of dust up to the world of stars with a thousand ramifications, this ladder on which the heavenly powers mount and dismount, ever restless—the circles within circles that grow narrower and narrower as they approach the sun their center—all this can be beheld alone by the eyes of the heaven born joyous descendants of Zeus—those eyes from which the veil of blindness has fallen. After several episodes, an ascending progression of the basses brings back the complete statement of Wallenstein's theme in B major, which ends in a very widely constructed movement, in which the starry chords of the opening are reproduced, covering over with the wind instruments, while the quatuor winds its way rapidly in and out of them, and the trombones thunder out the fate-fraught songs. Soon calm is restored, and the sound dies away gradually in a long pianissimo of the stringed instruments."

The Edward A. MacDowell suite "In a Haunted Forest" is thoroughly characteristic, and represent the composer at his best.

The rhapsody "Espana" is by Alexis Emmanuel Chabrier, who was born at Ambert, France, on January 18, 1841, and died in Paris on September 15, 1894. Chabrier was known as a more and more brilliant light of the ultra-modern French school, especially noted for his technical skill in instrumentation and in making the most of his ideas. The "Espana" is very difficult, nearly every known instrument is ... to use ... often with

[125]

...DISPATCH.
From ...COLUMBUS, O
Address ...
JAN 23 1908

The Coming of the Boston Symphony

Columbus is again being admirably ... musically. A short time since the Damrosch ... chestra of New York appeared at Memorial hall ... gave a concert that was a delight to the most ... vated musical taste, and next Thursday evening, ... 30th inst., the famous Boston Symphony orches... conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Roy... Opera, is to give in the same hall one of its un... passed interpretations of the works of three leadi... composers, one American. A city that can attra... such organizations as these has a reputation for ... musical culture above the average, and we may well ... stop to inquire what has wrought this change in a ... few years and to give credit to the local agencies ... that have been instrumental in that work. The city ... has many musical organizations which have by per... sistent, self-sacrificing effort laid a foundation of ... love for the best in music; but it is, as usual, to the ... women that the greatest credit must be given for ... the recent opportunities to hear the best by the best ... interpreters. Their great club has wrought wonders ... and has made possible the popularly helpful use of ... the large auditorium provided in Memorial hall. It ... is only recently that musical entertainments which ... people have been accustomed to go long journeys to ... hear have been brought to our very doors. The ... credit for it all is not to be withheld, nor is the ... opportunity to be missed.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
From COLUMBUS, O
Address ...NEWARK, N.J
Date JAN 24 1908

The Boston Symphony.

The appearance here on January 30 of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the musical event of the year. This is the finest organization of the kind in the country—so recognized in all the centers of music. There is artistic music that is mechanical, faultless in every point of execution, but which does not reach the heart of the every-day lover of music. And there is artistic music that is so true in its expression of the soul's dreams and longings, that anyone can feel its gentle sway, even though he may not interpret every tone. He may not analyze it, but he can feel the force of its beauty. Such we understand is the Boston Symphony's music, and because it is an elevation, as well as a delight, we speak for it a good word.

...The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...om PRESS COLUMBUS O
...dress
...te ...6 1908

MEMORIAL HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves on its annual western tour today. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff 84 men, making in all close to one hundred men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

That Columbus is included among these five cities is something to be proud of, and the concert-goers should show their appreciation of the local managers' risk in bringing such an expensive organization to the city by their presence at the concert.

...om NEWS
...dress BALTIMORE, MD
...te JAN 25 1908

The next concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place on Feb...

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night, the usual rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus has been given up this week. The Philharmonic's third and last concert this season will be on Monday evening, March 16th, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

dress .....

A gala event indeed is the concert at Convention Hall tomorrow evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, conducting. The rumor that this is Dr. Muck's last season in America became fact on Thursday, when C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that the German Emperor has insisted upon recalling his favorite conductor to Berlin at the end of the present season in Boston. 188.

Coupled with regret at this announcement is gratification that Buffalo is to have this one opportunity for hearing the Boston men with their new leader. Dr. Muck is a wonderful musician and under his baton the Boston men have eclipsed even their own proud records of the past. Buffalo may well anticipate a musical feast.

Dr. Muck, accompanied by Mrs. Muck, will arrive here this evening; so will the librarian of the orchestra and Carl Wendling, concertmeister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is this season acting as concertmeister in Boston while Willy Hess is abroad. Mr. Wendling is a celebrated violinist and is in this country for only one season. He will be the soloist tomorrow night.

The programme announced by Dr. Muck for tomorrow night marks a distinct departure from the selections arranged for the ordinary orchestra concert in that it contains but three numbers, opening with the overture to Humperdinck's The Forced Marriage. This is an absolute novelty here. The overture was composed for the production of the opera in Munich in May, 1906, and was then played for the first time. It was performed at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, led by Mr. Nikisch, in November, 1906. When the opera was first produced there was no overture, only an orchestral introduction of about 25 measures, and convent bells were heard. The entire programme for tomorrow night reads:

Humperdinck Overture, The Forced Marriage (new)
Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra in A major, No. 5 (Kochel 219)
Beethoven, Symphony in F major, No. 6, opus 68, the Pastoral
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro, in tempo d' allegro.
Thunderstorm; tempest: Allegro.
Shepherds' song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mrs. Mal Davis Smith, local manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the special request that the audience tomorrow night assemble early. The concert will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock and no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. There must be complete silence in the hall.

The seat sale is now in progress at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices range from 75 cents to $2.

Because of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow night, the usual Monday rehearsal of the Philharmonic Chorus will be omitted this week. The Philharmonic's third and last concert this season takes place on Monday evening, March 16th, when Bonci, the great tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three interesting novelties will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the evening of Jan. 30, when this greatest of all American orchestras will give a concert in Memorial hall.

The program contains the Wallenstein Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, the MacDowell "Suite in A Minor" and the "Espana" rhapsody by Chairier. Though there are but three numbers on the program, the concert will be nearly two hours in length. Everyone is urged to be in his seat in good time, so that not a note of that wonderful "Wallenstein Trilogy" be missed.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—It was announced last night that Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will [illegible] with the orchestra after the [illegible] to his duties in

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert, which promises to be the most brilliant of the season, will take place in Memorial hall next Thursday evening. Most of the seats have been reserved, although a few are still left. If any one is counting on attending this concert, who has not secured seats, that matter had better be attended to at once. It begins to look now, as though Columbus is waking up to the fact that these musical events are well worth hearing. They are not intended for musicians alone, but for all who enjoy music. And in these columns, in fact in all music columns, only the finest musical attractions are mentioned, and any which are given especial prominence are sure to be excellent.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has for its leader Dr. Karl Muck, one of the most widely known musical directors of the present day. He belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a musician of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of doctor juris from the University of Leipsic. He is a man of great social finesse and adaptability. In a word, in addition to being a great musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

To this end natural aptitude has been helped by unusual conditions. For the fourteen years preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906 he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year. During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America was most unwillingly given and the negotiations, which last winter resulted in the extension of his leave, lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the kaiser.

Mrs. Muck confesses that she has no desire to return to Berlin, and that she has never been more content than during the time she has spent in Boston. Mrs. Muck has become so thorough a Bostonian that this winter she is attending several courses of lectures at Radcliffe college, and even seriously meditates going in for a degree, that is, if her husband finally decides to remain in Boston, after his present engagement, to continue as the conductor of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck becomes more certain each week that a conductor in making his concert programs, is betwixt the devil and the deep sea. He is cursed if he presents novelties and he is cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact, that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played.

To be sure, the concert-going public which is ever asking for new music, is unquestionably in the small minority, but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. De Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today, and frankly says that little of value is being written, and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer, but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest music, the blame must be laid to the lack of creative genius.

The program which De Muck has decided to present his Columbus audience on Thursday contains the following selections, all entirely new to Columbus:

1. Vincent D'Tudy.....“Wallenstein”
2. Edward MacDowell. .....
.....Suite, A minor, Op. 42
3. Ernest Charbrier..Rapsody, “Ispana”

The orchestra leaves Friday morning for Cincinnati, where two concerts will be given in Music hall, one Friday evening and the other Saturday evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ..... SUN

dress ..... COLUMBUS, O.

ate ..... JAN 26 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ever since Edward MacDowell 1. America's most distinguished composer, became the hopeless invalid he was, music-loving people of the whole world have been moved to pay him tardy honor in placing his splendid composition on programs in the best concerts given anywhere. When MacDowell was in a normal physical condition and longed for the place he knew he deserved, it was grudgingly given him. Recognition came quicker, however, in Europe than here at home.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play MacDowell's beautiful pastorale, "Suite in A Minor, Op 42," on Thursday evening at Memorial hall. The various diversions of this wonderful composition are complete in themselves, each separate one a tone-poem of exquisite beauty and form. The parts have names as follows: "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song," "Forest Spirits." The suite is said to be well-nigh illumined under Dr. Karl Muck's intelligent and discriminating direction.

[125]

om ..... SUN

dress ..... COLUMBUS, O.

ate ..... JAN 26 1908

By EMMA EBELING.

The Boston Symphony orchestra considered to be the most perfect orchestral body of musicians in the world, will give a concert at Memorial hall Thursday evening, January 30. The concerts by this orchestra 18. have had a new interest by reason of the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on his second year's leave of absence from the Royal opera of that city, to be conductor of Boston's orchestra. This superb organization was formed in 1881 and having had in the 26 years of its existence some of the foremost conductors of the world, it has been brought to the highest point of perfection. With the splendid accoustics of Memorial hall, the orchestra will be heard at its best, and as the program promises much in interest, being entirely composed of novelties, the concert will be a remarkable event in our musical season.

The program:

D'Indy—“Wallenstein,” Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12.
I. Wallenstein's Camp.
II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
III. The Death of Wallenstein.
MacDowell—Suite in A minor, Op. 24.
I. In a Haunted Forest.
II. Summer Idyl.
III. In October.
IV. The Shepherdess' Song.
V. Forest Spirits.
Chabriere—Rhapsody, “Espana.”

Paul Marie Theodore Vincent D'Indy, the composer of the Wallenstein Trilogy, was born at Paris March 27, 1852. The first work of D'Indy, which was performed in Paris was the second part of this trilogy, on January 25, 1874. The work was begun in 1873-74 and finished about 1881, and serves as a preface and musical commentary to the dramas of Schiller. The first complete performance was March 4, 1888, at a Lamoureux concert. The following is Mr. Stanley F. Makower's translation of an “appreciation” by M. Hugues Imbert: “The distinguishing feature of the symphonic music of Vincent D'Indy is that it paints with forcible truth, marvelous vividness, and astonishing vigor the various episodes in the drama of Schiller. For instance, in the first part (Le Camp), after the slow valse, comes the savage dance, with its determined rhythm, the sermon of the Capuchin father given to the bassoon, the theme of Wallenstein energetically illustrated by the trombones, and then the final tumult, in which we hear a few notes of Wallenstein's theme thrown out by the trumpets amid the fortissimi of the orchestra. In this you will recognize the mastery of the musician who has approached very nearly to a musical translation of a scene crowded with movement. You will find not only the painting of events and acts, but the painting of the moral sentiments which animate the persons in the drama. Is there anything more exquisitely tender than the love episode between Max and Thekla (second part)? With what felicity do the two themes of the lovers unite and embrace each other; yet with what inevitability are the ideal transports of the happy pair stifled by the intervention of fate, whose fell design has been suggested in the brief introduction by the horns.

“The third and last episode is the death of Wallenstein. Very dramatic is the opening, in which strange chords, that recall the splendid sonority of the organ, characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny. The chords are the poetical rendering of this beautiful saying of Wallenstein in the Piccolomini (act II, scene 6). Yet the mysterious force which labors in the bowels of nature—the ladder of spirits that stretches from this world of dust up to the world of stars with a thousand ramifications, this ladder on which the heavenly powers mount and dismount, ever restless—the circles within circles that grow narrower and narrower as they approach the sun their center—all this can be beheld alone by the eyes of the heaven born joyous descendants of Zeus—those eyes from which the veil of blindness has fallen. After several episodes, an ascending progression of the basses brings back the complete statement of Wallenstein's theme in B major, which ends in a very widely constructed movement, in which the starry chords of the opening are reproduced, covering over with the wind instruments, while the quatuor winds its way rapidly in and out of them, and the trombones thunder out the fate-fraught songs. Soon calm is restored, and the sound dies away gradually in a long pianissimo of the stringed instruments.”

The Edward A. McDowell suite “In a Haunted Forest” is thoroughly characteristic, and represent the composer at his best.

The rhapsody “Espana” is by Alexis Emmanuel Chabrier, who was born at Ambert, France, on January 18, 1841, and died in Paris on September 15, 1894. Chabrier was known as a more and more brilliant light of the ultra-modern French school, especially noted for his technical skill in instrumentation and in making the most of his ideas. The “Espana” is very difficult; nearly every known instrument is brought into use and often with wonderful effect. It was originally [illegible] it was scored for orchestra the composer was in doubt if it could be played; but Lamoureux and his orchestra, at the Chauteau d'Eau, mastered it and then it was taken up throughout the world.

This concert will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and the doors will be closed during the entire number, so it will be well for every one to be in their seats by 8 o'clock. The seat sale will be held at the Wilkin-Redman company, 97 North High street, beginning Monday, January 27.

From ..... DISPATCH.

Address ..... COLUMBUS, O.

JAN 23 1908

The Coming of the Boston Symphony

Columbus is again being admirably served musically. A short time since the Damrosch orchestra of New York appeared at Memorial hall and gave a concert that was a delight to the most cultivated musical taste, and next Thursday evening, the 30th inst., the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, is to give in the same hall one of its unsurpassed interpretations of the works of three leading composers, one American. A city that can attract such organizations as these has a reputation for musical culture above the average, and we may well stop to inquire what has wrought this change in a few years and to give credit to the local agencies that have been instrumental in that work. The city has many musical organizations which have by persistent, self-sacrificing effort laid a foundation of love for the best in music; but it is, as usual, to the women that the greatest credit must be given for the recent opportunities to hear the best by the best interpreters. Their great club has wrought wonders and has made possible the popularly helpful use of the large auditorium provided in Memorial hall. It is only recently that musical entertainments which people have been accustomed to go long journeys to hear have been brought to our very doors. The credit for it all is not to be withheld, nor is the opportunity to be missed.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony.

The appearance here on January 30 of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the musical event of the year. This is the finest organization of the kind in the country—so recognized in all the centers of music. There is artistic music that is mechanical, faultless in every point of execution, but which does not reach the heart of the every-day lover of music. And there is artistic music that is so true in its expression of the soul's dreams and longings, that anyone can feel its gentle sway, even though he may not interpret every tone. He may not analyze it, but he can feel the force of its beauty. Such we understand is the Boston Symphony's music, and because it is an elevation, as well as a delight, we speak for it a good word.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

MEMORIAL HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra leaves on its annual western tour today. 18. It will take in addition to the conductor and business staff 84 men, making in all close to one hundred men. The first concert will be given in Buffalo, the second in Detroit, the third in Indianapolis, the fourth in Columbus, and the fifth and sixth in Cincinnati, where it plays Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

That Columbus is included among these five cities is something to be proud of, and the concert-goers should show their appreciation of the local managers' risk in bringing such an expensive organization to the city by their presence at the concert.

om .....

dress .....

te .....

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on February 19.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 26 1908

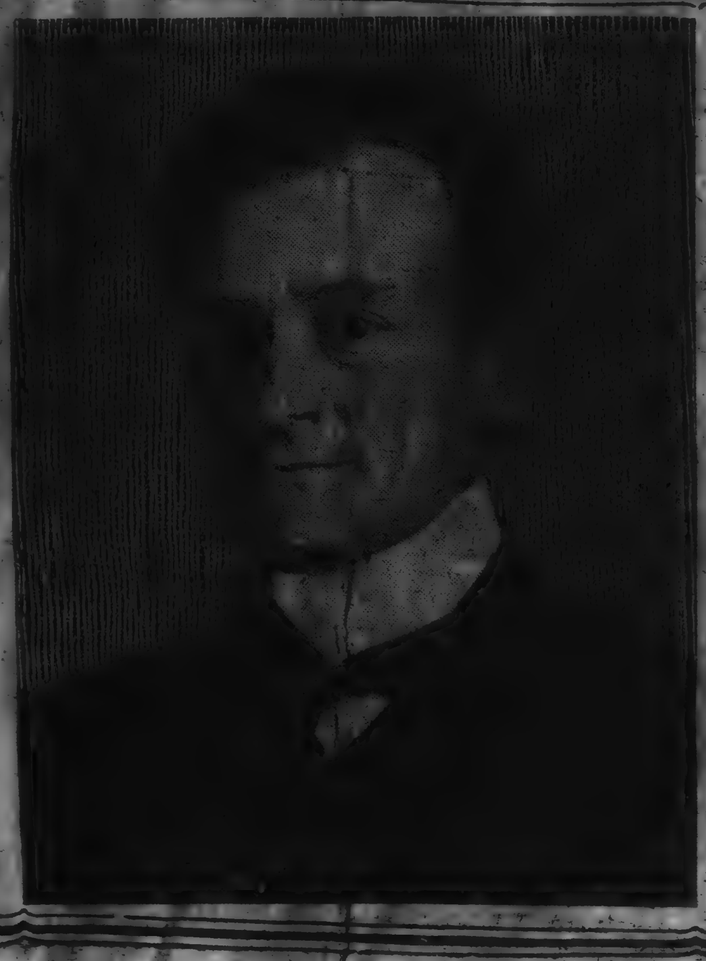
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is one of the greatest orchestras in the world. Probably this will be the last chance ever to hear it under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The orchestra makes only a short visit to the west. It is maintained and exists practically for Boston alone, and is heavily endowed otherwise even in so great a city as Boston, its high artistic superiority could not be maintained.—Indianapolis News.

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CINCINNATI, OHIO
JAN 26 1908

With the Musicians.

CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.



DR. KARL MUCK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will play the next concerts of the series under the auspices of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association at Music Hall next Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

The programmes have been chosen in a manner to present the classical and the modern spirit of musical composition. The programme for Friday afternoon will be:

Concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments.....Handel
Pomposo, Allegro, A tempo ordinario, Largo, Allegro.
"Three German Dances".....Mozart
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann

Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.....Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country, allegro ma non troppo. Scene by the brookside, andante molto moto. Jolly gathering of the country folk, allegro, in tempo d'allegro. Thunder-storm, tempest, allegro. Shepherd's song, gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm, allegretto.

SATURDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, Op. 73.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo. Adagio non troppo. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino. Allegro con spirito.
"Carneval".....Dvorak
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Richard Strauss
Rhapsody—"Espana".....Chambrier

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably the most perfect organization of its kind in this country and perhaps in Europe. In the home city the furore which the concerts excite is quite as great as anything encountered on the all too brief road tours which the orchestra occasionally makes. Sold out is the rule and not the exception in Boston and the commercial managers venture in no manner figures—the founder, Mr. Higginson, who endowed this remarkable band a possible certainty. In addition to the large force the orchestra has on its pay-roll ninety-eight musicians, besides the conductor. Dr. Muck, the incumbent of that important position, is entirely remarkable in more ways than one.

If a man of small stature gives from the stage of a theater or concert hall a universal impression of height it is a safe presumption that he possesses in an uncommon degree that mysterious and undefinable quality known as personal magnetism. One of the most amusing features of all the descriptions of Dr. Muck which followed his first appearances with the Boston Orchestra last season was the ever present comment concerning his height. He was described as over middle height, or tall or very tall, to those who only saw him standing before the orchestra; yet as a matter of fact he is rather below middle height, but so slenderly and gracefully built and of such commanding and authoritative presence that this deception was an easy one. Such also are the qualities of mind, temperament and character that wherever he may be Dr. Muck is sure to be the center of interest.

STAR,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 23 1908

Music lovers are looking forward with pleasure to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Caleb Mills Hall next Wednesday evening. Each and every musician is an artist, as has been the rule with players associated with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor. Wendling and Czerwonky, violinists, are in this country for the first time. Other notable artists among the first violins are Roth, Kunz, Hoffmann, Krafft, Theodorowics and Ribarsch. Barleben, the leader of the second violins, has been soloist with the orchestra in Boston, and was the first to play in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's concerto. Rennert, another second violin, came to Boston from Leipsic last fall, where he was leading viola and assistant conductor of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra. Ferir, the leading viola, has been with the orchestra several years. In the cellos are such artists as Warnke, Loeffler, Barth and Keller.

Seats will be on sale at the box office Monday. In the meantime Mrs. Talbot is meeting the

CINCINNATI, OHIO
JAN 26 1908

Symphony Orchestra will give at Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be considered by lovers of orchestral music as the most important events of the season. The Boston Orchestra is as nearly perfect from a technical standpoint as money and intelligence can make it. The origin of this splendid band cannot be without interest to those who propose to attend the concerts on Friday and Saturday. It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown in a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well-known Boston banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co. The announcement read in part thus:

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at the lowest prices such as may be found in all large European cities or even in the smaller centers of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours is necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent on musicians whose work and time is largely pledged elsewhere. To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual, inasmuch as it is independent of societies and clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to existing musical organizations."

The communication then stated the number of musicians to be employed and the name of the conductor, George Henschel. Prices of tickets and dates of concerts were also announced. The great service which the Boston Orchestra, thus generously rendered permanent, has performed for this country has been the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music.

The programs prepared for the Cincinnati concerts of the Boston Orchestra include two distinct styles of music. The afternoon will be a concert of strictly classical offerings the evening of the modern school.

Friday Afternoon—Handel, concerto in F major for strings and two wind instrments; Mozart, three German dances (K. 605) Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Beethoven, symphony in F major No. 6, "Pastoral." Saturday Evening—Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73; Dvorak, "Carneval;" Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

STAR,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 26 1908

Brahms's Second Symphony Lighter

Presents Marked Contrast to Philosophical Thought of the First.

In marked contrast to the First Symphony by the same composer, the Second Symphony of Brahms, to be given at Caleb Mills Hall Wednesday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, is light, vivacious and fanciful. Naturally this contrast has prompted radical differences of opinion among critics regarding the respective merits of the two.

To the Viennese the Second is perfect, reflecting, as one writer has said it does, "the fresh, healthy life to be found only in Vienna." To the Leipsicers the First is much more satisfactory, the prettiness of the Second failing to satisfy them. They ask something more from Brahms when he comes to them as a symphonist.

"The character of the Second Symphony," writes the Critic Hanslick, "may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to meditative seriousness. The first movement begins with a mellow and dusky horn theme. The symphony has something of the nature of the serenade and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale. The first movement immerses us in a wave of clear melody, upon which we rest, swayed, refreshed. The last fifty measures expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing adagio follows. The scherzo is thoroughly delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto, which flashes, spark-like, for a moment. The finale is more vivacious, but always agreeable in its golden serenity, and is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartean blood flows in its veins.

"This symphony is a contrast rather than a companion to the First, and this it appears to the public. The hearer is affected by the First as though he read a scientific treatise full of deep, philosophical thought and mysterious perspectives. The inclination of Brahms to cover up or do away with whatever might look like an 'effect' is carried to squeamishness in the First symphony. The hearers can not possibly grasp all the motives or divisions of motives, which, however, slumber there as flowers beneath the snow or float as distant points of light beyond the clouds. It is true that this Second Symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the First. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the First, and one that is not to be underestimated."

The "Carnival" overture of Dvorak is to follow the symphony Wednesday evening. The soloist of the concert is to be Heinrich Warnke, violoncellist. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulespiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form for Full Orchestra," Op. 28, will be the closing number.

The sale of seats for this second visit of the orchestra is in charge of Ona B. Talbot, and will open at the Big Four office tomorrow morning.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 24 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be considered by lovers of orchestral music as the most important events of the season. The Boston Orchestra is as nearly perfect from a technical standpoint as money and intelligence can make it. The origin of this splendid band cannot be without interest to those who propose to attend the concerts on Friday and Saturday. It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown in a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well-known Boston banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co. The announcement read in part thus:

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at the lowest prices such as may be found in all large European cities or even in the smaller centers of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours is necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent on musicians whose work and time is largely pledged elsewhere. To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual, inasmuch as it is independent of societies and clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to existing musical organizations."

The communication then stated the number of musicians to be employed and the name of the conductor, George Henschel. Prices of tickets and dates of concerts were also announced. The great service which the Boston Orchestra, thus generously rendered permanent, has performed for this country has been the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music.

The programs prepared for the Cincinnati concerts of the Boston Orchestra include two distinct styles of music. The afternoon will be a concert of strictly classical offerings the evening of the modern school.

Friday Afternoon—Handel, concerto in F major for strings and two wind instrments; Mozart, three German dances (K. 605) Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Beethoven, symphony in F major No. 6, "Pastoral." Saturday Evening—Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73; Dvorak, "Carneval;" Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 24 1908

Dr. Muck Will Return to Germany.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to lose its able director, Dr. Karl Muck, at the end of the present season, as the time for which he was borrowed from the Emperor of Germany expires with this, his second year in America. It is not yet known who his successor will be.

AMERICAN,
JAN 2[illegible] 1908

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here may go in for a degree.

Orchestra Conductor Coming Soon

DR. CARL MUCK.

STAR,
NEWARK, N.J.
JAN 30 1908

Kreisler returned to New York on Tuesday from New Orleans, where he gave two concerts last week. On Tuesday he played in Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney's musical and on next Sunday he is the principal attraction at the musical to be given by Mrs. Vanderbilt. Following his recital in New York on Saturday afternoon, February 15, Kreisler will be the soloist on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in [illegible] Brooklyn [illegible] region [illegible] will [illegible] tour.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DISP

ss

1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is one of the greatest orchestras in the world. Probably this will be the last chance ever to hear it under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The orchestra makes only a short visit to the west. It is maintained and exists practically for Boston alone, and is heavily endowed otherwise even in so great a city as Boston, its high artistic superiority could not be maintained.—Indianapolis News.

CABLE ADDRESS. "EIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

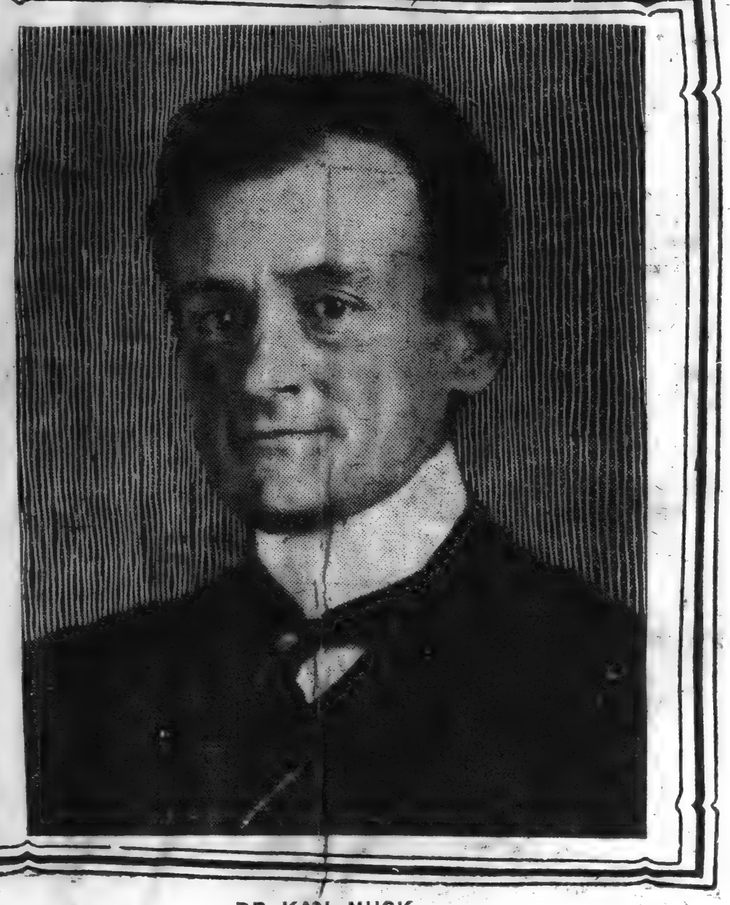
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

JAN 25 1908

With the Musicians.

CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.



DR. KARL MUCK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will play the next concerts of the series under the auspices of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Association at Music Hall next Friday afternoon, January 31, and Saturday evening, February 1.

The programmes have been chosen in a manner to present the classical and the modern spirit of musical composition. The programme for Friday afternoon will be:

Concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments.....Handel
Pomposo, Allegro, A tempo ordinario, Largo, Allegro.
"Three German Dances".....Mozart
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann

Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.....Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country, allegro ma non troppo. Scene by the brookside, andante molto moto. Jolly gathering of the country folk, allegro, in tempo d'allegro. Thunder storm, tempest, allegro. Shepherd's song, gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm, allegretto.

SATURDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, Op. 73.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo. Adagio non troppo. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino. Allegro con spirito.
"Carnevel".....Dvorak
"Till Euenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Richard Strauss
Rhapsody—"Espana".....Chambrier

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably the most perfect organization of its kind in this country and perhaps in Europe. In the home city the furore which the concerts excite is quite as great as anything encountered on the all too brief road tours which the orchestra occasionally makes. Selling out is the rule and not the exception in Boston and the commercial side of the venture in no manner figures with the founder, Mr. Higginson, who has made this remarkable band a possibility, or rather a certainty. In addition to a large administrative force the orchestra has on its pay-roll ninety-eight musicians besides the conductor. Dr. Muck, the incumbent of that important position, is entirely remarkable in more ways than one.

If a man of small stature gives from the stage of a theater or concert hall a universal impression of height it is a safe presumption that he possesses in an uncommon degree that mysterious and undefinable quality known as personal magnetism. One of the most amusing features of all the descriptions of Dr. Muck which followed his first appearances with the Boston Orchestra last season was the ever present comment concerning his height. He was described as over middle height, or tall or very tall, to those who only saw him standing before the orchestra; yet as a matter of fact he is rather below middle height, but so slenderly and gracefully built and of such commanding and authoritative presence that this deception was an easy one. Such also are the qualities of mind, temperament and character that wherever he may be Dr. Muck is sure to be the center of interest.

Cincinnati audience list-

JAN 23 1908

Music lovers are looking forward with pleasure to the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Caleb Mills Hall next Wednesday evening. Each and every musician is an artist, as has been the rule with players associated with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor. Wendling and Czerwonky, violinists, are in this country for the first time. Other notable artists among the first violins are Roth, Kunz, Hoffmann, Krafft, Theodorowics and Ribarsch. Barleben, the leader of the second violins, has been soloist with the orchestra in Boston, and was the first to play in Boston the whole of Tschaikowsky's concerto. Rennert, another second violin, came to Boston from Leipsic last fall, where he was leading viola and assistant conductor of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra. Ferir, the leading viola, has been with the orchestra several years. In the cellos are such artists as Warnke, Loeffler, Barth and Keller.

Seats will be on sale at the box office Monday. In the meantime Mrs. Talbot is meeting the [illegible] and by mail.

The two concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Music Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be considered by lovers of orchestral music as the most important events of the season. The Boston Orchestra is as nearly perfect from a technical standpoint as money and intelligence can make it. The origin of this splendid band cannot be without interest to those who propose to attend the concerts on Friday and Saturday. It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown in a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well-known Boston banking firm of Lee Higginson & Co. The announcement read in part thus:

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at the lowest prices, such as may be found in all large European cities or even in the smaller centers of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours is necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent on musicians whose work and time is largely pledged elsewhere. To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual, inasmuch as it is independent of societies and clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to existing musical organizations."

The communication then stated the number of musicians to be employed and the name of the conductor, George Henschel. Prices of tickets and dates of concerts were also announced. The great service which the Boston Orchestra, thus generously rendered permanent, has performed for this country has been the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music.

The programs prepared for the Cincinnati concerts of the Boston Orchestra include two distinct styles of music. The afternoon will be a concert of strictly classical offerings the evening of the modern school.

Friday Afternoon—Handel, concerto in F. major for strings and two wind instrments; Mozart, three German dances (K. 605) Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81; Beethoven, symphony in F major No. 6, "Pastoral." Saturday Evening—Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73; Dvorak, "Carneval;" Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

STAR

[illegible] IS, IND

JAN 26 1908

Brahms's Second Symphony Lighter

Presents Marked Contrast to Philosophical Thought of the First.

In marked contrast to the First Symphony by the same composer, the Second Symphony of Brahms, to be given at Caleb Mills Hall Wednesday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, is light, vivacious and fanciful. Naturally this contrast has prompted radical differences of opinion among critics regarding the respective merits of the two.

To the Viennese the Second is perfect, reflecting, as one writer has said it does, "the fresh, healthy life to be found only in Vienna." To the Leipsicers the First is much more satisfactory, the prettiness of the Second failing to satisfy them. They ask something more from Brahms when he comes to them as a symphonist.

"The character of the Second Symphony," writes the Critic Hanslick, "may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to meditative seriousness. The first movement begins with a mellow and dusky horn theme. The symphony has something of the nature of the serenade and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale. The first movement immerses us in a wave of clear melody, upon which we rest, swayed, refreshed. The last fifty measures expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing adagio follows. The scherzo is thoroughly delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto, which flashes, spark-like, for a moment. The finale is more vivacious, but always agreeable in its golden serenity, and is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartean blood flows in its veins.

"This symphony is a contrast rather than a companion to the First, and this it appears to the public. The hearer is affected by the First as though he read a scientific treatise full of deep, philosophical thought and mysterious perspectives. The inclination of Brahms to cover up or do away with whatever might look like an 'effect' is carried to squeamishness in the First symphony. The hearers can not possibly grasp all the motives or divisions of motives, which, however, slumber there as flowers beneath the snow or float as distant points of light beyond the clouds. It is true that this Second Symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the First. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the First, and one that is not to be underestimated."

The "Carnival" overture of Dvorak is to follow the symphony Wednesday evening. The soloist of the concert is to be Heinrich Warnke, violoncellist. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulespiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form for Full Orchestra," Op. 28, will be the closing number.

The sale of seats for this second visit of the orchestra is in charge of Ona B. Talbot, and will open at the Big Four office tomorrow morning.

[26]

ss

1908

Indianapolis is to be favored with another opportunity to hear the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the greatest orchestras in the world. Probably this will be the last chance ever to hear it under the leadership of Dr. Muck. The orchestra makes only a short visit to the West. It is maintained and exists practically for Boston alone, and is heavily endowed otherwise even in so great a city as Boston its high artistic superiority could not be maintained. Indianapolis is especially privileged in being one of the few cities that this great organization visits. The attempt of a few recent comers to Indianapolis to make our people believe that excessive prices are charged for orchestral concerts here, is altogether silly, and to be reprehended. The surprising thing rather is that the great orchestras can afford to come here at any price. As it is, no higher prices are charged than are asked for theatrical performances of the great actors whose companies are much less costly to maintain. The Boston Symphony should be greeted by an overflowing house.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

3

Dr. Muck Will Return to Germany.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to lose its able director, Dr. Karl Muck, at the end of the present season, as the time for which he was borrowed from the Emperor of Germany expires with this, his second year in America. It is not yet known who his successor will be.

s

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here may go in for a degree.

Orchestra Conductor Coming Soon.

DR. CARL MUCK.

JAN 30 1908

Kreisler returned to New York on Tuesday from New Orleans, where he gave two concerts last week. On Tuesday he played in Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney's musical and on next Sunday he is the principal attraction at the musical to be given by Mrs. Vanderbilt. Following his recital in New York on Saturday afternoon, February 15, Kreisler will be the soloist on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in New York, Brooklyn, Washington and Philadelphia, after which he will immediately start on his Pacific coast tour, where he will give twenty concerts.

...WS
...POLIS, IND.
JAN 25 1908

SECOND SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS IS VIVACIOUS

CHARACTER OF WORK TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

CONTRAST WITH THE FIRST

Persons who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, in Indianapolis, last season, give the finely worked-out performance of the first symphony of Brahms, and decided that the symphony, from their viewpoint, was cryptic, are likely to be amazed at the contrast afforded by the performance of the Second symphony of the same composer by the same orchestra, in Caleb Mills Hall, next Wednesday night. Dr. Muck is eager to do as much as he can to further understanding and affection in this country for the music of Brahms. When the Second symphony was performed at Vienna, December 30, 1877, it was much more warmly received than the First. "It was of a more attractive character, more understandable, than the First," writes a critic. "It was to be preferred also because this time Brahms had not entered the lists with Beethoven. The work might, appropriately, be termed 'the Vienna symphony,' reflecting, as it did, 'the fresh, healthy life to be found only in beautiful Vienna.'"

Fanciful, Vivacious, Melodious.

The light, fanciful, vivacious, melodious character of the Second angered the Leipsicers when they came to hear it for the first time. Deerffel, who cordially admired Brahms, was angry from disappointment. "The Viennese are much more easily satisfied than we," he wrote. "We make quite different demands on Brahms and require from him music that is something more than pretty, and very pretty, when he comes before us as a symphonist." That is to say, Brahms was here more musical than philosophic. "He let himself go." The great critic, Hanslick, a enemy of the Wagner movement and champion of Brahms, wrote enthusiastically of the Second symphony, and his criticism is an interesting note on that historic conflict, of which only a rumbling now is heard, since the world accepts both Wagner and Brahms as composers of wonderful music in different styles.

"It is well known," said Hanslick, "that Wagner and his followers go so far as not only to deny the possibility of anything new in the symphonic form—that is, new after Beethoven—but they reject the very right of absolute instrumental music to exist. The symphony, they say, is now superfluous since Wagner has transplanted it to opera; only Liszt's symphonic poems in one movement and with a determined poetical program, have, in the contemplation of the modern musical world, any vitality. Now, if such absurd theories, which are framed solely for Wagner-Liszt household use, again need refutation, there can be no more complete and brilliant refutation than the long row of Brahms's instrumental works, and especially this Second Symphony.

Character of the Second Symphony.

"The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to meditative seriousness. The first movement begins with a mellow and dusky horn theme. The symphony has something of the nature of the serenade and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale. The first movement immerses us in a wave of clear melody, upon which we rest, swayed, refreshed. The last fifty measures expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing adagio follows. The scherzo is thoroughly delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto, which flashes, spark-like, for a moment. The finale is more vivacious but always agreeable in its golden serenity, and is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartean blood flows in its veins.

"This symphony is a contrast rather than a companion to the First, and this it appears to the public. The hearer is affected by the First as though he read a scientific treatise full of deep, philosophical thought and mysterious perspectives. The inclination of Brahms to cover up or do away with whatever might look like an 'effect' is carried to squeamishness in the First symphony. The hearer can not possibly grasp all the motives or divisions of motives, which, however, slumber there as flowers beneath the snow or float as distant points of light beyond the clouds. It is true that this Second symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the First. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the first, and one that is not to be underestimated.

Tendency to Conceal Suppressed.

"Brahms has this time, fortunately, repressed his noble but dangerous inclination to conceal his ideas under a web of polyphony, or to cover them with lines of contrapuntal intersection, and if the thematic development of the Second symphonies remarkable than that in the First, the themes themselves seem more flowing, more spontaneous, and their development seems more natural, more pellucid and therefore more effective. We can not proclaim too loudly our joy that Brahms, who he had given intense expression in First symphony to Faust-like conflicts soul, has now in his Second returned to earth—the earth that laughs and blossoms in the vernal months."

After the symphony next Wednesday evening there will be an intermission of fifteen minutes and then will follow the striking "Carnival" overture of Dvorak. The soloist of the concert is to be Heinrich Warnke, the violoncellist, and on this occasion, so far as available records go, a new concert piece for cello and orchestra by Dohnanyi will be performed for the first time in this country. The closing number will be the immense, brilliant [illegible] Richard Strauss, "Till [illegible] Pranks, After the Manner—in Rondo [illegible] Op. 28.

[illegible]rance

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

DR. KARL MUCK, OF BERLIN.

His appearance in Indianapolis with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Wednesday night will be the last in this city unless there is radical change of plan enabling him to remain longer in America.

are eighty players, and Dr. Muck, is under the direction of Ona B. Talbot. The box office sale of seats will open at the Big Four office next Monday morning. Unless there is a radical change of plan this will be Dr. Muck's last appearance here. He is under contract to Emperor William of Germany, as a conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and is in this country on leave of absence granted at his request and at that of Mr. Higginson, the financial sponsor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and others influential in the administration of the affairs of Harvard University.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 1, 1908

Concerts Next Week

Again Dr. Muck has put the music of an American composer on his programmes, and at the fourteenth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chadwick's three "Symphonic Sketches" will be played, and hitherto only fragments of them have been heard here. They run in four parts, and each part has a motto that presumably hints at a programme. The first part is entitled "Jubilee," and in the score are found the following verses:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

D. R.

The second part is entitled "Noël," and it has the following motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel-hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third part is entitled "Hobgoblin," and in it the composer has sought to express the feeling of the following line: "That Shrewd and Knavish Spirit Called Robin Goodfellow," and the fourth is called a "Vagrom Ballad," and is prefaced by this verse:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirsty days" to come.

The other orchestral number is Goldmark's graceful overture for a band of virtuosi, "In Springtime." For the rest a distinguished singer from one or the other opera house in New York will appear, but complications over her engagement prevent for the moment the announcement of the name. May we wager a two-cent piece, if there are any, that it will be Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Coming Concerts

Sunday evening, Feb. 9, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the increase of its pension fund. The programme, drawn wholly from Wagner, comprises the overtures to the "Flying Dutchman" and to "Tannhäuser"; the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Parsifal"; Siegfried's Apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung," and Erda's warning to Wotan from "Das Rheingold," and Waltraute's narrative to Brünnhilde of the doomed gods from "Götterdämmerung," both sung by Mme. Schumann-Heink.

HERALD—BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 2, 1908.

MUSIC NOTES.

Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House will sing at the Symphony concerts this week. She will probably sing an air from "The Trojans" of Berlioz and the familiar air from Gluck's "Orpheus." Miss Gerville-Reache made her debut at the Opera Comique, Paris, in 1900, in the latter opera. She sang here a few weeks ago with marker success at one of Mrs. McAllister's morning concerts.

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Sunday evening, the 9th, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck will conduct, and Mme. Schumann-Heink has kindly volunteered her services. This will probably be the last opportunity for those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts to hear the orchestra under Dr. Muck. Moreover, it is probably the last opportunity any one will have to hear the orchestra play Wagner's music under Dr. Muck, for it is well known by this time that he objects to Wagner's music in concert form, and it is a concession on his part to allow Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing excerpts from the "Ring." The programme will include the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhaeuser," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "The Rhinegold" and Waltraute's scene from "Dusk of the Gods."

GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 2. 1908.

The Symphony orchestra pension fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony hall next Sunday evening, will be the second and last of the season. The reason that the two concerts have come so closely together instead of at the beginning and end of the season as is usually the custom, is that the orchestra has had to take advantage of the open time of the artists who have so kindly volunteered their services as soloists.

Mr Paderewski could give only the time he had during the holidays, and Mme Schumann-Heink found that next Sunday was the only available open date that she had. A more than usual amount of sentiment is invested in this concert, because it will be the last opportunity those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under Dr Muck.

The first part of the program will comprise the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser." The second part will have Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers, "Erde" scene from the last scene of the "Rheingold" and "Waltraute" scene from the prologue to "The Dusk of the Gods." The final section of the program comprises the funeral music from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

...per Cutting Bureau
STAR,
NEWARK, N.J.
JAN 27 1908

During the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from January 26 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two, in Buffalo this evening and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening. In Buffalo Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concerto for 'cello and orchestra by a distinguished Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo Beckar.

POST. FEBRUARY 2. 1908

The programme of the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert, which takes place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Mr. George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," which will be given for the first time in [illegible]tirety at these concerts, and Goldmark's glowing overture, "In the Spring." The name of the soloist, who will be a singer, has yet to be announced, owing to unexpected complications in the matter of dates. The "Symphonic Sketches" are in four movements, following freely the symphonic form. Each section has a motto.

I. "JUBILEE."

No cold gray tones for me;
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

II. "NOEL."

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.

III. "HOBGOBLIN."

That shrewd and knavish spirit called Robin Goodfellow.

IV. "A VAGROM BALLAD."

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum;
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirsty days" to come.

DATES AHEAD

The Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, Feb. 9, will be the second and last of the season. The fact that the orchestra has had to take advantage of the dates at the disposal of the artists who have so kindly volunteered their services as soloists is responsible for the two concerts coming so closely together. Mr. Paderewski could give only the time he had during the holidays; Mme. Schumann-Heink found that next Sunday was her only available opportunity to arrive here in time. She will make a hasty trip from Pittsburg, where she appears with the Pittsburg Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

A more than usual amount of sentiment is invested in this concert, for it will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction. Moreover, it is probable that it will be the last opportunity anyone will have to hear the orchestra play Wagner under Dr. Muck, it being known that he objects to Wagner in concert form.

The first part of the programme will include the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser." In the second part Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erde" scene from the "Rheingold," in which the all-wise woman entreats Wotan to return the ring to Fafner and Fasolt, and "Waltraute" narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods," when the Walkyr relates to Brunhilde the approaching downfall of the Walhalla. The final section of the programme consists of the funeral music from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

[illegible] the season by the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 10, at 8:15 o'clock. Alberic Magnard's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano has already been played by the club, and is repeated by request. The second number will be a trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon by Mozart. The third will be Arthur Bird's Suite in D major for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and two bassoons. This will be the first performance of the latter work in Boston.

From all sides come expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, though the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question last December of having this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the manager of the orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck, though anxious to stay, justly remarked that he had given the Kaiser a promise, and a year's time he could not good [illegible] ask for an extension of [illegible]

NEWS
INDIANA, IND.
JAN 2[illegible] 1908

SECOND SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS IS VIVACIOUS

CHARACTER OF WORK TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

CONTRAST WITH THE FIRST

Persons who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, in Indianapolis, last season, give the finely worked-out performance of the first symphony of Brahms, and decided that the symphony, from their viewpoint, was cryptic, are likely to be amazed at the contrast afforded by the performance of the Second symphony of the same composer, by the same orchestra, in Caleb Mills Hall, next Wednesday night. Dr. Muck is eager to do as much as he can to further understanding and affection in this country for the music of Brahms. When the Second symphony was performed at Vienna, December 30, 1877, it was much more warmly received than the First. "It was of a more attractive character, more understandable, than the First," writes a critic. "It was to be preferred also because this time Brahms had not entered the lists with Beethoven. The work might, appropriately, be termed 'the Vienna symphony,' reflecting, as it did, 'the fresh, healthy life to be found only in beautiful Vienna.'"

Fanciful, Vivacious, Melodious.

The light, fanciful, vivacious, melodious character of the Second angered the Leipsicers when they came to hear it for the first time. Deerffel, who cordially admired Brahms, was angry from disappointment. "The Viennese are much more easily satisfied than we," he wrote. "We make quite different demands on Brahms and require from him music that is something more than pretty, and very pretty, when he comes before us as a symphonist." That is to say, Brahms was here more musical than philosophic, "he let himself go." The great critic, Hanslick, the enemy of the Wagner movement and the champion of Brahms, wrote enthusiastically of the Second symphony, and his criticism is an interesting note on that historic conflict, of which only a rumbling now is heard, since the world accepts both Wagner and Brahms as composers of wonderful music in different styles.

"It is well known," said Hanslick, "that Wagner and his followers go so far as not only to deny the possibility of anything new in the symphonic form—that is, new after Beethoven—but they reject the very right of absolute instrumental music to exist. The symphony, they say, is now superfluous since Wagner has transplanted it to opera; only Liszt's symphonic poems in one movement and with a determined poetical program, have, in the contemplation of the modern musical world, any vitality. Now, if such absurd theories, which are framed solely for Wagner-Liszt household use, again need refutation, there can be no more complete and brilliant refutation than the long row of Brahms's instrumental works, and especially this Second Symphony.

Character of the Second Symphony.

"The character of this symphony may be described concisely as peaceful, tender, but not effeminate serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to meditative seriousness. The first movement begins with a mellow and dusky horn theme. The symphony has something of the nature of the serenade and this impression is strengthened still further in the scherzo and the finale. The first movement immerses us in a wave of clear melody, upon which we rest, swayed, refreshed. The last fifty measures expire in flashes of new melodic beauty. A broad singing adagio follows. The scherzo is thoroughly delightful in its graceful movement in minuet tempo. It is twice interrupted by a presto, which flashes, spark-like, for a moment. The finale is more vivacious but always agreeable in its golden serenity, and is widely removed from the stormy finales of the modern school. Mozartean blood flows in its veins.

"This symphony is a contrast rather than a companion to the First, and this it appears to the public. The hearer is affected by the First as though he read a scientific treatise full of deep, philosophical thought and mysterious perspectives. The inclination of Brahms to cover up or do away with whatever might look like an 'effect' is carried to squeamishness in the First symphony. The hearer can not possibly grasp all the motives or divisions of motives, which, however, slumber there as flowers beneath the snow or float as distant points of light beyond the clouds. It is true that this Second symphony contains no movement of such noble pathos as the finale of the First. On the other hand, in its uniform coloring and sunny clearness, it is an advance upon the first, and one that is not to be underestimated.

Tendency to Conceal Suppressed.

"Brahms has this time, fortunately, repressed his noble but dangerous inclination to conceal his ideas under a web of polyphony, or to cover them with lines of contrapuntal intersection, and if the thematic development of the Second appears less remarkable than that in the First, the themes themselves seem more flowing, more spontaneous, and their development seems more natural, more pellucid and therefore more effective. We can not proclaim too loudly our joy that Brahms, after he had given intense expression in his First symphony to Faust-like conflicts of soul, has now in his Second returned to the earth—the earth that laughs and blossoms in the vernal months."

After the symphony next Wednesday evening there will be an intermission of fifteen minutes and then will follow the rollicking "Carnival" overture of Dvorak. The soloist of the concert is to be Heinrich Warnke, the violoncellist, and on this occasion, so far as available records go, the new concert piece for cello and orchestra by Dohnanyi will be performed for the first time in this country. The closing number will be the immense, brilliant tone-poem of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks. After the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form, for Full Orchestra," Op. 28.

Dr. Muck's Last Appearance

[illegible] second successively

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

DR. KARL MUCK, OF BERLIN.

His appearance in Indianapolis with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Wednesday night will be the last in this city unless there is radical change of plan enabling him to remain longer in America.

are eighty players, and Dr. Muck, is under the direction of Ona B. Talbot. The box office sale of seats will open at the Big Four office next Monday morning. Unless there is a radical change of plan this will be Dr. Muck's last appearance here. He is under contract to Emperor William of Germany, as a conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and is in this country on leave of absence granted at his request and at that of Mr. Higginson, the financial sponsor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and others influential in the administration of the affairs of Harvard University.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 1, 1908

Concerts Next Week

Again Dr. Muck has put the music of an American composer on his programmes, and at the fourteenth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chadwick's three "Symphonic Sketches" will be played, and hitherto only fragments of them have been heard here. They run in four parts, and each part has a motto that presumably hints at a programme. The first part is entitled "Jubilee," and in the score are found the following verses:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

D. R.

The second part is entitled "Noël," and it has the following motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all round
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel-hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third part is entitled "Hobgoblin," and in it the composer has sought to express the feeling of the following line: "That Shrewd and Knavish Spirit Called Robin Goodfellow," and the fourth is called a "Vagrom Ballad," and is prefaced by this verse:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other orchestral number is Goldmark's graceful overture for a band of virtuosi, "In Springtime." For the rest a distinguished singer from one or the other opera house in New York will appear, but complications over her engagement prevent for the moment the announcement of the name. May we wager a two-cent piece, if there are any, that it will be Miss Geraldine Farrar.

Coming Concerts

Sunday evening, Feb. 9, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the increase of its pension fund. The programme, drawn wholly from Wagner, comprises the overtures to the "Flying Dutchman" and to "Tannhäuser"; the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Parsifal"; Siegfried's Apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung," and Erda's warning to Wotan from "Das Rheingold," and Waltraute's narrative to Brünnhilde of the doomed gods from "Götterdämmerung," both sung by Mme. Schumann-Heink.

HERALD—BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 2, 1908.

MUSIC NOTES.

Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House will sing at the Symphony concerts this week. She will probably sing an air from "The Trojans" of Berlioz and the familiar air from Gluck's "Orpheus." Miss Gerville-Reache made her debut at the Opera Comique, Paris, in 1900, in the latter opera. She sang here a few weeks ago with marker success at one of Mrs. McAllister's morning concerts.

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Sunday evening, the 9th, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck will conduct, and Mme. Schumann-Heink has kindly volunteered her services. This will probably be the last opportunity for those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts to hear the orchestra under Dr. Muck. Moreover, it is probably the last opportunity any one will have to hear the orchestra play Wagner's music under Dr. Muck, for it is well known by this time that he objects to Wagner's music in concert form, and it is a concession on his part to allow Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing excerpts from the "Ring." The programme will include the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhaeuser," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal." Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing Erda's scene from "The Rhinegold" and Waltraute's scene from "Dusk of the Gods."

GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 2. 1908.

The Symphony orchestra pension fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony hall next Sunday evening, will be the second and last of the season. The reason that the two concerts have come so closely together instead of at the beginning and end of the season as is usually the custom, is that the orchestra has had to take advantage of the open time of the artists who have so kindly volunteered their services as soloists.

Mr Paderewski could give only the time he had during the holidays, and Mme Schumann-Heink found that next Sunday was the only available open date that she had. A more than usual amount of sentiment is invested in this concert, because it will be the last opportunity those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under Dr Muck.

The first part of the program will comprise the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser." The second part will have Mme Schumann-Heink's numbers, "Erde" scene from the last scene of the "Rheingold" and "Waltraute" scene from the prologue to "The Dusk of the Gods." The final section of the program comprises the funeral music from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Paper Cutting Bureau
STAR,
NEWARK, N.J.
JAN 27 1908

During the Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from January 26 to February 2, when six concerts will be given, there will be a soloist at only two, in Buffalo this evening and in Indianapolis on Wednesday evening. In Buffalo Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra, will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra. In Indianapolis Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will play for the first time in this country a concertstock for 'cello and orchestra by a distinguished Hungarian composer and pianist. The piece was written for and dedicated to Hugo Beckar.

POST. FEBRUARY 2. 1908

The programme of the 14th Symphony rehearsal and concert, which takes place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Mr. George Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," which will be given for the first time in [illegible] entirety at these concerts, and Goldmark's glowing overture, "In the Spring." The name of the soloist, who will be a singer, has yet to be announced, owing to unexpected complications in the matter of dates. The "Symphonic Sketches" are in four movements, following freely the symphonic form. Each section has a motto.

I. "JUBILEE."
No cold gray tones for me;
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness, I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me!

II. "NOEL."
Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.

III. "HOBGOBLIN."
That shrewd and knavish spirit called Robin Goodfellow.

IV. "A VAGROM BALLAD."
A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum;
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirsty days" to come.

DATES AHEAD

The Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, Feb. 9, will be the second and last of the season. The fact that the orchestra has had to take advantage of the dates at the disposal of the artists who have so kindly volunteered their services as soloists is responsible for the two concerts coming so closely together. Mr. Paderewski could give only the time he had during the holidays; Mme. Schumann-Heink found that next Sunday was her only available opportunity to arrive here in time. She will make a hasty trip from Pittsburg, where she appears with the Pittsburg Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

A more than usual amount of sentiment is invested in this concert, for it will be the last opportunity that those who are not subscribers to the regular series of Symphony concerts will have to hear the orchestra under Dr. Muck's direction. Moreover, it is probable that it will be the last opportunity anyone will have to hear the orchestra play Wagner under Dr. Muck, it being known that he objects to Wagner in concert form.

The first part of the programme will include the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser." In the second part Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Erde" scene from the "Rheingold," in which the all-wise woman entreats Wotan to return the ring to Fafner and Fasolt, and "Waltraute" narrative from "The Dusk of the Gods," when the Walkyr relates to Brunhilde the approaching downfall of the Walhalla. The final section of the programme consists of the funeral music from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

The third and last [illegible] of the season by the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on Monday evening, Feb. 10, at 8:15 o'clock. Alberic Magnard's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano has already been played by the club, and is repeated by request. The second number will be a trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon by Mozart. The third will be Arthur Bird's Suite in D major for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and two bassoons. This will be the first performance of the latter work in Boston.

From all sides come expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, though the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question last December of having this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the manager of the orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck, though anxious to stay, justly remarked that having given the Kaiser a promise to make but a year's visit, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of his leave. That the Kaiser finally, and after much hesitation, did give his consent to Dr. Muck's [illegible] to Boston has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

[1+7]

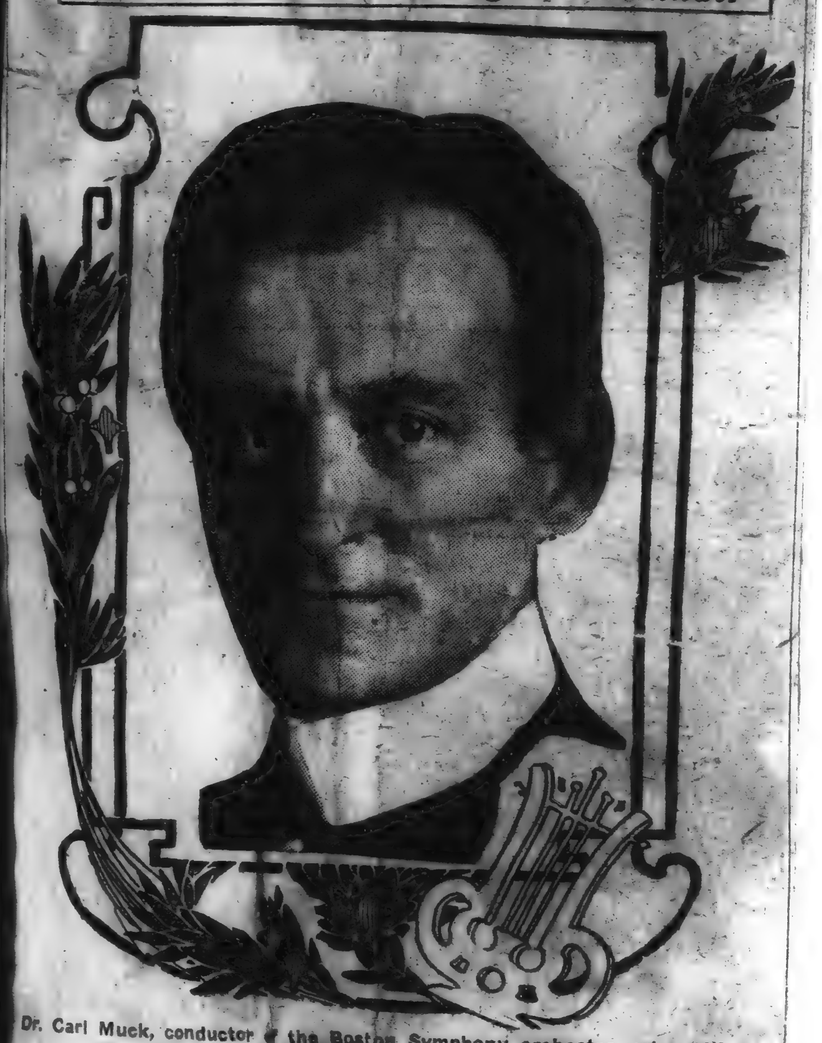
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES-STAR
From
Address CINCINNATI, OHIO
Date JAN 29 1908

Noted Conductor Coming to Cincinnati



Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear here.

The sale of seats for the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening opened at Smith & Nixon's on Wednesday morning. An unusual degree of attention has been directed to these two concerts given under the series inaugurated by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra association, through the fact that this will be the last season of Dr. Karl Muck in this country. Mrs. Muck will accompany her celebrated husband on his Western trip, as she is particularly interested in everything that concerns this country and allows no opportunity to escape to increase her acquaintance with conditions. During her stay in this country Mrs. Muck has become quite Americanized and has adapted herself to the social conditions of Boston with astonishing ease, belonging to a number of literary clubs and gymnasiums. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are charming people socially and their absence from Boston next year will be a matter of great regret. The Boston orchestra will come in by special train on Friday morning and will put up at the Grand hotel.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ENQUIRER
From
Address CINCINNATI, OHIO
Date JAN 30 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-MORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in this city early Friday morning by special train and a majority of the players will be domiciled at the Grand Hotel. A rehearsal will be held at Music Hall on Friday morning. Dr. Muck, the conductor, who last year made acquaintance with this public, with the next two concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening makes his farewell. The programs chosen will at least give an extended idea of the capacities of this fine conductor, as two such important symphonies as the Beethoven No. 6 Pastoral and the Brahms No. 2 will be features of the concerts. When visiting this city last season Dr. Muck elected to play the newer music, consequently those gifts for classical interpretation for which he is so justly renowned had no opportunity of being exploited. The more classical character of the programs chosen for next Friday afternoon and evening will not only afford ample opportunity for revealing Dr. Muck as a leader, but will also appeal to the lovers of absolute music, of whom here are many in this city.

188

From TIMES STAR
Address CINCINNATI, OHIO
Date JAN 28 1908

To say that the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization which is capable of presenting symphonic music in its most perfect form is but to repeat a trite phrase. To each separate department of the organization the most careful scrutiny has been given; even the instruments used have been subjected to observation and various experiments have been made along those lines with a view towards attaining perfection in ensemble. Hidden away under a mass of accumulated "properties" in Symphony hall, Boston, are thirty fine modern violins, representing an investment of several thousand dollars. Thereby hangs a tale illustrative of how nothing has been spared either in effort or in money to make the Boston Symphony orchestra the most perfect instrument in the world. The string choir of the orchestra has long been famous, Dr. Muck going so far as to say that there is nothing to compare with it in the world. But some years ago, Mr. Gericke, then the conductor, thought the choir could be improved. He conceived the idea that if all the violins had instruments of an uniform make there would be a richness and brilliancy of tone such as never had been heard. He proposed the plan to Mr. Higginson, who told him to go ahead, with the result that an order for thirty specially designed violins was placed with the most celebrated maker of these instruments in Vienna. The most celebrated makes of violins are to be found in the Boston Symphony orchestra, this one fact accounting in part for the beautiful tone of the choir. Stradivarius, Guarnieri, Guadagnini and Landolfi are some of the masters represented.

But on the arrival of the new fiddles, the famous ones were cast aside. The experiment was a complete failure. The violins were very good, but the tone from them was not to be compared with the tone given out by the other instruments. Consequently, after a few concerts, they were consigned to the store room where they have since remained, voiceless, dusty and absolutely useless.

STAR,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 28 1908

GENERAL NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here Wednesday from Detroit on a special train run by the Big Four, made up of seven cars.

At a meeting of the Indiana Car Service Association yesterday A. J. O'Reilly, freight official of the Monon, was selected as chairman of the executive board for another year.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From DISPATCH
Address COLUMBUS, O.
Date JAN 29 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the most interesting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Carl Wendling, the fifth man to hold the very important and responsible position of concert-master. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second Franz Kneisel, the third Fernandez Arbos, the fourth Willy Hess and the fifth Wendling. Mr. Wendling is here on a concert leave of absence to take the [illegible]

STAR,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
JAN 29 1908

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Indianapolis last season it had been nearly twenty years since the organization had been heard in this city. The orchestra will be heard here again this evening, and it will probably be several years before it is able to repeat the visit. This is because it is limited as to time on the road tour and is allowed but one week of dates in the middle West. There are many cities clamoring for bookings and all of these must await their turns in order to be satisfied. The orchestra will give a concert at Caleb Mills Hall tonight and will be under the direction of Dr. Muck.

[128

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
Date JAN 29 1908

DR. MUCK SEES FIRE AND ASCENDS MONUMENT

COMES WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

CALEB MILLS HALL TO-NIGHT

Dr. Karl Muck, great German musician, conductor by grace of H. R. M. Emperor William, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likes America, the United States, Indianapolis and the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument. To begin with the last-named, he says it is the greatest in America and one of the finest monuments in the world. He spent some time riding to the top, trying to pierce with his eyesight the dense atmosphere and riding to the bottom to have the interior workings of the Monument explained to him. This was an incident of an hour's walk about the city in the stinging cold, which, he said, he found only bracing.

He saw the big fire of the Coburn warehouse.

"Grossartig!" he said.

Dr. Muck's relation to American music is peculiar. Two years ago, by special permission of the German Kaiser, he left the Royal Berlin Orchestra to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A year ago a year's extension of his leave of absence was granted.

AN IMPRESSION OF DR. MUCK.

"I regret to be leaving next May," he said to-day, via his interpreter, John Sauerquell. Dr. Muck understands English quite readily, but for purposes of interviews prefers not to use it. He does not care to take the chance.

Greatest Orchestra in the World.

"My two years in your country," he said, "have been enjoyable in the extreme. I find a great and growing appreciation of music, and it will, of course, continue to grow. You have now the greatest orchestra in the world."

He modestly refrained from naming it.

"And that fact should prove the character of the people as regards music. In other ways I like your America. I like the people. I met many pleasant persons in Indianapolis a year ago, and I remember them with pleasure. It was at that time that I was taken over the city and I remember it as a beautiful place. My ramble a while ago showed me that Indianapolis continues to grow larger.

"I enjoy these trips in most respects. The railroads are good, the hotels are good and the audiences are good, but the concert halls—Ach! sometimes they are not! To have the harmony disturbed and the music-feeling of the audience broken by the sound of the rumbling street car outside!"

To-night Dr. Muck and the eighty artists of his orchestra will play at Caleb Mills Hall, where the sound of the rumble of the street cars will not be heard.

for a second season, was a concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some means might be found to secure the conductor's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities at Berlin would not consider any such proposal, replying that Berlin needed the doctor's services quite as much as Boston, and that the latter could not be spared any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will remain until the middle of June. He will then proceed to Bayreuth, where he will remain until the end of August, for he is again to be conductor of the famous performances of "Parsifal."

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been, and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

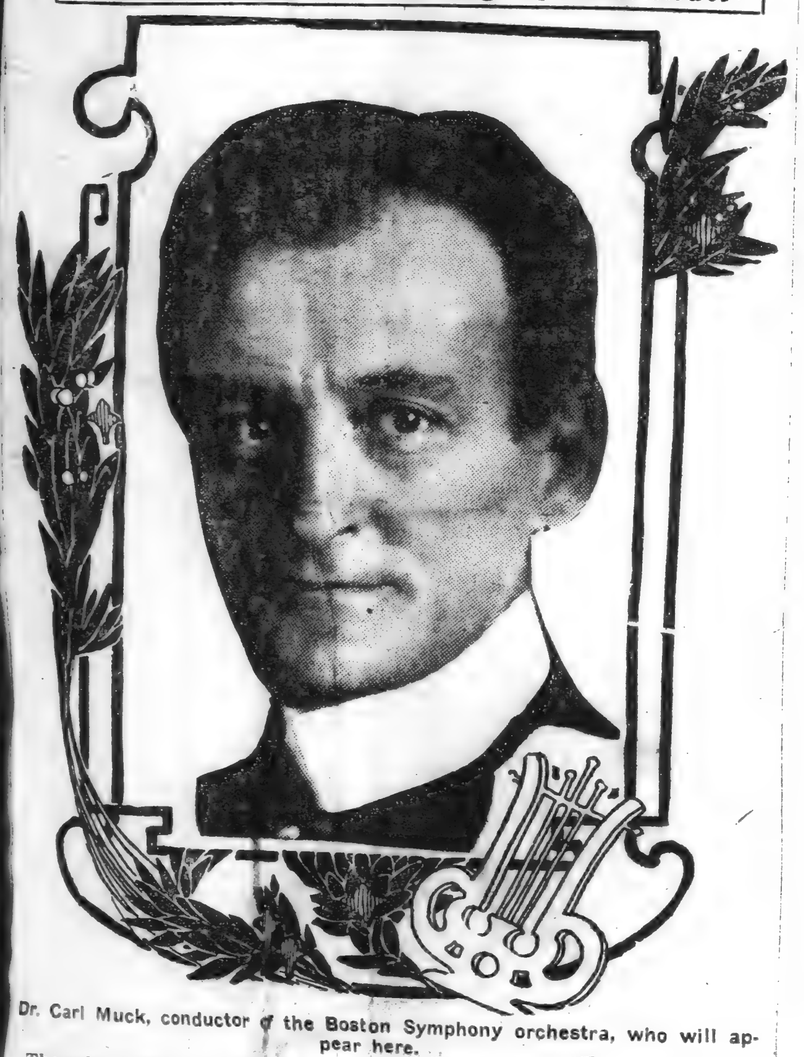
From ...

Address ...

JAN 29 1908

Date ...

Noted Conductor Coming to Cincinnati



Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear here.

The sale of seats for the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening opened at Smith & Nixon's on Wednesday morning. An unusual degree of attention has been directed to these two concerts given under the series inaugurated by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra association, through the fact that this will be the last season of Dr. Karl Muck in this country. Mrs. Muck will accompany her celebrated husband on his Western trip, as she is particularly interested in everything that concerns this country and allows no opportunity to escape to increase her acquaintance with conditions. During her stay in this country Mrs. Muck has become quite Americanized and has adapted herself to the social conditions of Boston with astonishing ease, belonging to a number of literary clubs and gymnasiums. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are charming people socially and their absence from Boston next year will be a matter of great regret. The Boston orchestra will come in by special train on Friday morning and will put up at the Grand hotel.

...as

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Indianapolis last season it had been nearly twenty years since the organization had been heard in this city. The orchestra will be heard here again this evening, and it will probably be several years before it is able to repeat the visit. This is because it is limited as to time on the road tour and is allowed but one week of dates in the middle West. There are many cities clamoring for bookings and all of these must await their turns in order to be satisfied. The orchestra will give a concert at Caleb Mills Hall tonight and will be under the direction of Dr. Muck.

[128]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om ...

...ddress ...

...ate ...

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-MORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in this city early Friday morning by special train and a majority of the players will be domiciled at the Grand Hotel. A rehearsal will be held at Music Hall on Friday morning. Dr. Muck, the conductor, who last year made acquaintance with this public, with the next two concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening makes his farewell. The programs chosen will at least give an extended idea of the capacities of this fine conductor, as two such important symphonies as the Beethoven No. 6 Pastoral and the Brahms No. 2 will be features of the concerts. When visiting this city last season Dr. Muck elected to play the newer music, consequently those gifts for classical interpretation for which he is so justly renowned had no opportunity of being exploited. The more classical character of the programs chosen for next Friday afternoon and evening will not only afford ample opportunity for revealing Dr. Muck as a leader, but will also appeal to the lovers of absolute music, of whom here are many in this city.

188

...From TIMES STAR

Address ...

...ate ... JAN 29 1908

To say that the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization which is capable of presenting symphonic music in its most perfect form is but to repeat a trite phrase. To each separate department of the organization the most careful scrutiny has been given; even the instruments used have been subjected to observation and various experiments have been made along those lines with a view towards attaining perfection in ensemble. Hidden away under a mass of accumulated "properties" in Symphony hall, Boston, are thirty fine modern violins, representing an investment of several thousand dollars. Thereby hangs a tale illustrative of how nothing has been spared either in effort or in money to make the Boston Symphony orchestra the most perfect instrument in the world. The string choir of the orchestra has long been famous, Dr. Muck going so far as to say that there is nothing to compare with it in the world. But some years ago, Mr. Gericke, then the conductor, thought the choir could be improved. He conceived the idea that if all the violins had instruments of an uniform make there would be a richness and brilliancy of tone such as never had been heard. He proposed the plan to Mr. Higginson, who told him to go ahead, with the result that an order for thirty specially designed violins was placed with the most celebrated maker of these instruments in Vienna. The most celebrated makes of violins are to be found in the Boston Symphony orchestra, this one fact accounting in part for the beautiful tone of the choir. Stradivarius, Guarnieri, Guadagnini and Landolfi are some of the masters represented.

But on the arrival of the new fiddles, the famous ones were cast aside. The experiment was a complete failure. The violins were very good, but the tone from them was not to be compared with the tone given out by the other instruments. Consequently, after a few concerts, they were consigned to the store room where they have since remained, voiceless, dusty and absolutely useless.

STAR

...

JAN 28 1908

GENERAL NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here Wednesday from Detroit on a special train run by the Big Four, made up of seven cars.

At a meeting of the Indiana Car Service Association yesterday A. J. O'Reilly, freight official of the Monon, was selected as chairman of the executive board for another year.

...which is full of variety.

The First Established and Most Complet Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Worl

...rom ...

...ddress ...

...ate ... JAN 9 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the most interesting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Carl Wendling, the fifth man to hold the very important and responsible position of concert-master. The first was Bernhard Listemann, the second Franz Kneisel, the third Fernandez Arbos, the fourth Willy Hess and the fifth Wendling. Mr. Wendling is here on a year's leave of absence to take the place of Professor Hess, who has permission to spend the winter abroad.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor...

...rom ...

...ddress ...

...ate ... JAN 29 1908

DR. MUCK SEES FIRE AND ASCENDS MONUMENT

COMES WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

CALEB MILLS HALL TO-NIGHT

Dr. Karl Muck, great German musician, conductor by grace of H. R. M. Emperor William, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likes America, the United States, Indianapolis and the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument. To begin with the last-named, he says it is the greatest in America and one of the finest monuments in the world. He spent some time riding to the top, trying to pierce with his eyesight the dense atmosphere and riding to the bottom to have the interior workings of the Monument explained to him. This was an incident of an hour's walk about the city in the stinging cold, which, he said, he found only bracing.

He saw the big fire of the Coburn warehouse.

"Grossartig!" he said.

Dr. Muck's relation to American music is peculiar. Two years ago, by special permission of the German Kaiser, he left the Royal Berlin Orchestra to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A year ago a year's extension of his leave of absence was granted.

AN IMPRESSION OF DR. MUCK.

"I regret to be leaving next May," he said to-day, via his interpreter, John Sauerquell. Dr. Muck understands English quite readily, but for purposes of interviews prefers not to use it. He does not care to take the chance.

Greatest Orchestra in the World.

"My two years in your country," he said, "have been enjoyable in the extreme. I find a great and growing appreciation of music, and it will, of course, continue to grow. You have now the greatest orchestra in the world."

He modestly refrained from naming it.

"And that fact should prove the character of the people as regards music. In other ways I like your America. I like the people. I met many pleasant persons in Indianapolis a year ago, and I remember them with pleasure. It was at that time that I was taken over the city and I remember it as a beautiful place. My ramble a while ago showed me that Indianapolis continues to grow larger.

"I enjoy these trips in most respects. The railroads are good, the hotels are good and the audiences are good, but the concert halls—Ach! sometimes they are not! To have the harmony disturbed and the music-feeling of the audience broken by the sound of the rumbling street car outside!"

To-night Dr. Muck and the eighty artists of his orchestra will play at Caleb Mills Hall, where the sound of the rumble of the street cars will not be heard.

PASTE OVER

NEWS
INDIANAPOLIS, IND
JAN 28 1908

MAY BE ORCHESTRA'S LAST VISIT IN YEARS

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW NIGHT.

HEINRICH WARNKE, SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestras of the world, had not visited Indianapolis for more than twenty years before last season, and it probably will be years, after to-morrow evening, before it plays in this city again. The orchestra can spare only one week for the middle West. There are eighty-six persons in the party, and they travel on a private train. The orchestra plays in Detroit this evening, and will arrive in Indianapolis to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock.

After Indianapolis, the orchestra will go to Columbus, O., and on Friday and Saturday it will give concerts in the regular symphony series at Cincinnati. Then the orchestra will go to its home at Symphony Hall, Boston. Dr. Muck and Mme. Muck will be welcomed by many friends that they met socially here last season.

Heinrich Warnke's Number.

The soloist in the concert to-morrow evening will be Heinrich Warnke, the German violoncellist. He will be heard in a new concert piece for cello and orchestra by Ernst Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist. This composition has not yet been played in either New York or Boston. Those that have seen the score say that it is especially melodious and grateful for the cello, which should be treated as a "singing" instrument solely. Mr. Warnke is now in his second season as solo violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeded Rudolph Krasselt, who was the successor of Alwin Schroeder, well known here as the cellist of the Kneisel quartet. Mr. Warnke was born in Wesselburen, Schleswig, in 1881. His father was a violinist and all the family are musicians. At the age of twelve Mr. Warnke was sent to the conservatory at Hamburg to study the cello. Afterward he studied with Julius Klengel at Leipsic and made his debut at the Gewandhaus. Afterward he was invited by Weingartner to be the solo cellist of the Kaim orchestra at Munich. He has played as soloist in many European and American capitals, and is now regarded one of the greatest cello virtuosi.

"Cosmopolis of Virtuosi."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, "the cosmopolis of virtuosi," is generally recognized as the finest symphonic body now in existence. It is composed of the best available players of all nations, for its financial sponsor gives the conductor a free hand in engaging its members. Mr. Theodorewicz, known in Indianapolis as the second violinist of the Kneisel quartet, is back among the first violins of the orchestra this season. He first came to America as a member of the orchestra. He now has his own string quartet in Boston. There are several chamber music organizations within the orchestra, and one of the most interesting of them is the Longy reed club, led by M. Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. It is in the pure and lustrous quality of tone and the precision of phrasing of the orchestra that the individual artistic and technical excellence of the players shows. The sale of seats for the concert is proceeding at the Big Four ticket office. The orchestra comes to this city under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The complete program follows:

Symphony No. 2," in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
(1) Allegro non troppo.
(2) Adagio non troppo.
(3) Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
(4) Allegro con spirito.
Overture—"Carnival" ..... Dvorak
Concert piece for violoncello and orchestra (new) ..... Dohnanyi
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in Rondo form, for full orchestra, Op. 28.....Richard Strauss

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
POST
COLUMBUS, O
JAN 28 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Three of the most interesting compositions of the modern school for orchestra will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday evening in Memorial hall. Though but three numbers, the program will be nearly two hours in length, the various movements of the Wallenstein Trilogy and MacDowell Suite, furnishing infinite variety and delightful contrast. The Trilogy movements are named "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" and "Wallenstein's Death." The MacDowell Suite is composed of five separate finished numbers entitled "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song" and "Forest Spirits." The last number is the Rhapsodie for Orchestra, "Espana," by Chabrier, a sensationally brilliant orchestral composition.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who is in America (Boston) by special permission of the emperor of Germany, is a

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O
JAN 30 1908

SPLENDID MUSIC PROGRAM TONIGHT

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Arouses Abounding Interest in Columbus.

D'Indy's Great Symphonic Triology One of Three Masterpieces to Be Presented.

Interest is at highest pitch in Columbus over the long anticipated concert, tonight, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Memorial hall. The importance in the musical warld of both the organization and the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, makes this visit to Columbus one of unusual moment.

The program includes three numbers of extraordinary interest—D'Indy's "Wallenstein," MacDowell's Suite in A minor and Chabirer's "Raphsody Espana." "Wallenstein" is a symphonic triology (after the dramatic poem of Schiller). Hugues Imbert gives this sketch of the triology:

"The distinguishing feature of the symphonic music of Vincent D'Indy is that it paints with forcible truth, marvelous vividness, and astonishing vigor the various episodes in the drama of Schiller. For instance, in the first part, 'Le Camp,' after the slow valse, comes the savage dance with its determined rythm, the sermon of the Capuchin father given to the bassoon, the theme of 'Wallenstein' energetically demonstrated by the trombones, and then the final tumult, in which we hear a few notes of Wallenstein's theme thrown out by the trumpets and the fortissimi of the orchestra. In all this you will recognize the mastery of a musician who has approached very nearly to a musical translation of a scene crowded with movement. You will find not only the painting of events and acts, but the painting of the moral sentiments which animate the personages in the drama."

Exquisite Love Scene.

"Is there anything more exquisitely tender than the love episode between Max and Thekla (second part)? With what fecility do the two themes of the lovers unite and embrace each other; yet with what inevitability are the ideal transports of the happy pair stifled by the intervention of Fate, whose fell design has been suggested by the brief introduction of the horns! The third and last episode is the death of Wallenstein.

"Very dramatic is the opening in which strange chords, that recall the splendid sonority of the organ, characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny. These chords are the poetical rendering of this beautiful saying of Wallenstein in the 'Piccolomini': 'Yet the mysterious force which labors in the bowels of nature—the ladder of spirits that stretchs from this world of dust up to the world of stars with a thousand ramifications, this ladder on which the heavenly powers mount and dismount ever restless—the circles within circles that grow narrower and narrower as they approach the sun their center,—all this can be beheld alone by the eyes of the heaven-born joyous descendants of Zeus—those eyes from which the veil of blindness has fallen.'

"After several episodes, an ascending progression of the bases brings backs the complete statement of Wallenstein's theme in B major, which ends in a very widely constructed movement, in which the starry chords of the opening are reproduced, covered over with the wind instruments, while the quatuor winds its way rapidly in and out of them, and the trombones thunder out the fate-fraught song; soon calm is restored, and the sound dies away gradually in a long pianissimo of the stringed instruments.

Strong Camp Scene.

"The first movement, 'Wallenstein's Camp,' Allegro giusto 3-4, is dedicated to Henri Duparc—a musician and soldier in teh siege of Paris. It is in the general nature of a scherzo, who portrays the camp life and the rude jesting of the soldiery.

"The chief theme is given immediately to full orchestra. It is constantly changed, and it passes through many keys, until the original tonality is restored. There is a lull in the tumult. The strings play a sort of slow waltz, which soon becomes boisterous, allegro moderato, 3-8.

"After development of these three motives the Capuchin monk appears. He is typified by the bassoons, which take up one after the other a theme, B minor Allegro moderato e giocoso, 2-4, in a fugal passage. This section describes the Capuchin's sermon. The monk is mocked and derided by woodwind instruments; the trumpet parodies, the fugue theme and clarinets join in the caricature. The soldiers howl the monk down and drag him into the rough waltz. The uproar is not quelled until horns, trumpets and

"Max and Thekla' (The Piccolomini') Andante, Allegro Adagio, is dedicated to Jules Pasdeloup, a conductor of most Catholic taste, first friend of young composers and a patriotic Frenchman. There is a short introduction full of bodement, with a rhythmic figure for kettle drums, plaintive wail of violins and lamentation of horns. Max Piccolimini is then characterized by an expressive theme, Andante, which is given first to the clarinets and horns, afterward to the full orchestra. This theme is developed at length.

Love Scene Interrupted.

"The love scene is interrupted by the entrance of Wallenstein's typical motive which is now passionate and disquieted. The Allegro resoluto theme returns, and there is a conflict between it and the Fate motive, in which the tragic end of Max is determined. The oboe sighs out Thekla's lament. There is a final recollection of Max and the end is mourning and lamentation.

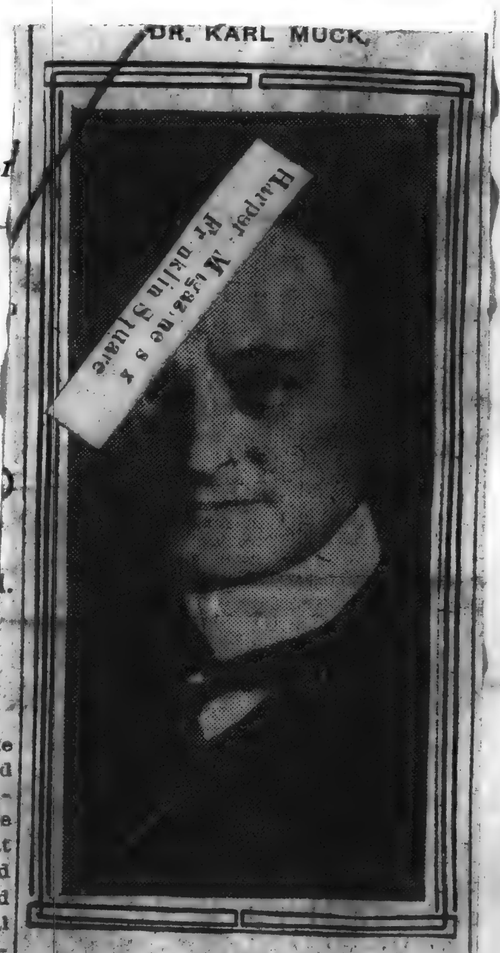
"'Wallenstein's Death' is dedicated to Camille Berroit, composer. There is a slow and ominous introduction, with the appearance of the theme of Wallenstein. The opening measures of the movement proper, Allegro, portray to some the conspiracy and overthrow of the general, whose theme appears now in distorted shape. Again is there the tumultuous confusion of the camp. A maestoso passage follows. This is succeeded by a repetition of the Allegro, which, however, is changed. The Thekla motive comes again, and another maestoso passage follows. The triology ends sonorously with the introduction used as a foundation."

Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," is based on original Spanish dance times. The various forms of the Jota and the Malegueua are especially prominent. The Jota is one of the most popular North Spanish dances. Almost every town in Spain has its own Jota. It is danced not only at merrymakings, but at certain religious festivals, and even in watching the dead.

In the Chabrier composition there is said to be an extraordinary expenditure of verve, dazzling the ear and reviving, by the power of sound alone, the whole of musical Spain.

From
JOURNAL COLUMBUS, O
Address
Date JAN 28 1908

DR. KARL MUCK.



Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose appearance here Thursday evening is considered the most important musical event of the year in Columbus. Everybody is talking about Dr. Muck, but few know how to pronounce his name. It should be as if spelled "Mook." The famous director will be accompanied to Columbus by his wife, who is a woman of much literary ability.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
COLUMBUS, O
JAN 27 1908

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Memorial hall on next Thursday evening, January 30, will give Columbus the only opportunity during the present season of hearing this justly famous organization under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Tickets may be purchased at the Wilkin-Redman music store on North High street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O
Address
Date JAN 20 1908

LOVE OF NATURE SHOWN BY MACDOWELL'S SUITE

Composer Spent Hours in Wiesbaden Forest—Music to Be Heard Here Tomorrow.

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, tomorrow evening in Memorial hall, will present a program of unusual interest, including as it does the MacDowell suite in A minor, Op. 42, D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Chabner's Raphsody "Espana."

Four movements of the MacDowell suite—"In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess' Song," and "Forest Spirits"—were played in the United States the first time at the Worcester (Mass.) festival in September, 1901. The next performance was in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikick conductor, October 24, 1891. The present third movement, "In October," was played for the first time by the Boston orchestra, October 26, 1895. Mr. Paur was conductor.

Of this suite Mrs. MacDowell, the composer's wife, said: "It was begun in Wesbaden the year we returned to America, though it was hardly more than sketched. I have an idea that the suite was performed in Germany earlier than the performance at the Worcester festival. It had a queer popularity in Germany for two or three years.

Half Believed Fairy Stories.

"Edward had no more 'programme' in his mind than the titles imply; but he was undoubtedly led toward the subject by the close proximity in which we lived to the big Wiesbaden Forest. We had a tiny cottage just on the edge of the woods; and he spent hours wandering in them. His Scotch blood has filled his mind with mysticism. Deep in his heart, he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies,—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried him far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered. Strange as all this was in Germany, it was much stranger in America. It was extraordinary the joy he took that first summer in Peterboro (N. H.) in the woods, in the streams, in the sky, and the fact that it was all so new gave it a singular charm, which the American more often finds in Europe."

The suite is scored for a piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, a bass tuba, kettle drums, bass drum, cymbals, and strings.

Mr. Apthorp explains:

"This composition is one of those bits of romantic writing which make technical analysis at once impertinent and futile. Each one of the five movements of which it is made up is perfectly free in form, containing the free development and working up of one or more principal ideas. And, as technical analysis is out of place, any would-be-poetic exegesis of the music would be still worse. All the extra-musical suggestion the composer has vouchsafed is contained in the titles of the several movements; and it would be failing rather than helping his artistic purpose to supplement these simple headings with suggestions which must necessarily have poetic meaning to the suggester only.

"It is best to let the music tell its own story to be understood as each listener likes best."

The suite includes: I. In a Haunted Forest; Largamente misterioso, A minor, 6-8; Allegro furioso, A minor, 6-8. II. Summer Idyl: Allegretto grazioso, A major, 6-8. III. In October: Allegro conbrio, F major, 6-8; Poco meno mosso, dolce, F major 3-4. IV. The Shepherdess' Song; Andantino semplice, C major, 4-4. V. Forest Spirits: Molto allegro, A minor, 4-4; misterioso, un poco giulento, D minor, 2-4, 6-4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O
Address
Date JAN 27 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Thursday evening, January 30th in Memorial hall, will give Columbus its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck. It has been impossible to secure from the German [illegible] either Dr. Muck's [illegible] contract which [illegible] director of the [illegible] next [illegible]

PASTE OVER

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 28 1908

MAY BE ORCHESTRA'S LAST VISIT IN YEARS

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO-MORROW NIGHT.

HEINRICH WARNKE, SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the foremost orchestras of the world, had not visited Indianapolis for more than twenty years before last season, and it probably will be years, after to-morrow evening, before it plays in this city again. The orchestra can spare only one week for the middle West. There are eighty-six persons in the party, and they travel on a private train. The orchestra plays in Detroit this evening, and will arrive in Indianapolis to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock.

After Indianapolis, the orchestra will go to Columbus, O., and on Friday and Saturday it will give concerts in the regular symphony series at Cincinnati. Then the orchestra will go to its home at Symphony Hall, Boston. Dr. Muck and Mme. Muck will be welcomed by many friends that they met socially here last season.

Heinrich Warnke's Number.

The soloist in the concert to-morrow evening will be Heinrich Warnke, the German violoncellist. He will be heard in a new concert piece for cello and orchestra by Ernst Dohnanyi, the Hungarian composer and pianist. This composition has not yet been played in either New York or Boston. Those that have seen the score say that it is especially melodious and grateful for the cello, which should be treated as a "singing" instrument solely. Mr. Warnke is now in his second season as solo violoncellis. of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeded Rudolph Krasselt, who was the successor of Alwin Schreeder, well known here as the cellist of the Kneisel quartet. Mr. Warnke was born in Wesselburen, Schleswig, in 1871. His father was a violinist and all the family are musicians. At the age of twelve Mr. Warnke was sent to the conservatory at Hamburg to study the cello. Afterward he studied with Julius Klengel at Leipsic and made his debut at the Gewandhaus. Afterward he was invited by Weingartner to be the solo cellist of the Kaim orchestra at Munich. He has played as soloist in many European and American capitals, and is now regarded one of the greatest cello virtuosi.

"Cosmopolis of Virtuosi."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, "the cosmopolis of virtuosi," is generally recognized as the finest symphonic body now in existence. It is composed of the best available players of all nations, for its financial sponsor gives the conductor a free hand in engaging its members. Mr. Theodorewicz, known in Indianapolis as the second violinist of the Kneisel quartet, is back among the first violins of the orchestra this season. He first came to America as a member of the orchestra. He now has his own string quartet in Boston. There are several chamber music organizations within the orchestra, and one of the most interesting of them is the Longy reed club; led by M. Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. It is in the pure and lustrous quality of tone and the precision of phrasing of the orchestra that the individual artistic and technical excellence of the players shows. The sale of seats for the concert is proceeding at the Big Four ticket office. The orchestra comes to this city under the direction of Ona B. Talbot.

The complete program follows:

"Symphony No. 2," in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
(1) Allegro non troppo.
(2) Adagio non troppo.
(3) Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
(4) Allegro con spirito.
Overture—"Carnival" ..... Dvorak
Concert piece for violoncello and orchestra (new) ..... Dohnanyi
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in Rondo form, for full orchestra, Op. 28 ..... Richard Strauss

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date COLUMBUS, O
JAN 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Three of the most interesting compositions of the modern school for orchestra will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday evening in Memorial hall. Though but three numbers, the program will be nearly two hours in length, the various movements of the Wallenstein Trilogy and MacDowell Suite, furnishing infinite variety and delightful contrast. The Trilogy movements are named "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" and "Wallenstein's Death." The MacDowell Suite is composed of five separate finished numbers entitled "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song" and "Forest Spirits." The last number is the Rhapsodie for Orchestra, "Espana," by Chabrier, a sensationally brilliant orchestral composition.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who is in America (Boston) by special permission of the emperor of Germany, is a most interesting personality and a distinguished conductor. As he returns to Germany at the close of this season, this will be his first and last time

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 30

SPLENDID MUSIC PROGRAM TONIGHT

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Arouses Abounding Interest in Columbus.

D'Indy's Great Symphonic Triology One of Three Masterpieces to Be Presented.

Interest is at highest pitch in Columbus over the long anticipated concert, tonight, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Memorial hall. The importance in the musical warld of both the organization and the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, makes this visit to Columbus one of unusual moment.

The program includes three numbers of extraordinary interest—D'Indy's "Wallenstein," MacDowell's Suite in A minor and Chabirer's "Raphsody Espana." "Wallenstein" is a symphonic triology (after the dramatic poem of Schiller). Hugues Imbert gives this sketch of the triology:

"The distinguishing feature of the symphonic music of Vincent D'Indy is that it paints with forcible truth, marvelous vividness, and astonishing vigor the various episodes in the drama of Schiller. For instance, in the first part, 'Le Camp,' after the slow valse, comes the savage dance with its determined rythm, the sermon of the Capuchin father given to the bassoon, the theme of 'Wallenstein' energetically demonstrated by the trombones, and then the final tumult, in which we hear a few notes of Wallenstein's theme thrown out by the trumpets and the fortissimi of the orchestra. In all this you will recognize the mastery of a musician who has approached very nearly to a musical translation of a scene crowded with movement. You will find not only the painting of events and acts, but the painting of the moral sentiments which animate the persons in the drama."

Exquisite Love Scene.

"Is there anything more exquisitely tender than the love episode between Max and Thekla (second part)? With what fecility do the two themes of the lovers unite and embrace each other; yet with what inevitability are the ideal transports of the happy pair stifled by the intervention of Fate, whose fell design has been suggested by the brief introduction of the horns! The third and last episode is the death of Wallenstein.

"Very dramatic is the opening in which strange chords, that recall the splendid sonority of the organ, characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny. These chords are the poetical rendering of this beautiful saying of Wallenstein in the 'Piccolomini': 'Yet the mysterious force which labors in the bowels of nature—the ladder of spirits that stretchs from this world of dust up to the world of stars with a thousand ramifications, this ladder on which the heavenly powers mount and dismount ever restless—the circles within circles that grow narrower and narrower as they approach the sun their center,—all this can be beheld alone by the eyes of the heaven-born joyous descendants of Zeus—those eyes from which the veil of blindness has fallen.'

"After several episodes, an ascending progression of the bases brings backs the complete statement of Wallenstein's theme in B major, which ends in a very widely constructed movement, in which the starry chords of the opening are reproduced, covered over with the wind instruments, while the quatuor winds its way rapidly in and out of them, and the trombones thunder out the fate-fraught song; soon calm is restored, and the sound dies away gradually in a long pianissimo of the stringed instruments.

Strong Camp Scene.

"The first movement, 'Wallenstein's Camp," Allegro giusto 3-4, is dedicated to Henri Duparc—a musician and soldier in teh siege of Paris. It is in the general nature of a scherzo, who portrays the camp life and the rude jesting of the soldiery.

"The chief theme is given immediately to full orchestra. It is constantly changed, and it passes through many keys, until the original tonality is restored. There is a lull in the tumult. The strings play a sort of slow waltz, which soon becomes boisterous, allegro moderato, 3-8.

"After development of these three motives the Capuchin monk appears. He is typified by the bassoons, which take up one after the other a theme. B minor Allegro moderato e giocoso, 2-4, in a fugal passage. This section describes the Capuchin's sermon. The monk is mocked and derided by woodwind instruments; the trumpet parodies, the fugue theme and clarinets join in the caricature. The soldiers howl the monk down and drag him into the rough waltz. The uproar is not quelled until horns, trumpets and trombones announce by a phrase the scherzo trio, which begins with the bassoon theme, is at an end. The camp motive and the waltz themes are worked out with changes in the instrumentation and the Wallenstein motive reappears at the close in the midst of the orchestral storm.

"'Max and Thekla' ('The Piccolomini') Andante, Allegro Adagio, is dedicated to Jules Pasdeloup, a conductor of most Catholic taste, first friend of young composers and a patriotic Frenchman. There is a short introduction full of bodement, with a rhythmic figure for kettle drums, plaintive wail of violins and lamentation of horns. Max Piccolimini is then characterized by an expressive theme, Andante, which is given first to the clarinets and horns, afterward to the full orchestra. This theme is developed at length.

Love Scene Interrupted.

"The love scene is interrupted by the entrance of Wallenstein's typical motive which is now passionate and disquieted. The Allegro resoluto theme returns, and there is a conflict between it and the Fate motive, in which the tragic end of Max is determined. The oboe sighs out Thekla's lament. There is a final recollection of Max and the end is mourning and lamentation.

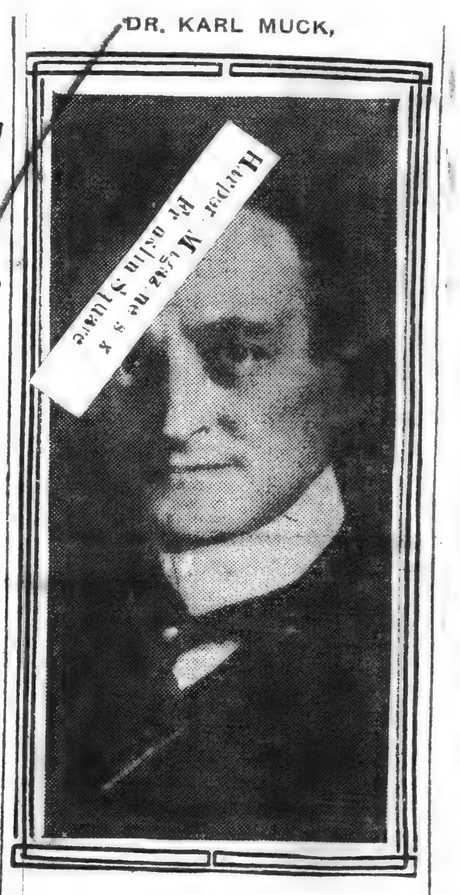
"'Wallenstein's Death' is dedicated to Camille Berroit, composer. There is a slow and ominous introduction, with the appearance of the theme of Wallenstein. The opening measures of the movement proper, Allegro, portray to some the conspiracy and overthrow of the general, whose theme appears now in distorted shape. Again is there the tumultuous confusion of the camp. A maestoso passage follows. This is succeeded by a repetition of the Allegro, which, however, is changed. The Thekla motive comes again, and another maestoso passage follows. The triology ends sonorously with the introduction used as a foundation."

Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," is based on original Spanish dance times. The various forms of the Jota and the Malegueua are especially prominent. The Jota is one of the most popular North Spanish dances. Almost every town in Spain has its own Jota. It is danced not only at merrymakings, but at certain religious festivals, and even in watching the dead.

In the Chabrier composition there is said to be an extraordinary expenditure of verve, dazzling the ear and reviving, by the power of sound alone, the whole of musical Spain.

From
Address
Date JAN 28 1908

DR. KARL MUCK,



Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose appearance here Thursday evening is considered the most important musical event of the year in Columbus. Everybody is talking about Dr. Muck, but few know how to pronounce his name. It should be as if spelled "Mook." The famous director will be accompanied to Columbus by his wife, who is a woman of much literary ability.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JAN 7 1908

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Memorial hall on next Thursday evening, January 30, will give Columbus the only opportunity during the present season of hearing this justly famous organization under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Tickets may be purchased at the Wilkin-Redman music store on North High street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 29 1908

LOVE OF NATURE SHOWN BY MACDOWELL'S SUITE

Composer Spent Hours in Wiesbaden Forest—Music to Be Heard Here Tomorrow.

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, tomorrow evening in Memorial hall, will present a program of unusual interest, including as it does the MacDowell suite in A minor, Op. 42, D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Chabner's Raphsody "Espana."

Four movements of the MacDowell suite—'In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess' Song,' and "Forest Spirits"—were played in the United States the first time at the Worcester (Mass.) festival in September, 1901. The next performance was in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikick conductor, October 24, 1891. The present third movement, "In October," was played for the first time by the Boston orchestra, October 26, 1895. Mr. Paur was conductor.

Of this suite Mrs. MacDowell, the composer's wife, said: "It was begun in Wesbaden the year we returned to America, though it was hardly more than sketched. I have an idea that the suite was performed in Germany earlier than the performance at the Worcester festival. It had a queer popularity in Germany for two or three years.

Half Believed Fairy Stories.

"Edward had no more 'programme' in his mind than the titles imply; but he was undoubtedly led toward the subject by the close proximity in which we lived to the big Wiesbaden Forest. We had a tiny cottage just on the edge of the woods; and he spent hours wandering in them. His Scotch blood has filled his mind with mysticism. Deep in his heart, he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies,—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried him far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered. Strange as all this was in Germany, it was much stranger in America. It was extraordinary the joy he took that first summer in Peterboro (N. H.) in the woods, in the streams, in the sky, and the fact that it was all so new gave it a singular charm, which the American more often finds in Europe."

The suite is scored for a piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, a bass tuba kettle drums, bass drum, cymbals, and strings.

Mr. Apthorp explains:

"This composition is one of those bits of romantic writing which make technical analysis at once impertinent and futile. Each one of the five movements of which it is made up is perfectly free in form, containing the free development and working up of one or more principal ideas. And, as technical analysis is out of place, any would-be-poetic exegesis of the music would be still worse. All the extra-musical suggestion the composer has vouchsafed is contained in the titles of the several movements; and it would be failing rather than helping his artistic purpose to supplement these simple headings with suggestions which must necessarily have poetic meaning to the suggester only.

"It is best to let the music tell its own story to be understood as each listener likes best."

The suite includes: I. In a Haunted Forest; Largamente misterioso, A minor, 6-8; Allegro furiso, A minor, 6-8. II. Summer Idyl: Allegretto grazioso, A major, 6-8. III. In October: Allegro conbrio, F major, 6-8; Poco meno mosso, dolce, F. major 3-4. IV. The Shepherdess' Song; Andantino semplice, C major, 4-4. V. Forest Spirits: Molto allegro, A minor, 2-4; misterioso, un poco piuiento, D minor, 2-2, 6-4.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date JAN 31 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Thursday evening, January 30th in Memorial hall, will give Columbus its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck. It has been impossible to secure from the German emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years or to secure another leave of absence for one year. It is fortunate indeed, that Columbus is to have an opportunity to hear the orches-

[129]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address COLUMBUS, O.

Date JAN 26 1908

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is probably the foremost musical conductor in the world, which is some indication of how excellent is the symphony orchestra. He came to this country two years ago, and it was with great difficulty that permission was obtained from Kaiser William to let him come. The consent of the kaiser was attributed to his kindly feeling towards this country, and his wish that we should have the benefit of Dr. Muck's wonderful talent.

There has been going on for some time an effort to procure the return of the doctor to Germany, to resume his old position as director of the Royal opera of Berlin. This effort has been successful, and he will return next May, though it is said it is not his desire to do so; which fact may be attributed to the quiet influence of the emperor, who probably thinks he has done us a favor sufficiently generous in consenting to the doctor's absence so long.

At the entertainment to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Memorial hall next Thursday evening, Dr. Muck will appear as conductor, and they who attend will not only have the pleasure of seeing the greatest conductor in the world, but of hearing the greatest orchestra, and thus be able to discern the influence of a great master upon a company of famous musicians.

First Established and Largest Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address COLUMBUS O

Date JAN 28 1908

take its place.

BE ON TIME.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony concert, Thursday night, are urged to be on time. Better be half an hour in your seat, waiting for the first number, than out in the lobby, where every one must wait, if he comes after the first note is struck by the orchestra, when the doors will be closed until the completion of the Wallenstein Trilogy. It is a most unfortunate circumstance, when the symmetry of a great work is marred by having to be presented on the installment plan, made necessary by tardy arrivals. Dr. Muck demands the closing of all doors after the number begins, and the orchestra as well as the director deserve the courtesy of prompt and early finding of seats.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on next Thursday evening, Jan. 30, in Memorial hall, will give Columbus its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday morning, it has been impossible to secure from the German emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal opera in Berlin for the next four years or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. It is fortunate indeed that Columbus is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DISPATCH

COLUMBUS, O.

JAN 28 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The program for the concert at Memorial hall Thursday night is one that combines the classical with the tuneful. A particularly beautiful McDowell suite will be played. It is in five parts.

From .....

Address .....

Date JAN 28 1908

MCDOWELL SUITE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays here Thursday evening, will render a number by Edward McDowell, America's most distinguished composer, who died last week. His [illegible] will be played Thursday

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EXPRESS

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date JAN 28 1908

TRIUMPH FOR DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra gives Concert in Convention Hall before a big Crowd.

WENDLING AS SOLOIST

Violinist plays Mozart Concerto with much Success—Beautiful Work of the Orchestra.

A splendid climax to the orchestral concerts of this season in Buffalo was the concert given last evening in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. This famous organization is altogether too infrequent a visitor to Buffalo, and the fact that it is most welcome was proved by the very large audience assembled in the hall, and by the rounds of applause with which Dr. Muck and his players were greeted.

Interest naturally centered in the remarkable conductor whose fame had preceded him to this country and whose achievements during his year and a half in the United States have won for him the admiration of musicians and music lovers universally. Dr. Muck is a man of cultured and aristocratic bearing, who directs with the utmost quietness and absence of affectation. His graceful gestures are full of significance, however, and the response of his men to them is scarcely short of perfection. As Mendelssohn said of the conductor Lindpaintner, "It is as if he played the whole orchestra with his baton alone," so it may be said of Dr. Muck. The players are as one, swayed absolutely by each musical impulse of their leader.

Dr. Muck seems fond of strong contrasts and sudden, sharp accents, which he secures by an incisive gesture of hand or head. Again, his orchestra becomes lyric, a voice singing a siren song of sweetness, as the conductor stands almost motionless before it, hardly beating time at all. His wonderful and magnetic control was constantly evident, and the audience showed its appreciation of his splendid work by recalling Dr. Muck repeatedly at the close of the various numbers.

But even a great conductor cannot accomplish much if the means with which he works are defective. Dr. Muck is fortunate in having a wonderful body of players. The men are almost virtuosi on their chosen instruments, and one look at them shows them to be an uncommonly intelligent lot of musicians. They are equipped with good instruments, too, and they devote their whole time practically to orchestral work and preparation of the programmes they are to play. The result is the most lovely tonal quality that can be desired in an orchestra, and ample technical facility for whatever difficulties confront them. Strings, brasses and woodwind, each section is a delight to the ear. There is absolute unity in the playing of the men, there is the greatest variety and charm of shading, there is ever smooth and finished phrasing. In short, there are present all the virtues of beautiful orchestral playing, and the result is the keenest enjoyment on the part of the listeners.

There were but three numbers on last night's programme. They were Humperdinck's overture, The Forced Marriage, a novelty; Mozart's A major concerto for violin and orchestra, and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. In the Mozart concerto, the soloist was Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra. He played the simple, charming themes and intricate cadenzas with a dulcet tone, of flawless intonation, and with fine musicianship. Mr. Wendling won the favor of the audience no less by his unaffected and agreeable personality than by his delightful playing. The orchestral accompaniment which Dr. Muck gave the soloist was one not to be surpassed, ideal in every respect.

From TRUTH

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date FEB 1 1908

Dr. Karl Muck was greeted by an unusual audience when he appeared at Convention Hall on Monday night. It was the first appearance in Buffalo of this famous director, and he fully justified all that has been written of him. He is a most distinguished-looking man, and while his methods are of the quietest he still gives the impression of a man of immense reserve force, and it is certain that his reading of the program of Monday night was most scholarly and satisfying. Buffalo has once more proven her ability to appreciate the very best music, especially when rendered by such a justly world-famed organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From COMMERCIAL

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date JAN 28 1908

GREAT ENTHUSIASM.

It Was Evoked By the Concert Given By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A TRULY GALA EVENT.

Every Seat Occupied and Many Stood Throughout the Concert—Karl Muck's Splendid Work.

Seldom does a Buffalo audience show such enthusiasm over orchestral work as that with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last night at Convention Hall. Every available seat was occupied and numbers stood through the entire concert. It was a gala event, for it was the first time that the orchestra has played here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and everyone was on tiptoe with expectation.

Dr. Muck is a man of unusual musical ability and great personal magnetism. He wields the baton with the skill and power of a master, and has complete, almost magical control of his musicians. He has no mannerisms, but with ease and grace he sways his men in such a quiet and yet forceful manner that at times it seemed like one grand unity of sound from but a single instrument.

The program was a unique one in that it contained but three numbers—by Humperdinck, Mozart and Beethoven, respectively—and yet there was enough variety to please the most fastidious musician.

The overture to "The Forced Marriage," an opera by Engelbert Humperdinck, was given for the first time here, and was listened to with great interest. This composer is one of the few musicians who, though influenced much by Wagner's intense personality, has still retained great individuality in his writings. His charming opera, "Hansel and Gretel," which so captivated Europe a few years ago, showed the originality of the composer. The overture last night was so thoroughly the work of the artist that no one can deny him a place among the great composers of the past century.

The second number on the program was a concerto for violin in A major, by Mozart. In this the brilliant young concert-meister, Carl Wendling, astonished and delighted the audience with the ease and grace of his bowing and the power and richness of his tone. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim and attained such proficiency that he received the appointment of concert-meister to the king of Wurtemberg. It was to fill the vacancy made by the absence of Willy Hess that he secured permission to come to America for a year. The concerto has three movements, allegro aperto, adagio and tempo di menuetto, each of which was a gem—and the orchestral accompaniment added greatly to the charming effect.

Of the ten symphonies which Beethoven composed the one known as the Pastoral symphony in F major, though by no means one of the greatest, is yet one of the most popular because it presents a distinct realistic idea, and appeals to the average listener with more or less power. This symphony, the last number on the program, has four distinct movements. Beethoven, a true lover of nature, composed it in the country and intended to represent the rural scenes about him. The first movement portrays the calm impressions on arriving in the country; the second, a scene by the brookside. In this movement the andante is one of the most remarkable examples of pure beauty of sound-combination to be found in music. It represents the murmur of nature on a bright summer day with beautiful melodic sweetness and delicacy. At the close the notes of the nightingale (flute), quail (oboe) and cuckoo (clarinet) are heard. The third movement represents the merrymaking of the country folk, followed by a sudden thunder storm, which is truly sublime in its fury and intense realism.

Finally the storm abates and the shepherd's song is heard, and the peaceful quiet of a closing day. The various effects which this symphony was designed to represent were most skillfully and delightfully produced by the orchestra last night, and the audience departed with a greater love than ever for the dear old master, Beethoven, and a feeling of deep gratitude for the lofty interpretation given to his work by Dr. Muck and his splendid orchestra. It is certainly with great regret that we are obliged to announce that neither Dr. Muck nor Mr. Wendling will probably be heard in Buffalo again, for they have both been recalled to Germany, the former by Emperor William, and the latter by the king of Wurtemberg.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From COURIER

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date JAN 28 1908

GREAT AUDIENCE GREETS DR. MUCK

Leads Splendid Concert Given by Boston Symphony.

CARL WENDLING A MASTER VIOLINIST

A superb programme superbly presented by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as director, at Convention Hall evening was enjoyed by a vast audience, and seldom indeed is such a musical treat afforded the music-lovers of Buffalo. The occasion, too, was a notable one in that it was the first appearance in this city of Dr. Muck, whose fame as a musician and artist had preceded him long before his visit to America. In appearance this distinguished man is not unlike the late Richard Mansfield, and there is a certain fascination in watching him conduct his eminent body of musicians, who seem as one man to be thoroughly en rapport with his interpretations.

The first number, heard for the first time in Buffalo, was the overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage," by Humperdinck, which was rendered with perfection of tone, beauty of ensemble and a complete sympathy with the character of the work.

The exquisite Beethoven symphony in F major No. 6, "Pastoral," was given a magnificent reading by Dr. Muck, and all those qualities which have made him famous as a conductor were brilliantly demonstrated. The work of the orchestra was of delicate finesse, imposing virility and breadth, and a polished incisiveness in phrasing which made the performance one of singular beauty. The wonderful resources of the orchestra were artistically brought out in the four movements, the exquisite and graceful melody of the first melting into the second more impressive one, while the joyous harmony in the third movement so gradually changed to the terrifying effect of the thunder storm and its crashing peals that all the dramatic possibilities were skilfully brought out.

"The Shepherd's Song," in the closing movement, delightfully displayed the effective shading.

The soloist, Carl Wendling, concert-meister, played the Mozart Concerto for violin in A major No. 5, accompanied by the orchestra, in a manner which showed him to be the ideal combination of virtuoso and musician, and a worthy pupil of the great Joachim. His technic is formidable, he plays with great fluency of tone and his bold and vigorous bow stroke and temperament give the greatest vitality and life to his playing. His conception of the beautiful adagio was a memorable one, Mr. Wendling was given an enthusiastic recall. Once again last evening Buffalo ably demonstrated that concerts of this kind are thoroughly appreciated and that the best in music is none too good.

For high class printing or engraving see The Evans-Penfold Co., 302 Main Street, upstairs, but it's worth while.

From .....

Address .....

Date JAN 27 1908

DR. MUCK MUST RETURN TO GERMANY.

Great Orchestra Leader Has Been Recalled by the Emperor.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German Emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years, or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May.

That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be very generally admitted. He has made a most profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate indeed that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats range from 75 cents to $

[130]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is probably the foremost musical conductor in the world, which is some indication of how excellent is the symphony orchestra. He came to this country two years ago, and it was with great difficulty that permission was obtained from Kaiser William to let him come. The consent of the kaiser was attributed to his kindly feeling towards this country, and his wish that we should have the benefit of Dr. Muck's wonderful talent.

There has been going on for some time an effort to procure the return of the doctor to Germany, to resume his old position as director of the Royal opera of Berlin. This effort has been successful, and he will return next May, though it is said it is not his desire to do so; which fact may be attributed to the quiet influence of the emperor, who probably thinks he has done us a favor sufficiently generous in consenting to the doctor's absence so long.

At the entertainment to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra; at Memorial hall next Thursday evening, Dr. Muck will appear as conductor, and they who attend will not only have the pleasure of seeing the greatest conductor in the world, but of hearing the greatest orchestra, and thus be able to discern the influence of a great master upon a company of famous musicians.

First Established and Largest Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

take its place.

BE ON TIME.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony concert, Thursday night, are urged to be on time. Better be half an hour in your seat, waiting for the first number, than out in the lobby, where every one must wait, if he comes after the first note is struck by the orchestra, when the doors will be closed until the completion of the Wallenstein Trilogy. It is a most unfortunate circumstance, when the symmetry of a great work is marred by having to be presented on the installment plan, made necessary by tardy arrivals. Dr. Muck demands the closing of all doors after the number begins, and the orchestra as well as the director deserve the courtesy of prompt and early finding of seats.

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on next Thursday evening, Jan. 30, in Memorial hall, will give Columbus its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday morning, it has been impossible to secure from the German emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal opera in Berlin for the next four years or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. It is fortunate indeed that Columbus is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O.
JAN 29 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The program for the concert at Memorial hall Thursday night is one that combines the classical with the tuneful. A particularly beautiful McDowell suite will be played. It is in five parts.

From
Address
Date
JAN 28

M'DOWELL SUITE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays here Thursday evening, will render a number by Edward McDowell, America's most distinguished composer, who died last week. His suite which will be played Thursday evening is in five parts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
From
Address
Date
JAN 28 1908

TRIUMPH FOR DR. MUCK AND HIS MEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra gives Concert in Convention Hall before a big Crowd.

WENDLING AS SOLOIST

Violinist plays Mozart Concerto with much Success—Beautiful Work of the Orchestra.

A splendid climax to the orchestral concerts of this season in Buffalo was the concert given last evening in Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. This famous organization is altogether too infrequent a visitor to Buffalo, and the fact that it is most welcome was proved by the very large audience assembled in the hall, and by the rounds of applause with which Dr. Muck and his players were greeted.

Interest naturally centered in the remarkable conductor whose fame had preceded him to this country and whose achievements during his year and a half in the United States have won for him the admiration of musicians and music lovers universally. Dr. Muck is a man of cultured and aristocratic bearing, who directs with the utmost quietness and absence of affectation. His graceful gestures are full of significance, however, and the response of his men to them is scarcely short of perfection. As Mendelssohn said of the conductor Lindpaintner, "It is as if he played the whole orchestra with his baton alone," so it may be said of Dr. Muck. The players are as one, swayed absolutely by each musical impulse of their leader.

Dr. Muck seems fond of strong contrasts and sudden, sharp accents, which he secures by an incisive gesture of hand or head. Again, his orchestra becomes lyric, a voice singing a siren song of sweetness, as the conductor stands almost motionless before it, hardly beating time at all. His wonderful and magnetic control was constantly evident, and the audience showed its appreciation of his splendid work by recalling Dr. Muck repeatedly at the close of the various numbers.

But even a great conductor cannot accomplish much if the means with which he works are defective. Dr. Muck is fortunate in having a wonderful body of players. The men are almost virtuosi on their chosen instruments, and one look at them shows them to be an uncommonly intelligent lot of musicians. They are equipped with good instruments, too, and they devote their whole time practically to orchestral work and preparation of the programmes they are to play. The result is the most lovely tonal quality that can be desired in an orchestra, and ample technical facility for whatever difficulties confront them. Strings, brasses and woodwind, each section is a delight to the ear. There is absolute unity in the playing of the men, there is the greatest variety and charm of shading, there is ever smooth and finished phrasing. In short, there are present all the virtues of beautiful orchestral playing, and the result is the keenest enjoyment on the part of the listeners.

There were but three numbers on last night's programme. They were Humperdinck's overture, The Forced Marriage, a novelty; Mozart's A major concerto for violin and orchestra, and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. In the Mozart concerto, the soloist was Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra. He played the simple, charming themes and intricate cadenzas with a dulcet tone of flawless intonation, and with fine musicianship. Mr. Wendling won the favor of the audience no less by his unaffected and agreeable personality than by his delightful playing. The orchestral accompaniment which Dr. Muck gave the soloist was one not to be surpassed, ideal in every respect.

From
Address
Date
FEB

Dr. Karl Muck was greeted by an unusual audience when he appeared at Convention Hall on Monday night. It was the first appearance in Buffalo of this famous director, and he fully justified all that has been written of him. He is a most distinguished-looking man, and while his methods are of the quietest he still gives the impression of a man of immense reserve force, and it is certain that his reading of the program of Monday night was most scholarly and satisfying. Buffalo has once more proven her ability to appreciate the very best music, especially when rendered by such a justly world-famed organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 28 1908

GREAT ENTHUSIASM.

It Was Evoked By the Concert Given By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A TRULY GALA EVENT.

Every Seat Occupied and Many Stood Throughout the Concert—Karl Muck's Splendid Work.

Seldom does a Buffalo audience show such enthusiasm over orchestral work as that with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last night at Convention Hall. Every available seat was occupied and numbers stood through the entire concert. It was a gala event, for it was the first time that the orchestra has played here under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and everyone was on tiptoe with expectation.

Dr. Muck is a man of unusual musical ability and great personal magnetism. He wields the baton with the skill and power of a master, and has complete, almost magical control of his musicians. He has no mannerisms, but with ease and grace he sways his men in such a quiet and yet forceful manner that at times it seemed like one grand unity of sound from but a single instrument.

The program was a unique one in that it contained but three numbers—by Humperdinck, Mozart and Beethoven, respectively—and yet there was enough variety to please the most fastidious musician.

The overture to "The Forced Marriage," an opera by Engelbert Humperdinck, was given for the first time here, and was listened to with great interest. This composer is one of the few musicians who, though influenced much by Wagner's intense personality, has still retained great individuality in his writings. His charming opera, "Hansel and Gretel," which so captivated Europe a few years ago, showed the originality of the composer. The overture last night was so thoroughly the work of the artist that no one can deny him a place among the great composers of the past century.

The second number on the program was a concerto for violin in A major, by Mozart. In this the brilliant young concert-meister, Carl Wendling, astonished and delighted the audience with the ease and grace of his bowing and the power and richness of his tone. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim and attained such proficiency that he received the appointment of concert-meister to the king of Wurtemberg. It was to fill the vacancy made by the absence of Willy Hess that he secured permission to come to America for a year. The concerto has three movements, allegro aperto, adagio and tempo di menuetto, each of which was a gem—and the orchestral accompaniment added greatly to the charming effect.

Of the ten symphonies which Beethoven composed the one known as the Pastoral symphony in F major, though by no means one of the greatest, is yet one of the most popular because it presents a distinct realistic idea, and appeals to the average listener with more or less power. This symphony, the last number on the program, has four distinct movements. Beethoven, a true lover of nature, composed it in the country and intended to represent the rural scenes about him. The first movement portrays the calm impressions on arriving in the country; the second, a scene by the brookside. In this movement the andante is one of the most remarkable examples of pure beauty of sound-combination to be found in music. It represents the murmur of nature on a bright summer day with beautiful melodic sweetness and delicacy. At the close the notes of the nightingale (flute), quail (oboe) and cuckoo (clarinet) are heard. The third movement represents the merrymaking of the country folk, followed by a sudden thunder storm, which is truly sublime in its fury and intense realism.

Finally the storm abates and the shepherd's song is heard, and the peaceful quiet of a closing day. The various effects which this symphony was designed to represent were most skillfully and delightfully produced by the orchestra last night, and the audience departed with a greater love than ever for the dear old master, Beethoven, and a feeling of deep gratitude for the lofty interpretation given to his work by Dr. Muck and his splendid orchestra. It is certainly with great regret that we are obliged to announce that neither Dr. Muck nor Mr. Wendling will probably be heard in Buffalo again, for they have both been recalled to Germany, the former by Emperor William, and the latter by the king of Wurtemberg.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date
COURIER.
BUFFALO, N. Y.
JAN 28 1908

GREAT AUDIENCE GREETS DR. MUCK

Leads Splendid Concert Given by Boston Symphony.

CARL WENDLING A MASTER VIOLINIST

A superb programme superbly presented by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as director, at Convention Hall last evening was enjoyed by a vast audience, and seldom indeed is such a musical treat afforded the music-lovers of Buffalo. The occasion, too, was a notable one in that it was the first appearance in this city of Dr. Muck, whose fame as a musician and artist had preceded him long before his visit to America. In appearance this distinguished man is not unlike the late Richard Mansfield, and there is a certain fascination in watching him conduct his eminent body of musicians, who seem as one man to be thoroughly en rapport with his interpretations.

The first number, heard for the first time in Buffalo, was the overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage," by Humperdinck, which was rendered with perfection of tone, beauty of ensemble and a complete sympathy with the character of the work.

The exquisite Beethoven symphony in F major No. 6, "Pastoral," was given a magnificent reading by Dr. Muck and all those qualities which have made him famous as a conductor were brilliantly demonstrated. The work of the orchestra was of delicate finesse, imposing virility and breadth, and a polished incisiveness in phrasing which made the performance one of singular beauty. The wonderful resources of the orchestra were artistically brought out in the four movements, the exquisite and graceful melody of the first melting into the second more impressive one, while the joyous harmony in the third movement so gradually changed to the terrifying effect of the thunder storm and its crashing peals that all the dramatic possibilities were skilfully brought out.

"The Shepherd's Song," in the closing movement, delightfully displayed the effective shading.

The soloist, Carl Wendling, concert-meister, played the Mozart Concerto for violin in A major No. 5, accompanied by the orchestra, in a manner which showed him to be the ideal combination of virtuoso and musician, and a worthy pupil of the great Joachim. His technic is formidable, he plays with great fluency of tone and his bold and vigorous bow stroke and temperament give the greatest vitality and life to his playing. His conception of the beautiful adagio was a memorable one. Mr. Wendling was given an enthusiastic recall. Once again last evening Buffalo ably demonstrated that concerts of this kind are thoroughly appreciated and that the best in music is none too good.

For high class printing or engraving see The Evans-Penfold Co., 302 Main Street, upstairs, but it's worth while.

From
Address
Date

DR. MUCK MUST RETURN TO GERMANY.

Great Orchestra Leader Has Been Recalled by the Emperor.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German Emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years, or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May.

That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be very generally admitted. He has made a most profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate indeed that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats range from 75 cents to $2.

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

...FFALO, N. Y.

...JAN 28 1908

...MUSICAL ...FECT PROVIDED AT ...ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Greeted by Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

Dr. Karl Muck and his splendidly equipped organization, perhaps better known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their long heralded appearance at Convention Hall last evening before an audience that tested the capacity of that large structure. The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo is always looked forward to with confiding interest by the music loving people of this city and last evening they were present in large numbers to enjoy the rich musical feast that was provided. The program included Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage;" Mozart's concerto for violin and orchestra in A Major, No. 5 and the Beethoven symphony in F. Major, No. 6 Op. 68, "The Pastoral," in six movements. Mr. Carl Wendling the concert master of the orchestra was the soloist of the evening and in the Mozart number he distinguished himself by his playing. His tone is big and clear and he gave a soulful and artistic interpretation of the Mozart music. His work shows him to be an artist of brilliant attainments. The playing of the orchestra in this number displayed the splendid training the members have had under the master hand of Dr. Muck. The Humperdinck music was played with a dash and spirit which brought rounds of applause from the delighted audience. But it was in the Beethoven symphony that the orchestra was seen and heard at its best. Here as in the two other numbers th ediscipline and training of Dr. Muck was in evidence. There was a distinctness of comprehension, true and clear in every note sounded. Steadily the conductor found the underlying melody and kept it. Steadily he gained from his men a richness of tone that clothed it with a new depth and mellowness. The insistant song of the first movement wallowed warmly against its dusky background until both merged in the calm pool of golden tone with which conductor and musicians brought the first movement to its close. And the "Jolly Gathering of Country Folk" was rich in tone pictures painted by master hands. They fairly reveled in its entrancing strains. The finale leaped to the ear, warm and exultant. The pace, the spirit of the performance gave it a new and strange ardor. The performance was one long to be remembered by those who were fortunate enough to be present. This is Dr. Muck's last year with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for after this season he will return to Berlin by command of the German Emperor.

...TIMES

...ess

...JAN 7 1908

...UCK SOON TO RETURN TO THE FATHERLAND

Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which came to town this morning for its concert at Convention Hall tonight, is one of Kaiser Wilhelm's most intimate friends and he said this afternoon that before leaving Boston on Saturday night he sent a cablegram to the Kaiser congratulating him on his 50th birthday, which occurs today.

Dr. Muck is the first conductor of the Royal Opera House at Berlin and was been recalled by the Kaiser after two seasons spent in this country as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded as the first orchestra of the United States and started a few years ago by Richard Hyde on his visit to this country.

When he came to the United States years ago Dr. Muck did not expect to find as fine an orchestra here as the Boston Symphony, nor did he expect to find the American public so truly appreciative of the best musical offerings.

In a talk with a TIMES reporter at the Iroquois Hotel early this afternoon Dr. Muck paid a fine compliment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to the fine musical appreciation of the people of the United States. He said that he regretted very much that he had to return to his duties at Berlin and that a further chance was not to be afforded him to know this country and its people better. He said that his two seasons as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had imbued him with the greatness of the American people. He said that he had spent nearly in the orchestra for today's concert and that the program selected for tonight was one of the ... has been arranged up to the ... for the orchestra in its ...

...FFALO, N. Y.

...JAN 28 1908

BRILLIANT AND BEAUTIFUL WORK OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. MUCK

Splendid Program Before Appreciative Audience at Convention Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably as truly a subject for national pride as anything in the length or breadth of this great country. Go where one will, it would be impossible to find an organization superior to this band of artists. The world-famous orchestra under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck gave a concert of remarkable beauty in Convention Hall last night. Dr. Muck is a conductor of the modern school, very quiet in manner, but absolute master of the different forces under his direction. One is amazed at times at a certain vividness and fire which is called to life in a composition, as with double basses and the brass in the third or fourth movements of the pastoral symphony last night. None but a great conductor can give a frequently heard work and so fill it with vitality and spontaneity that one seems to be listening to it for the first time. Dr. Muck produces that rarity, a real pianissimo with his orchestra. Then at the moments when he uses the brass it sounds as if the greatest glory of the orchestra lay there until we hear the wood wind and the strings.

Humperdinck's Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage," was played here for the first time last night. It is a brilliantly orchestrated work, bringing into play all the resources of modern instrumentation, and as given by Dr. Muck was a work of great effect. The magnificent performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony cannot be too highly praised. The wonderful manner in which phrases were defined and the individual beauty of instruments brought out, while through and above all was the dominant mood and character of the whole movement, was shown by Dr. Muck and his orchestra in the entire symphony put very especially in the "Scene by the Brook Side."

Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, gave a very fine performance of Mozart's A major violin concerto. Mr. Wendling plays with extreme purity and finish, his interpretation showing the charm, serene and classic beauty of Mozart's music to perfection. Dr. Muck's orchestral accompaniment to the concerto was most masterly. A very large audience was present, completely filling Convention Hall.

...N. Y.

...ess

...e ...JAN 7 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Splendid Program Prepared for the Musical Feast at Convention Hall.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German Emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be very generally admitted. He has made a most profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate indeed that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats range from 75 cents to $2.

...COMMERCIAL

...BUFFALO, N. Y.

...ss

A farewell dinner in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been arranged by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard, to take place at the Harvard Union, on Feb. 3. The speakers at the dinner will include Major H. ... Higginson, President Eliot and Professors Munsterberg and Spalding.

[131]

...COMMERCIAL

...BUFFALO, N. Y.

...ess

...JAN 27 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT.

Conducted By Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin—Emperor Insists That He Return.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced through the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years, or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be generally admitted. He has made a profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate, indeed, that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8.15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats are from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om ...EXPRESS

...ddress ...JAN 27 1908

DR. MUCK TONIGHT.

Celebrated Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo.

A slender, dark, astute man, with something of the dandy in his dress and with the merriest eyes imaginable, arrived at The Iroquois late last evening. He was Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert this evening in Convention Hall that will be one of the greatest musical treats Buffalo has ever experienced.

With Dr. Muck were his wife, Frau Muck, who is greatly distressed over the fact that Kaiser Wilhelm has recalled her husband to his post in Berlin, as she is very fond of America; Mr. Sauerquelle, the orchestra librarian, and Carl Wendling, the handsome young concert-meister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is this evening's soloist.

Early this afternoon the orchestra will arrive by special train, accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee. There are 85 men in all, the largest orchestra that has ever visited Buffalo.

This evening's concert begins promptly at 8.15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Seats are on sale today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices vary from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om ...COLUMBUS, O

...dress

...te ...

HAP WARD.

Hap Ward is said to have new filling for his musical absurdity, "Not Yet, But Soon," which opens a three-days' engagement at the High Street theater this afternoon. The piece presents this funny clown comedian as in charge of a sanitarium for the procuring of tenants for top flats. The locale is "Bughouse on the Hudson" and a company of 50, including a singing chorus, will introduce many songs and other specialties.

ORCHESTRA TONIGHT.

Tonight in Memorial hall the long talked-of and eagerly anticipated Boston Symphony orchestra concert will take place. A large audience will greet the orchestra, a body of a hundred men, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera in Berlin. The concert-meister, Carl Wendling, is an unusually young man to hold such an important place, having been born in 1875—yet he has held a similar position for the past eight years. Mr. Wendling has been concert-meister under Hans Richter in London, under Dr. Karl Muck in Bayreuth at the Wagner festivals and with the celebrated orchestra in Meiningen under Steinbach. After four years under Steinbach, he went to Stuttgart to be concert-meister in the court theater of the king of Wurtemburg.

The patrons of the concert are urged to come in the hall in good season tonight, ... the seats not later

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

...om ...STAR

...ddress ...NEWARK, N. J.

...ate ...FEB 1- 1908

Dr. Muck's Departure.

Dr. Karl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally, and after much hesitation, did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 8. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet and it will likely be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

...FEB 1- 1908

...Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not be connected with that organization after the present season, his duties as conductor at the Royal Opera at Berlin obliging him to return there from the leave of absence granted him by the German Emperor.

...POST

...ss

THE Boston Symphony management announces that Dr. Muck will not return to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave extended for another year, it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of the time. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston, and could not spare him any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performance there.

...HERALD

...WASHINGTON, D. C.

...ress

...e ...FEB 2- 1908

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the last opportunity but one to enjoy the work of ... Carl Muck, the conductor who ... this country at the end of ... 15

ARTICLE INCOMPLETE

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess ..... JAN 28 1908

RICH MUSICAL FEAST PROVIDED AT ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Greeted by Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

Dr. Karl Muck and his splendidly equipped organization, perhaps better known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their long heralded appearance at Convention Hall last evening before an audience that tested the capacity of that large structure. The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo is always looked forward to with confiding interest by the music loving people of this city and last evening they were present in large numbers to enjoy the rich musical feast that was provided. The program included Humperdinck's overture, "The Forced Marriage;" Mozart's concerto for violin and orchestra in A Major, No. 5 and the Beethoven Symphony in F. Major, No. 6 Op. 68, "The Pastoral," in six movements. Mr. Carl Wendling the concert master of the orchestra was the soloist of the evening and in the Mozart number he distinguished himself by his playing. His tone is big and clear and he gave a soulful and artistic interpretation of the Mozart music. His work shows him to be an artist of brilliant attainments. The playing of the orchestra in this number displayed the splendid training the members have had under the master hand of Dr. Muck. The Humperdinck music was played with a dash and spirit which brought rounds of applause from the delighted audience. But it was in the Beethoven symphony that the orchestra was seen and heard at its best. Here as in the two other numbers th ediscipline and training of Dr. Muck was in evidence. There was a distinctness of comprehension, true and clear in every note sounded. Steadily the conductor found the underlying melody and kept it. Steadily he gained from his men a richness of tone that clothed it with a new depth and mellowness. The insistant song of the first movement flowed warmly against its dusky background until both merged in the calm pool of golden tone with which conductor and musicians brought the first movement to its close. And the "Jolly Gathering of Country Folk" was rich in tone pictures painted by master hands. They fairly reveled in its entrancing strains. The finale leaped to the ear, warm and exultant. The pace, the spirit of the performance gave it a new and strange ardor. The performance was one long to be remembered by those who were fortunate enough to be present. This is Dr. Muck's last year with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for after this season he will return to Berlin by command of the German Emperor.

n .....

ress .....

7 JAN 28

MUCK SOON TO RETURN TO THE FATHERLAND

Dr. Karl Muck, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which came to town this morning for its concert at Convention Hall tonight, is one of Kaiser Wilhelm's most intimate friends and he said this afternoon that before leaving Boston on Saturday night he sent a cablegram to the Kaiser congratulating him on his 50th birthday, which occurs today.

Dr. Muck is the first conductor of the Royal Opera House at Berlin and has been recalled by the Kaiser after two seasons spent in this country as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded as the first orchestra of the United States and so rated a few years ago by Richard Strauss on his visit to this country.

When he came to the United States two years ago Dr. Muck did not expect to find as fine an orchestra here as the Boston Symphony, nor did he expect to find the American public as keenly appreciative of the best musical offerings.

In a talk with a TIMES reporter at the Iroquois Hotel early this afternoon Dr. Muck paid a fine compliment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to the fine musical appreciation of the people of the United States. He said that he regretted very much that he had to return to his duties at Berlin and that a further chance was not to be afforded him to know this country and its people better. He said that his two seasons as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had imbued him with the greatness of the American people. He said that he had about ninety in the orchestra for tonight's concert and that the program arranged for tonight was one of the best that has been arranged up to the present time for the orchestra in its present season.

BRILLIANT AND BEAUTIFUL WORK OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. MUCK

Splendid Program Before Appreciative Audience at Convention Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is unquestionably as truly a subject for national pride as anything in the length or breadth of this great country. Go where one will, it would be impossible to find an organization superior to this band of artists. The world-famous orchestra under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck gave a concert of remarkable beauty in Convention Hall last night. Dr. Muck is a conductor of the modern school, very quiet in manner, but absolute master of the different forces under his direction. One is amazed at times at a certain vividness and fire which is called to life in a composition, as with double basses and the brass in the third or fourth movements of the pastoral symphony last night. None but a great conductor can give a frequently heard work and so fill it with vitality and spontaneity that one seems to be listening to it for the first time. Dr. Muck produces that rarity, a real pianissimo with his orchestra. Then at the moments when he uses the brass it sounds as if the greatest glory of the orchestra lay there until we hear the wood wind and the strings.

Humperdinck's Overture to the opera, "The Forced Marriage," was played here for the first time last night. It is a brilliantly orchestrated work, bringing into play all the resources of modern instrumentation, and as given by Dr. Muck was a work of great effect. The magnificent performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony cannot be too highly praised. The wonderful manner in which phrases were defined and the individual beauty of instruments brought out, while through and above all was the dominant mood and character of the whole movement, was shown by Dr. Muck and his orchestra in the entire symphony put very especially in the "Scene by the Brook Side."

Mr. Carl Wendling, concertmaster of the orchestra, gave a very fine performance of Mozart's A major violin concerto. Mr. Wendling plays with extreme purity and finish, his interpretation showing the charm, serene and classic beauty of Mozart's music to perfection. Dr. Muck's orchestral accompaniment to the concerto was most masterly. A very large audience was present, completely filling Convention Hall.

n .....

ress .....

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Splendid Program Prepared for the Musical Feast at Convention Hall.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the inspired direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced throughout the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German Emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be very generally admitted. He has made a most profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate indeed that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8:15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats range from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

COMMERCIAL

ss ..... BUFFALO, N. Y

A farewell dinner in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been arranged by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard, to take place at the Harvard Union, on Feb. 3. The speakers at the dinner will include Major H. Higginson, President Eliot and Professors Munsterberg and Spalding.

[13]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

COMMERCIAL

BUFFALO, N. Y

ess .....

JAN 27 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT.

Conducted By Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin—Emperor Insists That He Return.

This evening's concert at Convention Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give Buffalo its only opportunity of hearing this great orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

As was generally announced through the papers of the country last Thursday, it has been impossible to secure from the German emperor either Dr. Muck's release from the contract which holds him as first conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the next four years, or to secure another leave of absence of one year. So the orchestra has again to go conductor hunting, and Dr. Muck's stay in America ends next May. That Dr. Muck's departure is a decided misfortune to the art in this country will be generally admitted. He has made a profound impression as conductor of Boston's splendid orchestra, and it is indeed a question whether he is not the greatest conductor that has ever come to America. He will be missed in more ways than one, because, aside from his genius as a musician, his delightful and winning personality has gained for him a host of friends wherever he has gone. It is fortunate, indeed, that Buffalo is to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under this great man.

The concert this evening begins promptly at 8.15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. Prices of seats are from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

ddress .....

DR. MUCK TONIGHT.

Celebrated Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo.

A slender, dark, astute man, with something of the dandy in his dress and with the merriest eyes imaginable, arrived at The Iroquois late last evening. He was Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives a concert this evening in Convention Hall that will be one of the greatest musical treats Buffalo has ever experienced.

With Dr. Muck were his wife, Frau Muck, who is greatly distressed over the fact that Kaiser Wilhelm has recalled her husband to his post in Berlin, as she is very fond of America; Mr. Sauerquelle, the orchestra librarian, and Carl Wendling, the handsome young concert meister to the King of Wurtemberg, who is this evening's soloist.

Early this afternoon the orchestra will arrive by special train, accompanied by the assistant manager, Fred R. Comee. There are 85 men in all, the largest orchestra that has ever visited Buffalo.

This evening's concert begins promptly at 8.15 o'clock and the audience is asked to assemble early, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing.

Seats are on sale today at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. Prices very from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

HAP WARD.

Hap Ward is said to have new filling for his musical absurdity, "Not Yet, But Soon," which opens a three-days' engagement at the High Street theater this afternoon. The piece presents this funny clown comedian as in charge of a sanitarium for the procuring of tenants for top hats. The locale is "Bughouse on the Hudson" and a company of 50, including a singing chorus, will introduce many songs and other specialties.

ORCHESTRA TONIGHT.

Tonight in Memorial hall the long-talked-of and eagerly anticipated Boston Symphony orchestra concert will take place. A large audience will greet the orchestra, a body of a hundred men, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera in Berlin. The concert-meister, Carl Wendling, is an unusually young man to hold such an important place, having been born in 1875—yet he has held a similar position for the past eight years. Mr. Wendling has been concert-meister under Hans Richter in London, under Dr. Karl Muck in Bayreuth at the Wagner festivals and with the celebrated orchestra in Meiningen under Steinbach. After four years under Steinbach, he went to Stuttgart to be concert-meister in the court theater of the king of Wurtemburg.

The patrons of the concert are urged to come to the hall in good season tonight, being in the seats not later than 8 o'clock, and the doors will be closed at that hour, and not opened during the first number, which will last

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate ..... FEB 1 - 1908

Dr. Muck's Departure.

Dr. Karl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally, and after much hesitation, did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet and it will likely be well into the spring before an announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

...

...

...

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 2 - 1908

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year, it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the Orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston, and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 1 1908

Miss M. Katherine Locke, M.A., will make the last of her Brooklyn Institute lecture recitals on "Romanticism of the Nineteenth Century as Expressed in Music," a memorial to the American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, of whom she was a personal friend. His music will be interpreted by Miss Laura L. Combs, soprano of the First Presbyterian Church, who has sung at several of these lecture recitals, and Miss Ellen M. Treat, piano. The topic is "The Aftermath of Romanticism in America—MacDowell," and the lecture recital takes place at Association Hall on Friday at 4 P.M.

Tschaikowsky's beautiful opera, "Eugene Onegin," will be produced in concert form by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra at the fourth matinee concert here on March 7 at the Baptist Temple. Emilio de Gogorza will sing the title role. The other characters will be interpreted by various soloists and the choruses by the New York Oratorio Society. It will be practically the same performance as that of to-night and to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall. These productions will be the first performances in America of any of Tschaikowsky's operatic works, of which "Eugene Onegin" is the most melodious and most popular in all continental operatic centers.

"In addition to concerts already mentioned in this column three of note are to be presented under Brooklyn Institute auspices this month, together with a lecture recital on the Boston Symphony concert, by Daniel Gregory Mason, and a course of lecture recitals on "Important Chapters in Musical History," by Carl Fique. The concerts are a chamber music concert by the Olive Mead Quartet, at Association Hall on February 13; the Boston Symphony concert, with Fritz Kreisler, violin, at the Baptist Temple on February 21, and a song recital by Mme. Gadski, with Frank La Forge at the piano, at the same place on February 27.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 1 1908

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

The First Established and (1908) Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
PUBLIC.
PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 2 - 1908

DOCTOR MUCK'S DEPARTURE

From all sides are heard expressions of regret that Dr. Karl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Doctor Muck obtained his first leave of absence for the season of 1906-07 only after signing a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. It required all the influence the Boston management could bring to bear to have this leave of absence extended to cover the current season. Doctor Muck refused to do anything in the matter, although he was personally anxious to stay because he felt he could not in good faith ask the Kaiser to further extend the time first agreed upon, the royal consent to the second year here being regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Early in the present season it was hoped in Boston that some way might be found to release Doctor Muck from the contract, but the authorities would not listen to propositions to this effect, and Doctor Muck will go to Berlin in May, spending the summer in Bayreuth, where he will conduct the festival performances. All reports regarding his successor are as yet mere rumors. It is stated that no one has been engaged, and it will be well into the spring before there is any authoritative announcement regarding Doctor Muck's successor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 2 - 1908

From all sides are heard expressions of regret that Dr. Carl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May. With Mrs. Muck, he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. All reports regarding his successor in Boston are declared to be unfounded.

BULLETIN
PHILA. PA
FEB 1 - 1908

The refusal of the Kaiser to release Dr. Muck from his contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin, after granting him two years' absence, necessitates the procuring of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season. The management of that organization states that all reports regarding Dr. Muck's successor may be considered as unfounded rumors. No one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra is made. During the early part of this season it was hoped that some way would be found for Dr. Muck's release from the Berlin contract, but the authorities there, it is said, would not listen to any proposition to that end.

WORLD,
New York City.
FEB 2 1908

Music Notes.

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally, and after much hesitation, did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
FEB 2 - 1908

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Dr. Muck geht. — Von den Opernhäusern. — Musikalische Notizen. — Kommende Konzerte.

Die Nachricht, daß es nicht möglich war, für Dr. Muck einen weiteren Urlaub zu erlangen, der es gestattet hätte, diesen bedeutenden Dirigenten auch weiterhin dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu erhalten, hat in den musikalischen Kreisen New York's und Boston's lebhaftes Bedauern erweckt. Dr. Muck stand bekanntlich, als er für das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester gewonnen wurde, unter kontraktlichen Verpflichtungen mit dem Berliner königlichen Opernhaus, und es kostete ihm große Anstrengungen, einen einjährigen Urlaub für Boston zu erlangen. Im Dezember 1906 wurden seitens des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters alle Mittel aufgeboten, um für Dr. Muck einen längeren Urlaub zu erlangen. Der Dirigent selbst weigerte sich damals, an Kaiser Wilhelm mit einem solchen Anliegen persönlich heranzutreten, da er sein Wort gegeben habe, nach einjähriger Abwesenheit wieder an seinen Kapellmeisterposten in der Berliner Hofoper zurückzukehren. Es gelang bekanntlich, ein weiteres Jahr Urlaub zu erlangen, was hier allgemein als eine ganz ungewöhnliche Konzession des Kaisers den Wünschen in Amerika gegenüber angesehen wurde. Es fehlte auch diesmal nicht an Bemühungen, Dr. Muck länger an Boston zu fesseln, doch war Alles vergebens, und der genannte Dirigent wird am 1. und 2. Mai seine letzten Bostoner Konzerte dirigiren und dann nach Berlin zurückkehren. Dr. Muck wird während der im kommenden Sommer stattfindenden Bayreuther Festspiele wieder den „Parsifal" dirigiren.

Alle im Umlauf befindlichen Gerüchte über die Person des Nachfolgers Dr. Muck's sind aus der Luft gegriffen. Es besteht selbstverständlich kein Zweifel darüber, daß für diesen Posten nur ein ganz hervorragender Fachmann gewonnen werden wird, doch sind alle kolportirten Nachrichten betreffs der Persönlichkeit des nächsten Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wie gesagt, gegenstandslos.

SUN,
New York City.
FEB 2 1908

DR. MUCK'S DEPARTURE.

No Truth in the Stories of the Choice of His Successor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management sends the following, which is official:

"From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season; although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-07 only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907.

"When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time.

"That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

"Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be conductor of the 'Parsifal' performances there.

"All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made."

GRO
Cambridge, Mass.
Ehren Dr. K. Muck's, des ausscheidenden Boston Symphonie Orchesters, heute Abend in der Harvard Union unter den Auspicien des „Deutschen Vereins" der Universität ein Bankett gegeben, an dem etwa 75 Personen theilnahmen. Unter den Tafelredner, u. a. Präsident Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg, Major Higginson und Prof. W. R. Spalding vom Musik-Departement der Harvard-Universität theilnahmen. F. Hanfstaengel vom Deutschen Verein stellte die Redner der Versammlung vor und zwar in deutscher Sprache. Auch Prof. Münsterberg bediente sich bei seiner Rede der deutschen Sprache, während alle anderen Redner englisch sprachen.

Dr. Muck kehrt am Schluß der Winter-Saison auf Befehl Kaiser Wilhelms nach Deutschland zurück, um das Amt als Kapellmeister am Königlichen Opern Haus zu übernehmen.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
FEB 4 - 1908

Abschiedsfeier für Dr. Muck.

Cambridge, Mass., 3. Febr. In der Harvard Union wurde heute Abend ein Abschiedsdiner zu Ehren von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, unter den Auspicien des Deutschen Vereins der Universität gegeben. Es wohnten demselben 75 Personen bei. Unter den Rednern fanden sich der Universitätspräsident Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg, Major Hy. L. Higginson und Prof. W. R. Spalding vom Musikdepartement der Harvard-Universität. Vorsitzender F. Hanfstaengle vom Deutschen Verein stellte die Redner der Versammlung vor und zwar in deutscher Sprache. Auch Prof. Münsterberg bediente sich bei seiner Rede der deutschen Sprache, während alle anderen Redner englisch sprachen.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
FEB 4 - 1908

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. That the Kaiser, after much hesitation, gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 4 - 1908

Farewell to Dr. Muck.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Feb. 3.—As a tribute to his work as a leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a farewell dinner was tendered Dr. Karl Muck to-night at Harvard Union by the German Society of the university. President Eliot, Professor Muensterberg and Prof. Spaulding spoke briefly complimenting Herr Muck on his success here.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
FEB 2 -

That Dr. Karl Muck must relinquish at the end of this season his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in order to resume his duties at the Berlin Royal Opera is now officially announced. Much regret is felt in Boston at the thought of Dr. Muck's departure, and a good deal will be felt here. There is ample justification for such regret, in view of the conscientious and admirable work Dr. Muck has done for music lovers. Probably the memorable performance under his direction of the Brahms C minor symphony at the beginning of his term here will keep alive as long as anything else in his New York list a warm regard for his musicianship, appreciation and powers.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

[132]

Standard Union,

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year, it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the Orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston, and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 1 1908

Miss M. Katherine Locke, M.A., will make the last of her Brooklyn Institute lecture recitals on "Romanticism of the Nineteenth Century as Expressed in Music," a memorial to the American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, of whom she was a personal friend. His music will be interpreted by Miss Laura L. Combs, soprano of the First Presbyterian Church, who has sung at several of these lecture recitals, and Miss Ellen M. Treat, piano. The topic is "The Aftermath of Romanticism in America—MacDowell," and the lecture recital takes place at Association Hall on Friday at 4 P.M.

Tschaikowsky's beautiful opera, "Eugene Onegin," will be produced in concert form by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra at the fourth matinee concert here on March 7 at the Baptist Temple. Emilio de Gogorza will sing the title role. The other characters will be interpreted by various soloists and the choruses by the New York Oratorio Society. It will be practically the same performance as that of to-night and to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall. These productions will be the first performances in America of any of Tschaikowsky's operatic works, of which "Eugene Onegin" is the most melodious and most popular in all continental operatic centers.

"In addition to concerts already mentioned in this column three of note are to be presented under Brooklyn Institute auspices this month, together with a lecture recital on the Boston Symphony concert, by Daniel Gregory Mason, and a course of lecture recitals on "Important Chapters in Musical History," by Carl Fique. The concerts are a chamber music concert by the Olive Mead Quartet, at Association Hall on February 13; the Boston Symphony concert, with Fritz Kreisler, violin, at the Baptist Temple on February 21, and a song recital by Mme. Gadski, with Frank La Forge at the piano, at the same place on February 27.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 1 1908

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC. PHILADELPHIA, PA.
FEB 2- 1908

DOCTOR MUCK'S DEPARTURE

From all sides are heard expressions of regret that Dr. Karl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Doctor Muck obtained his first leave of absence for the season of 1906-07 only after signing a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. It required all the influence the Boston management could bring to bear to have this leave of absence extended to cover the current season. Doctor Muck refused to do anything in the matter, although he was personally anxious to stay because he felt he could not in good faith ask the Kaiser to further extend the time first agreed upon, the royal consent to the second year here being regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Early in the present season it was hoped in Boston that some way might be found to release Doctor Muck from the contract, but the authorities would not listen to propositions to this effect, and Doctor Muck will go to Berlin in May, spending the summer in Bayreuth, where he will conduct the festival performances. All reports regarding his successor are as yet mere rumors. It is stated that no one has been engaged, and it will be well into the spring before there is any authoritative announcement regarding Doctor Muck's successor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

—From all sides are heard expressions of regret that Dr. Carl Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May. With Mrs. Muck, he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. All reports regarding his successor in Boston are declared to be unfounded.

FEB 1 1908

The refusal of the Kaiser to release Dr. Muck from his contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin, after granting him two years' absence, necessitates the procuring of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season. The management of that organization states that all reports regarding Dr. Muck's successor may be considered as unfounded rumors. No one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra is made. During the early part of this season it was hoped that some way would be found for Dr. Muck's release from the Berlin contract, but the authorities there, it is said, would not listen to any proposition to that end.

WORLD,
New York City.
FEB 2 1908

Music Notes.

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year, it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year, he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally, and after much hesitation, did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Dr. Muck geht. — Von den Opernhäusern. — Musikalische Notizen. — Kommende Konzerte.

Die Nachricht, daß es nicht möglich war, für Dr. Muck einen weiteren Urlaub zu erlangen, der es gestattet hätte, diesen bedeutenden Dirigenten auch weiterhin dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu erhalten, hat in den musikalischen Kreisen New York's und Boston's lebhaftes Bedauern erweckt. Dr. Muck stand bekanntlich, als er für das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester gewonnen wurde, unter kontraktlichen Verpflichtungen mit dem Berliner königlichen Opernhaus, und es kostete ihm große Anstrengungen, einen einjährigen Urlaub für Boston zu erlangen. Im Dezember 1906 wurden seitens des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters alle Mittel aufgeboten, um für Dr. Muck einen längeren Urlaub zu erlangen. Der Dirigent selbst weigerte sich damals, an Kaiser Wilhelm mit einem solchen Anliegen persönlich heranzutreten, da er sein Wort gegeben habe, nach einjähriger Abwesenheit wieder an seinen Kapellmeisterposten in der Berliner Hofoper zurückzukehren. Es gelang bekanntlich, ein weiteres Jahr Urlaub zu erlangen, was hier allgemein als eine ganz ungewöhnliche Konzession des Kaisers den Wünschen in Amerika gegenüber angesehen wurde. Es fehlte auch diesmal nicht an Bemühungen, Dr. Muck länger an Boston zu fesseln, doch war Alles vergebens, und der genannte Dirigent wird am 1. und 2. Mai seine letzten Bostoner Konzerte dirigiren und dann nach Berlin zurückkehren. Dr. Muck wird während der im kommenden Sommer stattfindenden Bayreuther Festspiele wieder den „Parsifal" dirigiren.

Alle im Umlauf befindlichen Gerüchte über die Person des Nachfolgers Dr. Muck's sind aus der Luft gegriffen. Es besteht selbstverständlich kein Zweifel darüber, daß für diesen Posten nur ein ganz hervorragender Fachmann gewonnen werden wird, doch sind alle kolportirten Nachrichten betreffs der Persönlichkeit des nächsten Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, wie gesagt, gegenstandslos.

SUN,
New York City.

DR. MUCK'S DEPARTURE.

No Truth in the Stories of the Choice of His Successor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management sends the following, which is official:

"From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season; although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-07 only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907

"When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause, for while he was anxious to stay he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time.

"That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

"Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the 'Parsifal' performances there.

"All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made."

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Dr. Karl Muck gefeiert.

"Deutsche Verein" von Harvard veranstaltete dem bedeutenden Musiker zu Ehren ein Bankett.

Cambridge, Mass., 3. Febr. Zu Ehren Dr. K. Muck's, Kapellmeisters des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, wurde heute Abend in der Harvard Union unter den Auspizien des „Deutschen Vereins" der Universität, ein Bankett gegeben, an dem etwa 75 Gäste und die Tafelredner, u. a. Präsident Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg, Major Henry L. Higginson und Prof. W. R. Spalding von dem Musik-Departement der Universität theilnahmen. E. F. Hanfstaengel von der Klasse 1909 und Präsident des „Deutschen Vereins" fungirte als Toastmeister. Er und Prof. Münsterberg sprachen Deutsch. Die anderen Ansprachen erfolgten in Englisch.

Dr. Muck kehrt am Schluß der Winter-Saison auf Befehl Kaiser Wilhelms nach Deutschland zurück, um das Amt als Kapellmeister am Königlichen Opern Haus zu übernehmen.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
4- 1908

Abschiedsfeier für Dr. Muck.

Cambridge, Mass., 3. Febr. In der Harvard Union wurde heute Abend ein Abschiedsdiner zu Ehren von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, unter den Auspizien des Deutschen Vereins der Universität gegeben. Es wohnten demselben 75 Personen bei. Unter den Rednern fanden sich der Universitätspräsident Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg, Major Hy. L. Higginson und Prof. W. R. Spalding vom Musikdepartement der Harvard-Universität.

Vorsitzender F. Hanfstaengle vom Deutschen Verein stellte die Redner der Versammlung vor und zwar in deutscher Sprache. Auch Prof. Münsterberg bediente sich bei seiner Rede der deutschen Sprache, während alle anderen Redner englisch sprachen.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
1908

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. That the Kaiser, after much hesitation, gave his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Farewell to Dr. Muck.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Feb. 3.—As a tribute to his work as a leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a farewell dinner was tendered Dr. Karl Muck to-night at the Harvard Union by the German Society of the university. President Eliot, Prof. Muensterberg and Prof. Spaulding spoke briefly complimenting Herr Muck on his success here.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date FEB 3-

That Dr. Karl Muck must relinquish at the end of this season his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in order to resume his duties at the Berlin Royal Opera is now officially announced. Much regret is felt in Boston at the thought of Dr. Muck's departure, and a good deal will be felt here. There is ample justification for such regret, in view of the conscientious and admirable work Dr. Muck has done for American music lovers. Probably the memorable performance under his direction of the Brahms C. minor symphony at the beginning of his term here will keep alive as long as anything else in his New York list a warm regard for his musicianly appreciation and powers.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

Of Dr. Muck's successor in Boston no choice has yet been made.

[132]

...ONOR DR. KARL MU...

...s, Musicians and Harvard Men ...resented at Dinner in the Harvard ...ion

Karl Muck, the leader of the Boston ...ony Orchestra, was the guest of hon... a dinner given by the Deutscher Ver... f Harvard in the Harvard Union last ... About a hundred guests assembled ... the great conductor, among whom ... ...dergraduate and graduate members ... Verein, members of the Bostoner ...cher Gesellschaft, men from the mu... ...epartment of the University, and ...ent musicians of Boston and New ... C. F. Hanfstaengl, '09, president of ...verein, presided; with him at the hea... were Dr. Muck, Major Henry L. Hig... ..., President Charles W. Eliot, Profes... Hugo Münsterberg, Professor W. R. ...lding, Bernard Listemann, a former ...uctor of the Symphony Orchestra, and ...ers of the Verein. Edwin Ginn, War... A. Locke, Arthur Foote, Walter Dam... ..., Consul Reincke and other well... ...own musicians or patrons of music were ...a present.

The first speaker introduced by Presi... ...t Hanfstaengl was Professor Mün... ..., who spoke in German. He said: ... England represents Puritan ideal... ...m—an idealism with little æstheticism. ...e mission of Germany in America is to ...d what is best there to what is best ..., to form traditions for the future, ...to create a present for the past. Music ...s not the black notes on the white page; ...music is alive, Dr. Muck has made the ...st in music alive, and though he re... ...rns, he will leave with us what he has ...brought."

Professor Spaulding of the music de...rtment made a plea for the broaden... ...g of the musician. He said, "There has ...always been a close relation between ...Harvard and the Symphony Orchestra. ...In music, as in medicine and the law, we ...ed to vitalize t... ...ry by practice; in our ...im to do this, we have used the virtuosi ...of the orchestra as the lawyers study ...cases, and the doctors learn from hospi... ...tals. Karl Muck is an example of our ...aims. He is a doctor of philosophy—a ...broad musician. The besetting sins of ...the average musician are narrowness and ...vanity. Too often they know nothing ...outside their music. We are aiming to ...teach more than music here; we want ...broad musicians like Dr. Muck.

Although Herr Muck's name appeared as ...one of the speakers on the printed list, as ...he had contracted a cold he begged to be ...excused. Major Higginson spoke for him, ...prefacing his remarks with a eulogy of the ...leader. "Finding a conductor is like find... ...ng the road to heaven," he said, "only it's ...harder. The German emperor had lent us ...this gentleman for a year. Last year I ...again asked for this favor and got a kind ...reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat ...the request. The emperor of Germany has ...been very kind to him, and very kind to us. ...Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for ...more. He wants to stay. He wanted to ...come. Needless to say that we wish that ...he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he ...can and will play music which he dislikes ...just as well as music which delights him. ...In this he is a remarkable man. I wish ...that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in ...every sort of city, and has been welcomed ...enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. ...Muck has not only satisfied us here, but ...has educated us. We would like to be ...sure that this is not 'Lebe wohl,' but 'Auf ...Wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on ...our part as he has asked me to say that ...he is on his part."

President Eliot was the last speaker. ...Before he spoke, Mr. Hanfstaengl read a ...letter from Professor Kuno Francke, who ...was obliged to speak in Chicago last ...night, regretting his inability to be pres... ...at the dinner. He enclosed a poem to ...Fatherland, which was received with ...applause. The assembly then rose to ...hear President Eliot. "I know nothing," ...he said, "about music. I am sorry to ...say that in this respect my education ...has been neglected. But music speaks a ...universal language. There is no feeling ...that cannot be delicately or forcibly ex... ...pressed. Music is versatile; it excites ...the gravest emotions with also the most ...frivolous. And the martial tones, how ...exhilarating they are to our courage. ...Music is the finest of arts. Consider ...the range of expression. It needs also ...an adequate skill in the man who ex... ...presses the sentiments of the music. ...We owe a debt we owe to Germany in this ...respect. And no one has given us a more ...admirable expression of his native art ...than Dr. Muck.

"Delight in artistic work is the greatest ...need of our country. The highest reward ...in any profession is that which a great ...musician wins. There is nothing like it ...in the world. He has a line of great ...disciples and a line of great interpreters ...like Dr. Muck. What the prophet, the ...poet and the teacher most desires, the ...composer sees in his ideas expressed to ...music, which go down through the cen... ...turies.

"Great music is great thought. No ...other thought has such perfect transmis... ...sion. Who gets such perfect interpreta... ...tion of his thoughts as the great com... ...poser? On this account I know of no ...other profession in the world which has ...such a reward."

SYMPHONY LEADER MUCK

(Photo by Lasarnick, New York.)

Kaiser Will Not Extend Leave of Absence of Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and He Is to Be Given a Farewell Dinner Tonight at the Harvard Union in Cambridge.

MUCK'S ADMIRERS TO GIVE HIM A DINNER

Farewell Banquet to Boston Symphony Leader Tonight at the Harvard Union.

During his service as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Karl Muck has made many friends and there is much regret that he will sever his connection with the orchestra at the close of the present season, owing to the fact that Emperor William of Germany will not extend his leave of absence longer from his duties in Berlin.

As a tribute to his work in Boston Dr. Muck will be given a farewell dinner tonight in the trophy room at the Harvard Union under the auspices of the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. More than 100 guests are expected to attend. The tribute will be essentially a Harvard affair, and after the dinner the Verein will hold a German "kneipe," to which all the members of the university have been invited.

At the dinner E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09, president of the Deutscher Verein, will introduce the speakers, among whom will be Dr. Muck, President Eliot, Prof. Muensterburg and Prof. Spaulding.

A number of men who are eminent in music will attend the dinner, among whom will be Walter Damrosch of New York, Arthur Foote, the noted composer, Prof. Spaulding of the music department of Harvard University, Frederick Connors, the composer, the German consul, Reincke, Owen Wister, and Messrs. Gebhardt and Ganz, the well-known pianists of Boston. Many other leaders, musical, literary and social, will be present.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.
New York City.
FEB 4 1908

DINNER TO DR. KARL MUCK

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 3.—A dinner in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given at the Harvard Union to-night, under the auspices of the Deutsch Verein of the University. Dr. Muck returns to Germany at the ... of the season by order of Emperor ... to resume ...

[133]

MAGNIFICENT PROGRAM IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Large Audience Acclaims Boston Organization and Its Splendid Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra received a cordial welcome from a large audience assembled in Memorial hall last night. This remarkable band of players had not been heard here for many years, and there was an air of expectancy in the audience that was "catching." The concert was advertised for 8 o'clock, but it was 8:25 when Dr. Muck walked on the stage. The program opened with the "Wallenstein Trilogy," composed by D'Indy. This composition is music written to depict the different scenes in the dramatic poem of Schiller. It is fantastic to a degree and reminds one of the tone poems of Richard Strauss. The orchestra played this number with splendid effect.

MacDowell's lovely suite in A minor followed the "Wallenstein." This composition seemed almost a requiem for the composer, who died only last week. The rhapsody by Chabrier closed the program. This brilliant composition is based on original Spanish dance melodies and was given a spirited rendition by the players.

The program as a whole was a trifle too much for a musical public which hears orchestral music only once in a great while. This is particularly true of the D'Indy "Trilogy." This composition must be heard again and again to be appreciated.

Dr. Muck as a great conductor. One rarely sees such dignity, grace and authority combined in one man. It ... a fine impression on the ...

From TIMES-STAR
Address CINCINNATI, OHIO
Date JAN 30 1908

WEEK-END JOURNEY FROM BOSTON TO BRAZIL WAS FOREIGN WOMAN'S IDEA

Why Mrs. Dr. Muck Was Anxious to Come to America.

An amusing little story is told concerning Mrs. Muck, the charming wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. When Dr. Muck's engagement with the Boston orchestra was being discussed between the high contracting parties, a year or two ago, the deciding voice was that of Mrs. Muck, who expressed to C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston orchestra, a great desire to visit this country. To the profound astonishment of Mr. Ellis, Mrs. Muck went on to say that her interest was chiefly concerned with South America, a country of which she had often read, but had never had an opportunity to visit. She thought that in coming to Boston for a year or two this longing for South American exploration could be amply gratified, as she could so easily run down from Boston to Buenos Ayres, or Rio, some Friday evening, returning the next Monday, and the process might, Mrs. Muck thought, be repeated as often as she could spare the time. Mr. Ellis, who was most anxious that the contract between Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra should be signed, basely refrained from offering information concerning geographical distances on the American continents. Since Mrs. Muck arrived in Boston, the subject has never been brought up for discussion, and the ease and facility with which this delightful woman has adapted herself to existing circumstances has been a matter of universal comment. Mrs. Muck will accompany Dr. Muck on his Western tour, and will hear the concerts of the orchestra under his direction, which will be given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...
Address ...

Regret Muck's Going.

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907, only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony orchestra could bring to bear to induce the kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances here.

All reports regarding his successor in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

...IPT, TUESDAY
FEBRUARY 4

TO HONOR DR. KARL MU...

Germans, Musicians and Harvard Men Represented at Dinner in the Harvard Union

Dr. Karl Muck, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the guest of honor at a dinner given by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard in the Harvard Union last night. About a hundred guests assembled to honor the great conductor, among whom were undergraduate and graduate members of the Verein, members of the Bostoner Deutscher Gesellschaft, men from the musical department of the University, and prominent musicians of Boston and New York. E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09, president of the Verein, presided; with him at the head table were Dr. Muck, Major Henry L. Higginson, President Charles W. Eliot, Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Professor W. R. Spaulding, Bernard Listemann, a former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and officers of the Verein. Edwin Ginn, Warren A. Locke, Arthur Foote, Walter Damrosch, Consul Reincke and other well-known musicians or patrons of music were also present.

The first speaker introduced by President Hanfstaengl was Professor Münsterberg, who spoke in German. He said: "New England represents Puritan idealism—an idealism with little æstheticism. The mission of Germany in America is to add what is best there to what is best here, to form traditions for the future, not to create a present for the past. Music is not the black notes on the white page; music is alive, Dr. Muck has made the best in music alive, and though he returns, he will leave with us what he has brought."

Professor Spaulding of the music department made a plea for the broadening of the musician. He said, "There has always been a close relation between Harvard and the Symphony Orchestra. In music, as in medicine and the law, we need to vitalize t... ry by practice; in our aim to do this, we have used the virtuosi of the orchestra as the lawyers study cases, and the doctors learn from hospitals. Karl Muck is an example of our aims. He is a doctor of philosophy—a broad musician. The besetting sins of the average musician are narrowness and vanity. Too often they know nothing outside their music. We are aiming to teach more than music here; we want broad musicians like Dr. Muck.

Although Herr Muck's name appeared as one of the speakers on the printed list, as he had contracted a cold he begged to be excused. Major Higginson spoke for him, prefacing his remarks with a eulogy of the leader. "Finding a conductor is like finding the road to heaven," he said, "only it's harder. The German emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city, and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe wohl,' but 'Auf wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

President Eliot was the last speaker. Before he spoke, Mr. Hanfstaengl read a letter from Professor Kuno Francke, who was obliged to speak in Chicago last night, regretting his inability to be present at the dinner. He enclosed a poem to the Fatherland, which was received with applause. The assembly then rose to greet President Eliot. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music speaks a universal language. There is no feeling that cannot be delicately or forcibly expressed. Music is versatile; it excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck.

"Delight in artistic work is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries.

"Great music is great thought. No other thought has such perfect transmission. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward.

HERALD—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1908.

SYMPHONY LEADER MUCK

(Photo by Lazarnick, New York.)

Kaiser Will Not Extend Leave of Absence of Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and He Is to Be Given a Farewell Dinner Tonight at the Harvard Union in Cambridge.

MUCK'S ADMIRERS TO GIVE HIM A DINNER

Farewell Banquet to Boston Symphony Leader Tonight at the Harvard Union.

During his service as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Karl Much has made many friends and there is much regret that he will sever his connection with the orchestra at the close of the present season, owing to the fact that Emperor William of Germany will not extend his leave of absence longer from his duties in Berlin.

As a tribute to his work in Boston Dr. Muck will be given a farewell dinner tonight in the trophy room at the Harvard Union under the auspices of the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. More than 100 guests are expected to attend. The tribute will be essentially a Harvard affair, and after the dinner the Verein will hold a German "kneipe," to which all the members of the university have been invited.

At the dinner E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09, president of the Deutscher Verein, will introduce the speakers, among whom will be Dr. Muck, President Eliot, Prof. Muensterburg and Prof. Spaulding.

A number of men who are eminent in music will attend the dinner, among whom will be Walter Damrosch of New York, Arthur Foote, the noted composer, Prof. Spaulding of the music department of Harvard University, Frederick Connors, the composer, the German consul, Reincke, Owen Wister, and Messrs. Gebhardt and Ganz, the well-known pianists of Boston. Many other leaders, musical, literary and social, will be present.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

...ss ..... New York City.

FEB 4 — 1908

DINNER TO DR. KARL MUCK

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 3.—A dinner in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given at the Harvard Union to-night, under the auspices of the Deutsch Verein of the University. Dr. Muck returns to Germany at the close of the season by order of Emperor William, to resume his post as director of the ... Opera House at Berlin.

[133]

...m .....
...ress .....
...e .....

MAGNIFICENT PROGRAM IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Large Audience Acclaims Boston Organization and Its Splendid Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra received a cordial welcome from a large audience assembled in Memorial hall last night. This remarkable band of players had not been heard here for many years, and there was an air of expectancy in the audience that was "catching." The concert was advertised for 8 o'clock, but it was 8:25 when Dr. Muck walked on the stage. The program opened with the "Wallenstein Trilogy," composed by D'Indy. This composition is music written to depict the different scenes in the dramatic poem of Schiller. It is fantastic to a degree and reminds one of the tone poems of Richard Strauss. The orchestra played this number with splendid effect.

MacDowell's lovely suite in A minor followed the "Wallenstein." This composition seemed almost a requiem for the composer, who died only last week. The rhapsody by Chabrier closed the program. This brilliant composition is based on original Spanish dance melodies and was given a spirited rendition by the players.

The program as a whole was a trifle too much for a musical public which hears orchestral music only once in a great while. This is particularly true of the D'Indy "Trilogy." This composition must be heard again and again to be appreciated.

Dr. Muck as a great conductor. One rarely sees such dignity, grace and authority combined in one man. He made a fine impression on the large audience. The local management is to be congratulated on the success of this

...From ..... TIMES, STAR.
...ddress .....
...ate ..... FEB 3 1908

WEEK-END JOURNEY FROM BOSTON TO BRAZIL WAS FOREIGN WOMAN'S IDEA

Why Mrs. Dr. Muck Was Anxious to Come to America.

An amusing little story is told concerning Mrs. Muck, the charming wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. When Dr. Muck's engagement with the Boston orchestra was being discussed between the high contracting parties, a year or two ago, the deciding voice was that of Mrs. Muck, who expressed to C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston orchestra, a great desire to visit this country. To the profound astonishment of Mr. Ellis, Mrs. Muck went on to say that her interest was chiefly concerned with South America, a country of which she had often read, but had never had an opportunity to visit. She thought that in coming to Boston for a year or two this longing for South American exploration could be amply gratified, as she could so easily run down from Boston to Buenos Ayres, or Rio, some Friday evening, returning the next Monday, and the process might, Mrs. Muck thought, be repeated as often as she could spare the time. Mr. Ellis, who was most anxious that the contract between Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra should be signed, basely refrained from offering information concerning geographical distances on the American continents. Since Mrs. Muck arrived in Boston, the subject has never been brought up for discussion, and the ease and facility with which this delightful woman has adapted herself to existing circumstances has been a matter of universal comment. Mrs. Muck will accompany Dr. Muck on his Western tour, and will hear the concerts of the orchestra under his direction, which will be given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Regret Muck's Going.

From all sides are heard expressions of deepest regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907, only with the greatest difficulty and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony orchestra could bring to bear to induce the kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer.

Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances here.

All reports regarding his succession in Boston may be considered as unfounded rumors. That a distinguished conductor will succeed him may be accepted as certain, for it has always been and is the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be satisfied only with the best. But no one has been engaged as yet, and it is likely to be well into the spring before an authoritative announcement regarding the next conductor of the orchestra will be made.

From ..... SUN

Address .....

Date JAN 31 1908 COLUMBUS, O.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THOROUGHLY ENJOYED

Dr. Karl Muck Shows Genius of Great Direction.

INTEREST IN MACDOWELL

Musical Treat of Season Owed to Enterprise of Mrs. Ella May Smith.

By EMMA EBELING.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, was the crowning feature of the musical season thus far, and was a huge success. The occasion was a notable one in the reappearance after a number of years of this famous organization, and the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, whose fame as a conductor is widely known.

Dr. Muck is modesty itself. His conducting is unobtrusive, but assured and decisive. There is nothing sensational whatever; he is devoid of many gestures, which shows the excellent control of his fine body of musicians. There were no encores. Recalls were numerous, and twice the entire orchestra rose to share with the conductor in the prolonged applause. It was interesting to note that Dr. Muck took no notice, however, of the applause between the different movements.

The program consisted of D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and Edward A. MacDowell's "Suite in A Minor." The first two were heard for the first time. The MacDowell suite, with the exception of one number, was played here by the Boston Festival orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor, on May 20, 1895.

The wonderful resources of the orchestra were given full scope in this splendid program. There was an impressive breadth and dignity and unfailing beauty of style and richness of tone. The climaxes were given with such telling effect as to fairly carry one away.

Particular interest was manifested in the MacDowell number, a series of fairy tales, as it were, in tones. The instrumentation is thoroughly characteristic, especially "In October" and the "Forest Spirits." The "Espana" is a masterpiece of dazzling brilliancy and melody.

The orchestra is making only one week's tour, visiting Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati, where two concerts will be given. In view of the extreme shortness of this tour, we should consider ourselves extremely fortunate in hearing this organization. The concert was due to the enterprise of Mrs. Ella May Smith.

From .....

Address COLUMBUS, O

Date FEB 2- 1908

"Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor, in making his concert programs, is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public, which is ever asking for new music, is unquestionably in the small minority but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today and frankly says that little of value is being written and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer; but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music today."—Musical Amer-

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

COLUMBUS, O.

FEB 2- 1908

EDITED BY OLEY SPEAKS.

An unusually large audience was out to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, last Thursday night. The concert deserved a large audience, as it was one of unusual beauty. The program arranged by Dr. Muck, while a strong one, was, in my opinion, not the best one for an audience that does not often have the opportunity to listen to orchestral music. A familiar symphony, for instance, the Tschaikowsky, No. 5, which Mr. Damrosch gave us, would have been more enjoyable than the D'Indy Trilogy. Dr. Muck, however, has the reputation of doing unusual things in his program making. At one of his New York concerts he gave three symphonies on one program. However, Dr. Muck is too big a musician to take any exception to, and he evidently had his reasons for giving the program he did at this concert.

The tonal quality of this band is the essence of refinement. I doubt if anywhere in the world, one can find a more beautiful quality of strings than this orchestra presents. The brass, too, is of unusual quality; not once during the concert did this part of the orchestra blare out, as is often the case. The different instruments were beautifully blended into a perfect whole.

It was most fortunate that this orchestra could be heard here before Dr. Muck goes back to his post in Berlin. Here is a man who gets everything from his men in the most quiet dignified manner. If he wants a tremendous crescendo he gets it without a frantic waving of the arms, as some conductors think they are obliged to do. Dr. Muck is not unlike Mr. Gericke in this respect, though his conducting possesses more charm and does not seem so academic as that of Gericke. The "Wallenstein" Trilogy is considered the greatest work of D'Indy. This man is a composer who cares little for the public ear. He does not strive for melody, but his command of the orchestra is so great that he can make the homeliest phrase interesting. His music has a flavor of Berlioz.

The MacDowell suite possibly found the greatest favor with the audience. This charming composition was given an affectionate reading by Dr. Muck. In the movement "The Haunted Forest," one could fairly hear the winds in the trees and the singing of birds. The "Espana" rhapsody by Charbrier is a fantastic composition built on some Spanish dance tunes. It is a melodious piece of writing and fairly bubbles over with life and gayety.

Mrs. Ella May Smith deserves great credit for the bringing of the orchestra to Columbus. The undertaking meant a lot of very hard work and thought.

From .....

Address .....

EMILY CHURCH BENHAM.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert last Thursday evening in Memorial hall was the means of attracting an unusually large audience of music-lovers, who sat enraptured, while one of the finest orchestras in the world was playing.

Every man who composes this body is a finished artist before he joins, and when 60 or more of the finest players get together the effect is simply marvelous. Not one in that entire orchestra lost a single beat, or fraction of a beat, during the entire evening, and even the best-trained ear could find nothing amiss.

The program was composed entirely of novelties, "Wallenstein Trilogy," D'Indy; Suite in A Minor, MacDowell, and Rhapsodie "Espana," Chabrier, none of which had been played in Columbus before.

Dr. Muck is a splendid director, and his men seem to admire and respect him and do their best to please him. He has great power, and his orchestra is one of which any man may be proud.

Almost everyone seemed puzzled as to why it was called the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is hardly a man in it who is not a foreigner, and even Dr. Muck is a German, but I suppose one name is as good as another. They have one trait characteristic of Boston, the coldness, and even though the most enthusiastic applause greeted them, they failed to show much response, Dr. Muck several times not even turning around.

Aside from that, however, the effect was most pleasing and the Boston Symphony orchestra will always be warmly welcomed in Columbus.

From .....

Address COLUMBUS, O

Date FEB 2- 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, was the crowning event of the musical season thus far, and was a huge success. The occasion was a notable one in the reappearance after a number of years of this famous organization and the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, whose fame as a conductor is widely known.

Dr. Muck is modesty itself. His conducting is unobtrusive, but assured and decisive. There is nothing sensational whatever; he is devoid of many gestures, which shows the excellent control of his fine body of musicians. There were no encores. Recalls were numerous, and twice the entire orchestra rose to share with the conductor in the prolonged applause. It was interesting to note that Dr. Muck took no notice, however, of the applause between the different movements.

The program consisted of D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," MacDowell's Suite in A minor, and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

The wonderful resources of the orchestra were given full scope in this one program. There was an impressive breadth and dignity and unfailing beauty of style and richness of tone. The climaxes were given with such telling effect as to fairly carry one away.

The "Wallenstein" was given a very illuminative interpretation, it was full of life and imagination. Particular interest was manifested in the MacDowell number, a series of fairy tales as it were, in tones. The instrumentation is thoroughly characteristic, especially "In October" and the "Forest Spirits." The "Espana" was the result of the composer's journey to Spain, and is a masterpiece of dazzling brilliancy and melody.

The concert was advertised for 8:15 o'clock but began about 5 minutes later. By this time there were practically no late comers and there was one time in history of our musical life where the conductor did not wait for the audience, the audience waited for the conductor.

Mr. Arthur F. Kellogg has written another song, "My Maid of Dreams," the words being by Harlie E. Sawyer. It is a melodious song, quiet, fine for a group of songs to secure contrast of style.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s INDIANAPOLIS, IND

FEB 4- 1908

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

From .....

Address .....

ublished: INDIANAPOLIS, IND

DR. MUCK'S LAST YEAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

ANNOUNCEMENT THAT HE MUST RETURN TO BERLIN.

HIS VIEWS ABOUT MUSIC

Announcement is made from Boston that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can not continue at the head of the organizaaion after the present season, and it is probable, therefore, that his appearance in this city next Wednesday evening will be his last as well as his second. He has a distinguished position in Berlin, at the Royal Opera, and is a favorite of the Emperor. He came to America last season on a one-year leave of absence at the request of Mr. Higginson and other influential citizens of Boston, and his success as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led to an extension of his contract to cover the present season. It had been hoped that it would be possible to keep Dr. Muck here for several more years.

There is a great deal of speculation as to his successor, and there is a rumor that Nikisch has been engaged, but this has no official foundation. Dr. Muck, it is said, would like to remain in this country. He and the eighty players of the orchestra will be welcomed by a large audience here on Wednesday evening. The sale of seats is now in progress at the Big Four ticket office. Many parties of out-of-town music lovers will come for this concert, which is generaly regarded as the most important of the season.

During the years he has lived in Berlin Dr. Muck has been thrown constantly not merely with those in the highest musical circles, which is inevitable, but he always has had the entree to official circles, and his favor at the Berlin court has been reflected in the semi-official functions which were given for him last winter whenever he visited Washington with the orchestra, which he does once a month. Dr. Muck is a slender, gracefully-built man of medium hight, with a strong, masculine face which, if not exactly handsome, is decidedly attractive. He dresses very well, his clothes being plainly the product of a fashionable tailor, and he likes jewelry. His watch guard is a heavy chain, worn about the neck; his rings and scarf pins are rich.

Views on Music and Conducting.

Dr. Muck, naturally, has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likeable in much of the music that is being written to-day, and, although much of it appears on his programs, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audience of a symphony orchestra should be kept in rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with a certain grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, the modern day reflects spirit of the age as it does, and is analytic and critical, the result of great skill rather than as creative as the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart.

He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eulenspiegel"; Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places in the pale of art. Admitting the extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest writer's "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a strong advocate of Bruckner's genius, and was called in New York an inspired interpreter of Brahms. He confesses a liking for much of the neo-Russian school, finds much that is admirable in the "younged Frenchmen." But in the end he believes that in the search for beauty one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century.

His views on conducting are also interesting. He believes that the duty of the conductor is to seek out the inherent beauty of a work as the composer wrote it, and, having given himself to this, to impress his own conception of it upon the orchestra. The conductor's personality has much to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, the conductor injects his personality into the interpretation of a work after he arrives at considerable familiarity with it, and departs from those

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE

WEDNESDAY EV'NG, FEB. 12

at 8:15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DR. KARL MUCK.....Conductor.

(His last appearance in Providence)

Soloist RUDOLPH GANZ

Programme—Tschaikowski's "Symphonie Pathetique," Grieg's Concerto for piano in A minor, Chabrier's "Rhapsodie Espana."

Seats now selling at Steinert's, 327 Westminster street.

Prices $1.50, $1.00

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FEB 6- 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Infantry Hall, Feb. 12, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. An elaborate programme has been prepared.

NEWS

FEB 1 1908

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Lyric on February 19. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

Dr. Muck Likes America.

(From the Indianapolis News.)

"My two years in your country," said Dr. Karl Buck, leader of the Boston Orchestra, "have been enjoyable in the extreme. I find a great and growing appreciation of music, and it will, of course, continue to grow. You have now the greatest orchestra in the world."

He modestly refrained from naming it. "And that fact should prove the character of the people as regards music. In other ways I like your America. I like the people. I enjoy these trips in most respects. The railroads are good, the hotels are good and the audiences are good, but the concert halls—Ach! sometimes they are not! To have the harmony disturbed and the music feeling of the audience broken by the sound of the rumbling street car outside!"

[134]

From 1908
Address .....
Date .....

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THOROUGHLY ENJOYED

Dr. Karl Muck Shows Genius of Great Direction.

INTEREST IN MACDOWELL

Musical Treat of Season Owed to Enterprise of Mrs. Ella May Smith.

By EMMA EBELING.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, was the crowning feature of the musical season thus far, and was a huge success. The occasion was a notable one in the reappearance after a number of years of this famous organization, and the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, whose fame as a conductor is widely known.

Dr. Muck is modesty itself. His conducting is unobtrusive, but assured and decisive. There is nothing sensational whatever; he is devoid of many gestures, which shows the excellent control of his fine body of musicians. There were no encores. Recalls were numerous, and twice the entire orchestra rose to share with the conductor in the prolonged applause. It was interesting to note that Dr. Muck took no notice, however, of the applause between the different movements.

The program consisted of D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and Edward A. MacDowell's "Suite in A Minor." The first two were heard for the first time. The MacDowell suite, with the exception of one number, was played here by the Boston Festival orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor, on May 20, 1895.

The wonderful resources of the orchestra were given full scope in this splendid program. There was an impressive breadth and dignity and unfailing beauty of style and richness of tone. The climaxes were given with such telling effect as to fairly carry one away.

Particular interest was manifested in the MacDowell number, a series of fairy tales, as it were, in tones. The instrumentation is thoroughly characteristic, especially "In October" and the "Forest Spirits." The "Espana" is a masterpiece of dazzling brilliancy and melody.

The orchestra is making only one week's tour, visiting Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati, where two concerts will be given. In view of the extreme shortness of this tour, we should consider ourselves extremely fortunate in hearing this organization. The concert was due to the enterprise of Mrs. Ella May Smith.

From .....
Address .....
Date 1908

"Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes more certain each week that a conductor, in making his concert programs, is betwixt devil and deep sea. He's cursed if he presents novelties, he's cursed if he sticks to the time-honored repertoire. It seems to be a lamentable fact that those who cry loudest for novelties in orchestral music are the most bitterly critical when orchestral novelties are played. To be sure, the concert-going public, which is ever asking for new music, is unquestionably in the small minority but the loudness of its voices makes it a factor which must be dealt with with decided consideration. Dr. Muck is not particularly in sympathy with the music of today and frankly says that little of value is being written and the value of most of this lies in the technical proficiency of the composer; but if novelty is demanded this new music must be drawn on, and if it does not please those who hunger for the latest word in music, the blame must be laid on the lack of creative genius which is characteristic in music today."—Musical America.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
1908

EDITED BY OLEY SPEAKS.

AN ususually large audience was out to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra last Thursday night. The concert deserved a large audience, as it was one of unusual beauty. The program arranged by Dr. Muck, while a strong one, was, in my opinion, not the best one for an audience that does not often have the opportunity to listen to orchestral music. A familiar symphony, for instance, the Tschaikowsky, No. 5, which Mr. Damrosch gave us, would have been more enjoyable than the D'Indy Trilogy. Dr. Muck, however, has the reputation of doing unusual things in his program making. At one of his New York concerts he gave three symphonies on one program. However, Dr. Muck is too big a musician to take any exception to, and he evidently had his reasons for giving the program he did at this concert.

The tonal quality of this band is the essence of refinement. I doubt if anywhere in the world, one can find a more beautiful quality of strings than this orchestra presents. The brass, too, is of unusual quality; not once during the concert did this part of the orchestra blare out, as is often the case. The different instruments were beautifully blended into a perfect whole.

It was most fortunate that this orchestra could be heard here before Dr. Muck goes back to his post in Berlin. Here is a man who gets everything from his men in the most quiet dignified manner. If he wants a tremendous crescendo he gets it without a frantic waving of the arms, as some conductors think they are obliged to do. Dr. Muck is not unlike Mr. Gericke in this respect, though his conducting possesses more charm and does not seem so academic as that of Gericke. The "Wallenstein" Trilogy is considered the greatest work of D'Indy. This man is a composer who cares little for the public ear. He does not strive for melody, but his command of the orchestra is so great that he can make the homeliest phrase interesting. His music has a flavor of Berlioz.

The MacDowell suite possibly found the greatest favor with the audience. This charming composition was given an affectionate reading by Dr. Muck. In the movement "The Haunted Forest," one could fairly hear the winds in the trees and the singing of birds. The "Espana" rhapsody by Charbrier is a fantastic composition built on some Spanish dance tunes. It is a melodious piece of writing and fairly bubbles over with life and gayety.

Mrs. Ella May Smith deserves great credit for the bringing of the orchestra to Columbus. The undertaking meant a lot of very hard work and thought.

The Oth

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BY EMILY CHURCH BENHAM.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra concert last Thursday evening in Memorial hall was the means of attracting an unusually large audience of music-lovers, who sat enraptured, while one of the finest orchestras in the world was playing.

Every man who composes this body is a finished artist before he joins, and when 60 or more of the finest players get together the effect is simply marvelous. Not one in that entire orchestra lost a single beat, or fraction of a beat, during the entire evening, and even the best-trained ear could find nothing amiss.

The program was composed entirely of novelties, "Wallenstein Trilogy," D'Indy; Suite in A Minor, MacDowell, and Rhapsodie "Espana," Chabrier, none of which had been played in Columbus before.

Dr. Muck is a splendid director, and his men seem to admire and respect him and do their best to please him. He has great power, and his orchestra is one of which any man may be proud.

Almost everyone seemed puzzled as to why it was called the Boston Symphony orchestra. There is hardly a man in it who is not a foreigner, and even Dr. Muck is a German, but I suppose one name is as good as another. They have one trait characteristic of Boston, the coldness, and even though the most enthusiastic applause greeted them, they failed to show much response, Dr. Muck several times not even turning around.

Aside from that, however, the effect was most pleasing and the Boston Symphony orchestra will always be warmly welcomed in Columbus.

From ..... SUN
Address .....
Date ..... FEB 2 - 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, was the crowning event of the musical season thus far, and was a huge success. The occasion was a notable one in the reappearance after a number of years of this famous organization and the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, whose fame as a conductor is widely known.

Dr. Muck is modesty itself. His conducting is unobtrusive, but assured and decisive. There is nothing sensational whatever; he is devoid of many gestures, which shows the excellent control of his fine body of musicians. There were no encores. Recalls were numerous, and twice the entire orchestra rose to share with the conductor in the prolonged applause. It was interesting to note that Dr. Muck took no notice, however, of the applause between the different movements.

The program consisted of D'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," MacDowell's Suite in A minor, and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

The wonderful resources of the orchestra were given full scope in this fine program. There was an impressive breadth and dignity and unfailing beauty of style and richness of tone. The climaxes were given with such telling effect as to fairly carry one away.

The "Wallenstein" was given a very illuminative interpretation, it was full of life and imagination. Particular interest was manifested in the MacDowell number, a series of fairy tales as it were, in tones. The instrumentation is thoroughly characteristic, especially "In October" and the "Forest Spirits." The "Espana" was the result of the composer's journey to Spain, and is a masterpiece of dazzling brilliancy and melody.

The concert was advertised for 8:15 o'clock but began about 5 minutes later. By this time there were practically no late comers and there was one time in history of our musical life where the conductor did not wait for the audience, the audience waited for the conductor.

Mr. Arthur F. Kellogg has written another song, "My Maid of Dreams," the words being by Harlie E. Sawyer. It is a melodicus song, quiet, fine for a group of songs to secure contrast of style.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
s .....
FEB 4

Mrs. Carl Muck, wife of the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so fond of America that she says she has no desire to return to Berlin. She contemplates taking several courses at Radcliffe in the near future, and if her husband remains here, may go in for a degree.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

DR. MUCK'S LAST YEAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

ANNOUNCEMENT THAT HE MUST RETURN TO BERLIN.

HIS VIEWS ABOUT MUSIC

Announcement is made from Boston that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can not continue at the head of the organizaaion after the present season, and it is probable, therefore, that his appearance in this city next Wednesday evening will be his last as well as his second. He has a distinguished position in Berlin, at the Royal Opera, and is a favorite of the Emperor. He came to America last season on a one-year leave of absence at the request of Mr. Higgirson and other influential citizens of Boston, and his success as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led to an extension of his contract to cover the present season. It had been hoped that it would be possible to keep Dr. Muck here for several more years.

There is a great deal of speculation as to his successor, and there is a rumor that Nikisch has been engaged, but this has no official foundation. Dr. Muck, it is said, would like to remain in this country. He and the eighty players of the orchestra will be welcomed by a large audience here on Wednesday evening. The sale of seats is now in progress at the Big Four ticket office. Many parties of out-of-town music lovers will come for this concert, which is generaly regarded as the most important of the season.

During the years he has lived in Berlin Dr. Muck has been thrown constantly not merely with those in the highest musical circles, which is inevitable, but he always has had the entree to official circles, and his favor at the Berlin court has been reflected in the semi-official functions which were given for him last winter whenever he visited Washington with the orchestra, which he does once a month. Dr. Muck is a slender, gracefully-built man of medium hight with a strong, masculine face, which, if not exactly handsome, is decidedly attractive. He dresses very well, his clothes being plainly the product of a fashionable tailor, and he likes jewelry. His watch guard is a heavy chain, worn about the neck; his rings and scarf pins are rich.

Views on Music and Conducting.

Dr. Muck, naturally, has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likeable in much of the music that is being written to-day and, although much of it appears on his programs, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audience of a symphony orchestra should be kept en rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with rather grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music back with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, the music of the day reflects spirit of the age, as all music does, and is analytic and critical, the result of great skill rather than truly creative as the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart.

He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eulenspiegel"; Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places beyond the pale of art. Admitting Reger's extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest Munich "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a sincere advocate of Bruckner's genius and he is called in New York an inspired interpreter of Brahms. He confesses fondness for much of the neo-Russian school and finds much that is admirable in the "vounged Frenchmen." But in the end, he believes that in the search for true beauty one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century.

His views on conducting are equally interesting. He believes the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it and, having given through the orchestra expression to this, his work is done. The conductor's personality has nothing to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, when the conductor injects his own personality into the interpretation of a work he arrives at conclusions just the opposite from those of the composers.

EVENING BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE
WEDNESDAY EV'NG, FEB. 12
at 8:15
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
DR. KARL MUCK.....Conductor.
(His last appearance in Providence)
Soloist RUDOLPH GANZ
Programme—Tschaikowski's "Symphonie Pathetique;" Grieg's Concerto for piano in A-minor; Chabrier's "Rhapsodie Espana."
Seats now selling at Steinerts', 327 Westminster street.
Prices $1.50, $1.00 and 75 cents.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
ss .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Infantry Hall, Feb. 12, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. An elaborate programme has been prepared.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Lyric on February 19. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there.

Dr. Muck Likes America.

(From the Indianapolis News.)

"My two years in your country," said Dr. Karl Buck, leader of the Boston Orchestra, "have been enjoyable in the extreme. I find a great and growing appreciation of music, and it will, of course, continue to grow. You have now the greatest orchestra in the world."

He modestly refrained from naming it.

"And that fact should prove the character of the people as regards music. In other ways I like your America. I like the people. I enjoy these trips in most respects. The railroads are good, the hotels are good and the audiences are good, but the concert halls—Ach! sometimes they are not! To have the harmony disturbed and the music feeling of the audience broken by the sound of the rumbling street car outside!"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From ...

Address ...

Boston Orchestra Concert

Dr. Muck Conducts Notable Performance of Brahms Symphony.

BY CHARLES ANTHONY.

It was given to the people of Indianapolis last evening the rare opportunity of welcoming a very illustrious organization which we recognize with due national pride as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor. Caleb Mills Hall was the chosen place of performance and the program, well devised, well balanced and of commendably sustained interest, despite a few anti-Brahms auditors, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73—Brahms
Overture—"Carnival" ..... Dvorak
Concert piece for violoncello and orchestra (new) ..... Dohnanyi
In rondo form, for full orchestra, Op. 28—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned, Roguish Manner" ..... Richard Strauss

The orchestra was to some extent reduced, which paring off of numbers was rather a happy necessity as it turned out. One felt that if the stage were inadequate for a larger body of men the hall would inevitably yield no further in its acoustical elasticity than it did last night, and mere, confused cacaphony might be ensued had the full orchestra been at. As it was there were very few about a performance distinctly notable.

At first one felt that these men, at present on the professional "jump," were rather out of tune with their surroundings and their audience; were fatigued with one-night stands, which so dignified an organization should never be forced to undergo. Their home is in Symphony Hall, Boston, and there, theoretically, they should remain, but since it is a part of their present regime to tour the country let us all be deeply, sincerely grateful that we were honored by their coming here. If the orchestra had at first a few doubts as to their being in their customary good form and as to the friendliness of a really satisfyingly large audience, these were quickly dispelled. The writer, whose privilege it has been for years to hear this orchestra frequently, has never heard them play better, all things equal, than during the last two movements of the Brahms and a breathlessly exciting performance of Strauss's poem.

Brahms may be said to have apotheosized in this No. 2 symphony the full-blooded vitality and fresh, luscious charm of Viennese life. To put this work in juxtaposition with his first symphony would be unsatisfactory inasmuch as the two works are well-nigh incomparable. The first symphony is a feudal stronghold of somber tones, wherein the thematic material is guarded with almost chivalrous jealousy. The melodies peer curiously from behind the lattice work of polyphonic "jalousies" like the dark eyes of an odalisque. As Hanslick aptly said, "They are flowers slumbering beneath the snow." As a whole the C minor symphony is an abstract statement of philosophical thought, masterly in form and skillfully orchestrated. It was acclaimed as the "tenth" symphony on its first appearance, meaning of course the legitimate successor to Beethoven's ninth.

In the work presented last evening we discover a spontaneity of thought, a refreshing versatility of invention, a sonority of orchestral treatment which place it in the estimation of many people as the most worthy of all four symphonies. It is in character a sort of symphonic "standchen," opened by a horn theme suggesting a subdued, crepuscular atmosphere. The movement is allegro moderato and throughout its performance one's senses literally bathe in a luminous glow of vernal melody.

For once Brahms ceases to be the stern, uncompromising contrapuntist. He expresses himself unrestrainedly in those delicious tongues which make the Viennese spring a radiant babel of joy. But Brahms would not be Brahms if he did not give us more than the narration of a few intense emotions or subjective feelings. In this D major symphony we are captivated by the innate charm of its appeal, the vivacity of its words, the upswelling spontaneity of sparkling, crystalline thoughts. Yet, over and above all, its purely sensuous eloquence, one is aware of the glorious underlying physique—the structural solidity.

Possesses Synthetic Mind.

Brahms possessed, in rare degree, the powerful synthetic mind, which, grasping as child's play all the elements of pure music, welds them with a facile hand into edifices of formal and Doric beauty. And this second symphony is a notable exception to his habitual avoidance of the usual, his characteristic resistance to sensuous appeal. There is lacking that artful adherence to strict formalism; the puritanical abhorrence of optimism; of a pleasant aspect toward life. He proves, this once at all events, that he can communicate to us that "pure morning joy" for which Thoreau is said to have sighed. The second movement has been compared by Felix Weingartner to a Dutch landscape. He says: "The eye at first sees nothing, but the sky over the wide, wide plain; heedlessly and almost wearily it lets the glance pass over it and gradually a feeling arises quietly from afar and speaks to us." This adagio is less pronounced in the significance of its themes than in the adroit handling of them. The adagio in minuet tempo is graceful and the true Brahms syncopation which Mr. Weingartner calls out and not a "mannerism," has no marring effect of clumsiness. The finale is a powerful and worthy close to this interesting work and was inspiringly rendered. One might add that this symphony is conceded by most critics as the very best of the neo-classic school, Schumann not excepted.

The "Carnival" overture was capitally played, too. It is immensely pleasing in its content and somewhat impressively bizarre in coloring. One felt never a moment of ennui, and one wanted very much to get up and riot about a bit just to show how much one really enjoyed it. Dvorak is so enchantingly naive and rarely oppresses one with introspective gloom.

Mr. Dohnanyi's concert piece for violoncello and orchestra is new to us. On first hearing one finds it admirably, though not defiantly, "new" music. There are some long stretches when little of importance is said, sometimes hardly hinted at. It is not strikingly original, either. First we do thank Mr. Dohnanyi for is a piece for a much-abused instrument, a piece which permits its' interpretation the long curves of melodic phrase [illegible] on the cello so divinely, and do [illegible] literally on the jump [illegible] which are but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
Address

Boston Orchestra Concert

Dr. Muck Conducts Notable Performance of Brahms Symphony.

BY CHARLES ANTHONY.

It was given to the people of Indianapolis last evening the rare opportunity of welcoming a very illustrious organigation which we recognize with due national pride as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor. Caleb Mills Hall was the chosen place of performance and the program, well devised, well balanced and of commendably sustained interest, despite a few anti-Brahms murmurs, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73—Brahms
Overture—"Carnival" ..... Dvorak
Concert piece for violoncello and orchestra (new) ..... Dohnanyi
In rondo form, for full orchestra, Op. 28—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned, Roguish Manner" ..... Richard Strauss

The orchestra was to some extent reduced, which paring off of numbers was rather a happy necessity as it turned out. One felt that if the stage were inadequate for a larger body of men the hall would inevitably yield no further in its acoustical elasticity than it did last night, and mere, confused cacaphony might have ensued had the full orchestra been present. As it was there were very few outs about a performance distinctly notable.

At first one felt that these men, at present on the professional "jump," were rather out of tune with their surroundings and their audience; were fatigued with one-night stands, which so dignified an organization should never be forced to undergo. Their home is in Symphony Hall, Boston, and there, theoretically, they should remain, but since it is a part of their present regime to tour the country let us all be deeply, sincerely grateful that we were honored by their coming here. If the orchestra had at first a few doubts as to their being in their customary good form and as to the friendliness of a really satisfyingly large audience, these were quickly dispelled. The writer, whose privilege it has been for years to hear this orchestra frequently, has never heard them play better, all things equal, than during the last two movements of the Brahms and a breathlessly exciting performance of Strauss's poem.

Brahms may be said to have apotheosized in this No. 2 symphony the full-blooded vitality and fresh, luscious charm of Viennese life. To put this work in juxtaposition with his first symphony would be unsatisfactory inasmuch as the two works are well-nigh incomparable. The first symphony is a feudal stronghold of somber tones, wherein the thematic material is guarded with almost chivalrous jealousy. The melodies peer curiously from behind the lattice work of polyphonic "jalousies" like the dark eyes of an odalisque. As Hanslick aptly said, "They are flowers slumbering beneath the snow." As a whole the C minor symphony is an abstract statement of philosophical thought, masterly in form and skillfully orchestrated. It was acclaimed as the "tenth" symphony on its first appearance, meaning of course the legitimate successor to Beethoven's ninth.

In the work presented last evening we discover a spontaneity of thought, a refreshing versatility of invention, a sonority of orchestral treatment which place it in the estimation of many people as the most worthy of all four symphonies. It is in character a sort of symphonic "standchen," opened by a horn theme suggesting a subdued, crepuscular atmosphere. The movement is allegro moderato and throughout its performance one's senses literally bathe in a luminous glow of vernal melody.

For once Brahms ceases to be the stern, uncompromising contrapuntist. He expresses himself unrestrainedly in those delicious tongues which make the Viennese spring a radiant babel of joy. But Brahms would not be Brahms if he did not give us more than the narration of a few intense emotions or subjective feelings. In this D major symphony we are captivated by the innate charm of its appeal, the vivacity of its words, the upswelling spontaneity of sparkling, crystalline thoughts. Yet, over and above all, its purely sensuous eloquence one is aware of the glorious underlying physique—the structural solidity.

Possesses Synthetic Mind.

Brahms possessed, in rare degree, the powerful synthetic mind, which, grasping as child's play all the elements of pure music, welds them with a facile hand into edifices of formal and Doric beauty. And this second symphony is a notable exception to his habitual avoidance of the usual, his characteristic resistance to sensuous appeal. There is lacking that faithful adherence to strict formalism; the puritanical abhorrence of optimism; of a pleasant aspect toward life. He proves, this once at all events, that he can communicate to us that "pure morning joy" for which Thoreau is said to have sighed. The second movement has been compared by Felix Weingartner to a Dutch landscape. He says: "The eye at first sees nothing, but the sky over the wide, wide plain; heedlessly and almost wearily it lets the glance pass over it and gradually a feeling arises quietly from afar and speaks to us." This adagio is less pronounced in the significance of its themes than in the adroit handling of them. The adagio in minuet tempo is graceful and the true Brahms syncopation which Mr. Weingartner calls out and out a "mannerism," has no marring effect of clumsiness. The finale is a powerful and worthy close to this interesting work and was inspiringly rendered. One might add that this symphony is conceded by most critics as the very best of the neo-classic school, Schumann not excepted.

The "Carnival" overture was capitally played, too. It is immensely pleasing in its content and somewhat impressively bizarre in coloring. One felt never a moment of ennui, and one wanted very much to get up and riot about a bit just to show how much one really enjoyed it. Dvorak is so enchantingly naive and rarely oppresses one with introspective gloom.

Mr. Dohnanyi's concert piece for violoncello and orchestra is new to us. On first hearing one finds it admirably, though not defiantly, "new" music. There are some long stretches when little of importance is said, sometimes hardly hinted at. It is not strikingly original, either. What we do thank Mr. Dohnanyi for is a virtuoso piece for a much-abused instrument, a piece which permits its interpreter the long curves of melodic phrase that sing on the cello so divinely, and do not keep him literally on the jump, scratching for effects which are but sadly [illegible] while, if by chance they are ob[illegible] per brute technic.

Mr. Warnke played the solo part in a manly fashion, technically adequate and throughout the entire performance beset by the most unwonted amiability that ever distinguished a solo performer. He had smiles for Dr. Muck and friendly nods for his conferes, and one felt convinced that playing in public as first violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be an awfully pleasant job.

The program was concluded by a masterful, overwhelmingly joyous performance of Strauss's poem, "Till Eulen Spiegel." Richard Strauss, the Nietzsche of music, stands, even at this late day, barely on the horizon of his own domain in the appreciation and musical comprehension of this country. He is the cold, icy peak which stabs the blue ether and attains thereby the outlook on things unearthly. He is that mighty volcano in whose crater lie the infernal generators of his genius, igniting his every effort into the white heat of successful achievement.

In his poem, "Death and Transfiguration," we have moments of peace supernal, preceded by the tragedy of a human life, painted in tones of awful realism. "Till Eulen Spiegel" is in a sense the phantasmagoria of a twentieth century Merlin. It is essentially a burlesque on the very art of which it is so monumental an example. It crackles with consuming irony; it quivers with prankish humor; it is "teutonically clumsy," meteorically dazzling, a bachanale of drunken tones, which scale live-wired ladders of diabolical fancy, only to plunge into abyssal depths of grotesque woe, all with a swiftness which fairly gives the listener vertigo.

"Here," says Mr. Huneker, "Strauss unleashes his fantasy. 'Till Lives, Till Is scampish. Till is gibbeted.' Tone itself seems volatilized into fiery particles that seem to fall upon the listener from dizzily pitched passages. Such a picture has never been hung in the halls of music. It offends. It blazes in the eyes with brilliant audacity and yet it is new music gashed and quivering with rhythmic lift."

The only serious criticisms of the evening would fall, in the writer's estimation, on the audience, which delayed and disturbed the performance by its tardy arrival.

NEWS-DEMOCRAT.
PROVIDENCE, R.I..
FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Providence will be the first of the cities visited by the Boston Symphony orchestra to say farewell to Dr. Muck, for his last appearance here will be at the third and last symphony concert of the season in Infantry hall next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. As already has been announced, the management of the Boston Symphony has found it impossible to secure the service of Dr. Muck for another year, gretaly as it desired so to do. The Kaiser allowed him to come to America for the first time only after he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera for six years, and when he had given his promise that he would stay here but a year. On account of this promise Dr. Muck could take no part in the negotiations that went on the greater part of last winter to have his leave of absence extended to the season of 1907-08. and it was only with the greatest difficulty that the Kaiser was persuaded to grant this favor. It was hoped that it might be arranged in some way to secure his release from the Berlin contract and at least to get another extension of his leave of absence for the season of 1908-09, but it was quickly discovered that this was out of the question, so that next year the orchestra must have a new conductor.

For the last concert here Dr. Muck has arranged a most brilliant and popular program. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 6 in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." This was the great Russian's last gift to the world, which he so ornamented, and the symphony had its first performance under his direction not long before he succumbed to the cholera which was raging in St. Petersburg at that time. For this reason the symphony is often called his "Swan Song," and until the appearance of his brother, Modeste Tschaikowsky's authoritative biography. it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky in the symphony embodied the premonition of his death. This theory has gone the way of many interesting theories, for we know now that Tschaikowsky did not commit suicide, and had no idea that death was so soon to take him away, and the mood of the symphony is simply an expression of the prevailing unhappy despairing side of the composer's nature.

The soloist will be Mr. Rudolf Ganz, the distinguished Swiss pianist, who is generally regarded now as the greatest of the younger generation of men who have made the piano their specialty. He is scholarly and intellectual in his playing, and at the same time is deeply emotional and has a remarkable feeling of instrumental color. He will play the ever-beautiful concerto for the piano by Edward Grieg.

The final number will be the brilliant Spanish rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death deprived France of an unquestionable musical genius. In this work he takes a familiar Spanish dance tune and plays with it in a most beautiful and fascinating manner.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert is on Wednesday night Feb. 12, instead of upon the usual Tuesday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Muck, slender and smiling, made his second bow to a large Indianapolis audience last night, when he appeared at Caleb Mills Hall to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of Brahms, Dvorak, Dohnanyi and Richard Strauss compositions. Last year when Dr. Muck and the same orchestra were in the city the First Symphony of Brahms was played and the Richard Strauss tone poem "Don Juan." Thus in the two concerts a large number of the same people forming the audiences heard works of the same composers.

The Brahms symphony No. 2 is one that appeals more directly to the truly musical sense. It is quiet in style and its short rhythmic sentences have more of the melodious quality. To listen to it one hears pure music, a perfection of harmonious tones, a blending of sounds that are to a composition what the artists' colors are in their exquisite tints, where one rejoices in the color rather than in the drawing to which it is applied. Some deny the right of absolute instrumental music to exist, but a majority of musicians declare that the Brahms Symphony refutes this stand, and the Second Symphony, which was heard last evening, justifies the position the latter take. The Second is of a more cheerful style, and as the instruments brought out in luscious tones the swiftly succeeding phrases one felt with what consummate art Brahms had translated his thoughts to the ear. While the generalty of hearers might wonder at the musical forms arranged in the two first movements, the allegro and the solemn adagio, it was not difficult for any one to enjoy the exquisitely beautiful melody and rhythms of the third, the adagietto grazioso.

It was graceful and appealing and was played with an evenness of tempo that lulled and pleased the senses, while the manner of its playing also had a similar effect on the sight with the violin bows moving in unison to the swaying of the baton. The final movement, the scherzo, or allegro con spirito as the programs have it, was bright and inspiring, and yet maintained a serenity that did not provoke a vociferous applause, but gave great and genuine pleasure, due more to the character of the piece and the way the orchestra played it than to tumultuous sounds such as usually are used in the closing movement of large compositions.

In the orchestra's second number, the "Carnival" of Dvorak, the spirit of the music brings visions of gay people in fancy dress with masks to give them courage to commit all sorts of tricks as they dance to festive music, and one senses the tinkle of bells and click of castanets, the prancing and laughing and cheer of the carnival time. Suddenly, after the clangor of strange instruments, there comes a sweet and quiet melody as if love had found a way, then there is a rush of merry ones again and the carnival goes on.

The last number was the Richard Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and of all the impish, wild and untamed riot of harmonies the like has never been heard in Caleb Mills Hall in all the seasons of music that have gone before. It is said that Strauss makes no explanatory notes of what he intended in the details of this composition, and one gets out of it what one takes to it. As with the finish of the "Lady or the Tiger," one can make it to suit oneself. Strauss evidently tried himself, and it is a marvel what he accomplished in this music that revelers seem to offer in a Bacchanalian feast. That "it sounds crazy," as one person expressed it, no one can deny, but when it is remembered that that craze had to be worked out and set down in notes on lines and spaces, it shows that there was a genius holding the pen. It was a work to stir the blood, and one might sit in rapt attention trying to separate the confusion of sounds. After hearing it once, like last night, and for the first time it makes the musician long for the privilege of playing in the orchestra that produces it, or at least that of hearing it successive times, that a clearer insight into its enticing mysteries may be gained. It gave the feeling of having seen fireworks that glittered, and sparkled and dazzled, with a multiplicity of colors. That a few notes of the horn can be so arranged that they will make one laugh shows how remarkably Strauss understands the possibilities of instruments, and in the final crash of sounds how such a crash can still be as musically harmonious as a berceuse.

The soloist of the evening, Heinrich Warnke, cellist, established himself in instant favor, for his fellow-artists seemed pleased to have him play, and Dr. Muck and they supplemented the applause of the audience when he had finished his solo, a new Dohnanyi composition for cello and orchestra. The solo work was a finished bit of playing, tone and intonation being rich and true. The orchestral parts were much more pleasing than the solo from a musical point of view. One did not get over the feeling, however, at times, especially when the sounds of the orchestra drowned those of the soloist, that the latter was "sawing wood and saying nothing."

A laurel wreath was presented Dr. Muck, who made his last appearance in this city last night, for at the close of this, his second season, with the Boston Orchestra, he will return to Berlin.

Ona B. Talbot, to whom the Indianapolis musical public is indebted for the privilege of hearing this great orchestra, announces a return engagement of Vladimir de Pachmann, the famous Chopin pianist, in a two-part program, the first of miscellaneous composers and the second of Chopin works, February 13, and also a special program by the world famous soprano Marcella Sembrich, with Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, and Michael V. Zadora, pianist, Tuesday evening, April 28.

EVENING BULLETIN, PROVIDENCE.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last appearance of Dr. Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this city will be on Wednesday night at Infantry Hall, when the orchestra will give the third and last of its concerts for this season. The sale of seats will begin this morning at Steinert's music store. The programme is the most brilliant that Dr. Muck has ever offered in this city and includes Tschaikowsky's "Sixth Symphony," better known as the "Pathetic;" Grieg's pianoforte concerto in A-minor and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana." The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE
WEDNESDAY EV'NG, FEB. 12
at 8:15
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
DR. KARL MUCK.....Conductor.
(His last appearance in Providence)
Soloist RUDOLPH GANZ
Programme—Tschaikowski's "Symphonie Pathetique;" Grieg's Concerto for piano in A-minor; Chabrier's "Rhapsodie Espana."
Seats now selling at Steinerts', 327 Westminster street.
Prices $1.50, $1.[illegible] 75 cents.

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1908

Madame Schumann-Heink, who has so generously given her services to the Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, is put to no little inconvenience to get here. She sigs with the Pittsburgh Orchestra in Pittsburgh on Saturday afternoon, and will then take a train to New York, and come over here Sunday morning.

The last concert to be given this season by the Longy Club will take place in Potter Hall Feb. 10. Three numbers are on the programme.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL.
FEBRUARY 9, 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Series Will be Given Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on next Wednesday evening promises to be a notable affair in more ways than one. In the first place, it is the last concert of the series, and will give music lovers of this city their final opportunity to hear the orchestra this year. More important even than that is that it will mark Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Providence. As already announced, the management of the orchestra has been unable to secure for Dr. Muck a further leave of absence from his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and at the end of this season he must return to Germany to resume his duties there and the Boston Symphony Orchestra must again try to secure a conductor.

The programme for Wednesday's concert is one which should appeal to all classes of music lovers. The symphony is by all odds the most popular and at the same time most beautiful of modern works in that form. It has been called the "Swan Song" of the composer, because it was finished and had its first performance under his direction shortly before his unexpected and untimely death, and until his brother's authoritative biography was published it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky wrote the symphony under the impression that he was soon to die, but his letters and diary prove to the contrary. Dr. Muck played this symphony in Boston last year, and made a veritable sensation by his highly colored and emotional reading of the work.

Mr. Rudolf Ganz, the soloist, should need no introduction in Providence. This young Swiss, who, on account of his many years of residence in this country has become an exceedingly good American, is unquestionably to-day one of the great men of the piano. There are certain scholarly and intellectual qualities in his playing that rather set him aside from the majority of men who practice his branch of the art, and to these are most happily wedded strong emotional feeling and a remarkable sense for color.

The final number is the Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, one of the most brilliant of the younger Frenchmen, whose untimely death deprived France of a real genius. The rhapsody is one of the most brilliant works in the modern repertory.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert will be on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of on Tuesday night, as it usually is.

NEWS-DEMOCRAT. PROVIDENCE.
FEBRUARY 11, 1908.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Lest patrons of the Boston Symphony should make a mistake and go to Infantry hall tonight to hear the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is well to repeat again that the concert will be tomorrow, Wednesday evening, at 8:15, instead of on this evening, the night on which it naturally would have fallen. Its slight change in schedule was made necessary by some important engagements in Boston, and although from the beginning it has been announced that this concert would take place on Wednesday, habit is very strong, and it is to be hoped that no one will take the trouble to go to Infantry hall this evening only to find it quite dark.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date FEB 5

Last Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season and the farewell appearance in Providence of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, will take place in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. The soloist will be Rudolf Ganz, who will play the Grieg concerto. Tickets go on sale at Steinerts', Westminster street, on Saturday morning.

[135]

From [illegible]

Address DETROIT, MICH.

Date FEB 1- 1908

TUESDAY'S audience assembled to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the most brilliant of the season. All the best people were there, and what speaks for musical intelligence and devotion as well as breeding, were well behaved. One could not help but be impressed with the decorum of those adjacent when one of the audience fainted. Physicians were summoned, restoratives applied, and although it was perhaps fifteen minutes before the patient recovered sufficiently to leave the building, the concert proceeded, not a chair was moved nor a neck craned, and it is doubtful if Dr. Muck knew anything unusual had happened.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, who has by the kind permission of the Emperor of Germany, been loaned to the Americans for another year, arrived with his talented wife, early Tuesday morning in advance of the orchestra, and were the guests for the day of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph M. Dyar. An automobile ride to the Country Club occupied the morning, Dr. Muck being an enthusiastic motorist. Mr. and Mrs. N. J. Corey accompanied them. Returning to the city Mr. and Mrs. Stearns entertained them at luncheon at the residence of Mr. Frederick K. Stearns. The party was further augmented at luncheon by Miss Clara Dyar, Mr. Alpheus Chittenden and Mrs. Sweet. After luncheon they were entertained by Mr. Freer in his beautiful home on Ferry avenue, when he exhibited to his talented guests the very cream of his fine collections and tea was served in the famous "Peacock Room."

POST, MONDAY,
FEBRUARY 10, 1908

PENSION FUND CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES.

The second and last Symphony Pension Fund concert of the year took place yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. Mme. Schumann-Heink was soloist. The programme, consisting of excerpts from the works of Richard Wagner, was as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser," Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltrante's narrative from "Die Gotterdamerung," the funeral music from "Die Gotterdamerung," the prelude to "Parsifal."

There is little new that can be said at the present time of Dr. Muck's conducting of Wagner. As at previous concerts of this kind the men responded with the utmost willingness to the slightest wish of their leader, and there was as usual the incisiveness, the brilliancy, the warmth and elasticity of tempo that go to make such performances under Dr. Muck an unmitigated delight.

If the opening overture was tonally a a trifle rough, it had fiery dramatic impulse in abundance, and the prelude to "Lohengrin" was a marvel of ravishing euphony.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, a great artist—and to how few those words can be applied—has never sung in this city more nobly, more impressively and with more excellence of diction and vocalization than she did on this occasion. Although the practice of giving scenes from the Wagner operas in concert halls is hardly to be encouraged, yet anyone present yesterday evening cannot but feel deep gratitude after hearing the Erda music, some of the greatest—one is almost tempted to say sublime—music that Wagner ever penned, sung so magnificently. At the close of her last number the singer was recalled again and again, and it was a well-deserved tribute to her art when the gentlemen of the orchestra rose to their feet and conductor and soloist exchanged a hearty handshake.

Needless to say, there was the greatest enthusiasm throughout the evening on this, the occasion of Dr. Muck's last appearance as conductor of the orchestra at any concert in this city save those of the regular series. The hall was filled to its seating capacity and many were obliged to stand.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 9- 1908

LAST ORCHESTRA CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist.

After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Washington, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

[illegible] Cutting Bureau in the World.
TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 9- 1908

When Dr. Carl Muck appears at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, with the Boston Symphony orchestra it will be the last but one of his visits to this city prior to sailing abroad. Dr. Muck has been called by the German Kaiser to fill the position of conductor at the Royal Opera of Berlin.

[136]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Unusually Interesting Afternoon with a Light Programme, Mme. Gerville-Reache for a Novel Singer, Goldmark's "Spring" Overture for Orchestral Virtuosity, and Mr. Chadwick at His Freest and Strongest in His "Symphonic Sketches"

The singing of Miss Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House was the unusual incident of the Symphony Concert of yesterday; the playing of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," brought one more proof of the high pitch of virtuosity, tonal brightness and expressive eloquence to which Dr. Muck has brought the orchestra; while the incisive and abiding impression of the afternoon lay in Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," performed as a whole for the first time hereabouts. As symphony concerts go, here and elsewhere, the programme was short and light, the music easy to understand and feel, and the singer novel. The audience took its pleasure accordingly, and testified to it with applause that recalled Dr. Muck and Miss Gerville-Réache impartially and that sought to discover Mr. Chadwick at the end of the "Sketches."

Miss Gerville-Reache is a singing actress, once of the Opéra Comique in Paris, again at La Monnaie at Brussels, and at present of Mr. Hammerstein's company in New York. By every sign of yesterday, she has sung but little outside the theatre, and, impulsively and almost unconsciously, she brought to the concert-room some of the methods and the means of opera. It is an old story that the custom of the concert-hall denies play of face and gesture to the operatic singer when she steps out of character and costume to stand before an orchestra or beside a piano. It is a custom, however, by which English-speaking audiences set more store than do the Latin publics to which Miss Gerville-Réache has oftenest sang. She had not gone far yesterday in Orpheus's "I Have Lost My Eurydice," out of Gluck's opera, before the histrionic impulse began to rise in her. Her hands began to stir; her face to darken and lighten. She could not, by temperament or by practice, act only with her tones in the restrained fashion of the concert-room. The singing-actress would out, and in the air from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah"—the familiar "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"—she gave herself rein. Her arms rose and fell expressively with the long sweeps of the music; her hands clasped and unclasped with its changing moods, her body began to stir with its rapturous and beguiling ecstasy. There was, indeed, no other way. The sensuous glow, the sheer intoxication of the music had possessed the singer and was possessing her audience. Perforce she brought all her powers to it.

A penny for the purists that say these things are unseemly in the concert-room. It is not a dry place, a cold place, an unhuman place. It ought to be very warm, very vital and very human, a place for emotion, expressive, responsive. It was so when Miss Gerville-Réache's voice was as the voice of Delilah and of Saint-Saëns's music charming Samson to her arms, and it was good to be within it. Yet, in a sense the singer little needed the aid of gesture and facial play. It is easy to quarrel with some of the vocal ways of Miss Gerville-Réache, with her insistent reaching for her higher tones in Orpheus's air, for example, and her occasional blurring of its pure and clear melodic line. So she has been taught, and so she practices, and the simplicity of Gluck's music and the loveliness of its edgeless phrases are evasive. They ask the eloquence of a perfect and serene vocal artistry, and that comes not nowadays out of the Opéra-Comique. But in Delilah's air, the warmth, the richness, the dark and vibrating color, the expressive quality of the singer's voice had fuller and more certain play. She held the sustained and mounting curve of Saint-Saëns's music, and she gave each phrase its glowing and gathering enticement.

Goldmark's overture of the spring is almost twenty years old, but it bears time lightly and remains even now a pretty piece of orchestral fancy and orchestral virtuosity. For once Goldmark has forgotten his Amazon queen, his Hindoo king, Briseis in Achilles's tent, old Merlin in young Vivien's clasping arms, his dreams of the Orient, his voices of legend. He has gone out into the hills and woods and valleys about Vienna, to see, hear and feel the spring. It is a mood that he courts seldom and a mood that curiously he tried to recall only two months ago—and at seventy-eight—in his music for Florizel and Perdita in his new opera of "The Winter's Tale." Yet the spring brought no such frank, pulsing and ecstatic song to Goldmark as it did to Schumann in his rich-voiced symphony of a new earth, air and life. Schumann was not an orchestral virtuoso, and it would have been better for the expression of his own imaginings and for the lasting effect of his symphonic music had he been a clearer and freer master of instrumental expression. Goldmark is an orchestral virtuoso, and by instinct and practice he cannot forget it. Thus his overture of springtime goes its twofold way. It is warm and bright with the moods and fancies that stirred in him, with the frank joy and the soft song to which they woke him. Idealized birds twitter, idealized leaves rustle, or the sky darkens and the wind turns cold, for spring in the Vienna woods is fitful. But the birds must twitter in virtuoso passages for the wood-winds, the joy of the spring must flash through changeful tonalities; the orchestra must be put to its mettle and lead to brilliant and sonorous climax. Such music easily invites the new voice of our orchestra. The overture went brightly, warmly, changefully, as a frank and joyous rhapsody of, and for, the spring; and it went as well as a nearly perfect piece of orchestral virtuosity in tonal beauty and balance, in clear rhythm and clear articulation in flowing phrase on phrase and in the vital vigor to which Dr. Muck whipped the climax. Heretofore our audiences have hardly known this [illegible] of Goldmark's

[illegible] him. He spun [illegible] tone-poem about Cleopatra and her [illegible] and there is no hiding his effort. He undertakes a choral ode for a Columbian exhibition, and he takes frequent fronsar of the magnitude of his purpose. The muses whom he would sing have not been always too quick to answer his call. In his symphonies, he is conscious of the weight of precedent and example behind. By many a sign he has taken the four "Symphonic Sketches" that really make an orchestral suite, less seriously and more lightly and come with them into his truest, most interesting and most stirring self. The Chadwick of the "Jubilee" that begins them

No cool gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee!

is good to hear for the warmth of invention, the vigor of expression, the free air and quick spring, the sheer physical, mental and musical high spirits that pervade it. He shouts orchestrally because he cannot help it; he sings orchestrally because he help it, and the shout and the song are American through and through. Then—for he is following the formal moods of a symphony—he turns to the soft, caressing, longing nocturne of the cradle song that he calls "Noel," and that he points with a poet's verse about the Virgin Mother and her Holy Babe. But like many a modern in the arts—Dagnan-Bouveret in painting, for example—it is the everlasting human love and yearning of father and mother for their own child of earth that he is singing and idealizing as he sings.

And so to the bluff fancies of the scherzo of "Hobgoblin." He will have no pit-i-patting Puck out of Mendelssohn and no titillating fairy out of Berlioz. For him the big-eared, blear-eyed, grotesque, overgrown boy-fairy of a Hobgoblin, who is always at his tricks and mischief and withal a little clumsily—not the Hobgoblin of poets, but of farm wenches in the old days by the kitchen fire when the corners of the room waver in the shadows. And the music is duly bluff, impish, masculine. Finally the sheer musical humor of the final movement—a tramps' song "of old clay pipes and rum," Bach travestied on the xylophone, fun fast and furious up and down the orchestra, with only a pause for the strange flash of quiet and half-mysterious song. The big, frank gamboling of the humor is very American. No less so is the sudden coming of the meditative song. It will be time on Monday to write of Mr. Chadwick as the most truly American of all our composers. For the moment there is only to rejoice in him—free, full and strong—a man writing for men—in these "Symphonic Sketches."

H. T. P.

EVENING TIMES,
PAWTUCKET, R. I.,
FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Providence will be the first of the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to say farewell to Dr. Muck, for his last appearance here will be at the third and last symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. As already has been announced, the management of the Boston Symphony has found it impossible to secure the services of Dr. Muck for another year.

For the last concert here Dr. Muck has arranged a most brilliant and popular programme. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 6 in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." This was the great Russian's last gift to the world which he so ornamented, and the symphony had its first performance under his direction not long before he succumbed to the cholera which was raging in St. Petersburg at that time. For this reason the symphony is often called his "Swan Song," and until the appearance of his brother Modeste Tschaikowsky's authoritative biography it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky in the symphony embodied the premonition of his death.

The soloist will be Rudolf Ganz, the distinguished Swiss pianist, who is generally regarded now as the greatest of the younger generation of men who have made the piano their specialty. He is scholarly and intellectual in his playing, and at the same time is deeply emotional and has a remarkable feeling of instrumental color. He will play the ever beautiful concerto for the piano by Edvard Grieg.

The final number will be the brilliant Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death deprived France of an unquestionable musical genius.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert is on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of upon the usual Tuesday.

[illegible] this aria was inferior to that of Delilah's air.

The phrasing was too often broken without sufficient reason; the attack was not always precise. Furthermore, the opening section was taken at too slow a pace, and other passages were dragged. Nor was the diction always impressive. The first section gains when it is sung with suppressed agony, with the suggestion of Orpheus stunned and almost mute. As Miss Gerville-Reache conceived the aria, there was no one and great climax. Yet in this song there were the [illegible] ments, and there was the [illegible] passionately eloquent [illegible]

[illegible] Gives Hall a Vagrom Ballad" [illegible] wick's Suite Played for [illegible] Time in Boston.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Muck conductor, gave its [illegible] last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Sketches, a suite.....
"I Have Lost My Eurydice".....
"My Heart to Thy Dear Voice".....
Overture—"In Spring".....

Mr. Chadwick's suite, "Symphonic Sketches," is in four movements—"Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin"—with a reference to the mischievous Puck; "A Vagrom Ballad." The suite was played for the first time at these concerts. "Jubilee," "Noel" and "A Vagrom Ballad" were composed in 1895-6; "Hobgoblin" is of a later date—1904. At least some of these pieces have been played in Boston, and they were then applauded.

There were some that objected to the Finale of Mr. Schelling's Suite a few nights ago because, forsooth, the principal motive of the finale, a Virginia reel tune, "Dixie," and the Symphony orchestra should not play "Dixie," an undignified tune, at a symphony concert.

Rollicking finales with tunes more or less trivial by Haydn may be performed, and little dances with sleigh bells and the posthorn by Mozart may be performed, for Haydn and Mozart are dead and have been reckoned among the great. Their unbuttoning may be excused or even praised. A contemporary composer must always be smug and dignified, with a double breasted frock coat, choker, chaste and approved [illegible]. He may have nothing to say but formulas and platitudes; he may not have a spark of originality; he may be [illegible] derous and dull; all will be forgiven him, provided he be eminently respectable in symphony, suite, overture, sonata.

What will the stanch admirers of the conventional, the sticklers for "dignity" say to Mr. Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad" with its motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes.
And the "thirty days" to come:

What, pray, will they say to this?

I single out this ballad, for it is the most original, the strongest, the most imaginative and the most characteristic movement of the four.

Sentiment Pleases Many.

The "Jubilee" and the "Noel" have those qualities that make for immediate popularity. The former, with its pleasing suggestion of the double shuffle, its opening burst of joyous recklessness and "whoop-her-up-again-boys" spirit is marred, to my mind, by the length of a section that is sentimental in the male-quartet-on-the-old-plantation manner, yet it must be confessed that this sentiment pleases the many, and it no doubt has its place in a work that does not prescribe to itself too preposterously and is written frankly to entertain.

The "Noel" is a euphonious nocturne. The "Hobgoblin" scherzo is [illegible] and it has a certain humor in keeping with the Shakespearian motto—the reference to Robin Goodfellow or Puck. But in the "Vagrom Ballad" there is the revelation of marked individuality. Here, the thought as well as the style is the man. There is a picturesque grimness in the music; there is the musical portraiture of a typical character.

Here is true imagination and of uncommon quality. The [illegible] capital musical jest, but it is much more than that: It is the work of a thoroughly equipped musician.

Neither the modern composer nor the modern hearer should wish always to be in "Ercles' vein," nor should either long to associate, as far as musical enjoyment is concerned, only with Manfred and the melancholy husband of Mrs. Hallér. Centuries ago Athenaeus suggested that the purpose of music, especially in banquet halls, is this: "It softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy." We have all gone to the other extreme: to us music is now associated with the spread and enlargement of gloom and with the attempt to solve the problem of the universe.

It is a good thing to hear occasionally music that is entertaining: music that by frankness of melody, by rhythm, and by the expression of [illegible] spirits cheers and enlivens. Nor should it be forgotten that in this same "Vagrom Ballad" there is a section near the close full of mystery and wailing. Whether this section had in the composer's mind a burlesque significance, whether it pictures the woe of the tramp sentenced to "30 days," is immaterial. The music is here highly original and effective.

The audience appreciated warmly the suite, and Mr. Chadwick was twice called on to bow in thanks. The performance was an excellent one, though there is a question whether the sentimental rate of a portion of the first movement is not overemphasized.

Manhattan Star Heard.

Miss Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House sang for the first time at these concerts. She sang here several weeks ago at one of Mrs. McAllister's morning concerts, and then made a favorable impression. It was her intention to sing last night the music of Dido's death scene in Berlioz's "Trojans at Carthage." Inability to procure the orchestral parts prevented the performance.

She gave a superb interpretation of Delilah's air of seduction. Her voice, unusual in color, richness, compass, is a glorious organ for the display of passion, with tones of irresistible appeal. In this aria she sang with [illegible] appreciation of the [illegible] phrases that were now as [illegible] velvet and now as a [illegible] fuming flame; with [illegible] suous entreaty, for [illegible] dwelt in the valley of [illegible] ordinary wanton.

Seldom if ever has this [illegible] melody of Saint-Saens been [illegible] with such beauty and [illegible] with such compelling charm of [illegible] tion.

She was [illegible]

From ...

Address ...

Date FEB 1- 1908

TUESDAY'S audience assembled to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the most brilliant of the season. All the best people were there, and what speaks for musical intelligence and devotion as well as breeding, were well behaved. One could not help but be impressed with the decorum of those adjacent when one of the audience fainted. Physicians were summoned, restoratives applied, and although it was perhaps fifteen minutes before the patient recovered sufficiently to leave the building, the concert proceeded, not a chair was moved nor a neck craned, and it is doubtful if Dr. Muck knew anything unusual had happened.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, who has by the kind permission of the Emperor of Germany, been loaned to the Americans for another year, arrived with his talented wife, early Tuesday morning in advance of the orchestra, and were the guests for the day of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph M. Dyar. An automobile ride to the Country Club occupied the morning, Dr. Muck being an enthusiastic motorist. Mr. and Mrs. N. J. Corey accompanied them. Returning to the city Mr. and Mrs. Stearns entertained them at luncheon at the residence of Mr. Frederick K. Stearns. The party was further augmented at luncheon by Miss Clara Dyar, Mr. Alpheus Chittenden and Mrs. Sweet. After luncheon they were entertained by Mr. Freer in his beautiful home on Ferry avenue, when he exhibited to his talented guests the very cream of his fine collections and tea was served in the famous "Peacock Room."

POST, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1908

PENSION FUND CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second and last Symphony Pension Fund concert of the year took place yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. Mme. Schumann-Heink was soloist. The programme, consisting of excerpts from the works of Richard Wagner, was as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser," Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," Waltrante's narrative from "Die Gotterdamerung," the funeral music from "Die Gotterdamerung," the prelude to "Parsifal."

There is little new that can be said at the present time of Dr. Muck's conducting of Wagner. As at previous concerts of this kind the men responded with the utmost willingness to the slightest wish of their leader, and there was as usual the incisiveness, the brilliancy, the warmth and elasticity of tempo that go to make such performances under Dr. Muck an unmitigated delight.

If the opening overture was tonally a a trifle rough, it had fiery dramatic impulse in abundance, and the prelude to "Lohengrin" was a marvel of ravishing euphony.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, a great artist—and to how few those words can be applied—has never sung in this city more nobly, more impressively and with more excellence of diction and vocalization than she did on this occasion. Although the practice of giving scenes from the Wagner operas in concert halls is hardly to be encouraged, yet anyone present yesterday evening cannot but feel deep gratitude after hearing the Erda music, some of the greatest—one is almost tempted to say sublime—music that Wagner ever penned, sung so magnificently. At the close of her last number the singer was recalled again and again, and it was a well-deserved tribute to her art when the gentlemen of the orchestra rose to their feet and conductor and soloist exchanged a hearty handshake.

Needless to say, there was the greatest enthusiasm throughout the evening on this, the occasion of Dr. Muck's last appearance as conductor of the orchestra at any concert in this city save those of the regular series. The hall was filled to its seating capacity and many were obliged to stand.

TIMES

1 - 1908

LAST ORCHESTRA CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist.

After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Washington, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

...r Cutting Bureau, ... the World

TIMES

1 - 1908

When Dr. Carl Muck appears at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will be the last but one of his visits to this city prior to going abroad. Dr. Muck has been called by the German Kaiser to fill the position of conductor at the Royal Opera of Berlin.

[136]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY ... 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Unusually Interesting Afternoon with a Light Programme, Mme. Gerville-Reache for a Novel Singer, Goldmark's "Spring" Overture for Orchestral Virtuosity, and Mr. Chadwick at His Freest and Strongest in His "Symphonic Sketches"

The singing of Miss Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House was the unusual incident of the Symphony Concert of yesterday; the playing of Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," brought one more proof of the high pitch of virtuosity, tonal brightness and expressive eloquence to which Dr. Muck has brought the orchestra; while the incisive and abiding impression of the afternoon lay in Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," performed as a whole for the first time hereabouts. As symphony concerts go, here and elsewhere, the programme was short and light, the music easy to understand and feel, and the singer novel. The audience took its pleasure accordingly, and testified to it with applause that recalled Dr. Muck and Miss Gerville-Réache impartially and that sought to discover Mr. Chadwick at the end of the "Sketches."

Miss Gerville-Reache is a singing actress, once of the Opéra Comique in Paris, again of La Monnaie at Brussels, and at present of Mr. Hammerstein's company in New York. By every sign of yesterday, she has sung but little outside the theatre, and, impulsively and almost unconsciously, she brought to the concert-room some of the methods and the means of opera. It is an old story that the custom of the concert-hall denies play of face and gesture to the operatic singer when she steps out of character and costume to stand before an orchestra or beside a piano. It is a custom, however, by which English-speaking audiences set more store than do the Latin publics to which Miss Gerville-Réache has oftenest sang. She had not gone far yesterday in Orpheus's "I Have Lost My Eurydice," out of Glück's opera, before the histrionic impulse began to rise in her. Her hands began to stir; her face to darken and lighten. She could not, by temperament or by practice, act only with her tones in the restrained fashion of the concert-room. The singing-actress would out, and in the air from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah"—the familiar "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice"—she gave herself rein. Her arms rose and fell expressively with the long sweeps of the music; her hands clasped and unclasped with its changing moods, her body began to stir with its rapturous and beguiling ecstasy. There was, indeed, no other way. The sensuous glow, the sheer intoxication of the music had possesed the singer and was possessing her audience. Perforce she brought all her powers to it.

A penny for the purists that say these things are unseemly in the concert-room. It is not a dry place, a cold place, an unhuman place. It ought to be very warm, very vital and very human, a place for emotion, expressive, responsive. It was so when Miss Gerville-Réache's voice was as the voice of Delilah and of Saint-Saëns's music charming Samson to her arms, and it was good to be within it. Yet, in a sense the singer little needed the aid of gesture and facial play. It is easy to quarrel with some of the vocal ways of Miss Gerville-Réache, with her insistent reaching for her higher tones in Orpheus's air, for example, and her occasional bluring of its pure and clear melodic line. So she has been taught, and so she practices, and the simplicity of Gluck's music and the loveliness of its edgeless phrases are evasive. They ask the eloquence of a perfect and serene vocal artistry, and that comes not nowadays out of the Opéra-Comique. But in Delilah's air, the warmth, the richness, the dark and vibrating color, the expressive quality of the singer's voice had fuller and more certain play. She held the sustained and mounting curve of Saint-Saëns's music, and she gave each phrase its glowing and gathering enticement.

Goldmark's overture of the spring is almost twenty years old, but it bears time lightly and remains even now a pretty piece of orchestral fancy and orchestral virtuosity. For once Goldmark has forgotten his Amazon queen, his Hindoo king, Briseis in Achilles's tent, old Merlin in young Vivien's clasping arms, his dreams of the Orient, his voices of legend. He has gone out into the hills and woods and valleys about Vienna, to see, hear and feel the spring. It is a mood that he courts seldom and a mood that curiously he tried to recall only two months ago—and at seventy-eight—in his music for Florizel and Perdita in his new opera of "The Winter's Tale." Yet the spring brought no such frank, pulsing and ecstatic song to Goldmark as it did to Schumann in his rich-voiced symphony of a new earth, air and life. Schumann was not an orchestral virtuoso, and it would have been better for the expression of his own imaginings and for the lasting effect of his symphonic music had he been a clearer and freer master of instrumental expression. Goldmark is an orchestral virtuoso, and by instinct and practice he cannot forget it. Thus his overture of springtime goes its twofold way. It is warm and bright with the moods and fancies that stirred in him, with the frank joy and the soft song to which they woke him. Idealized birds twitter, idealized leaves rustle, or the sky darkens and the wind turns cold, for spring in the Vienna woods is fitful. But the birds must twitter in virtuoso passages for the wood-winds, the joy of the spring must flash through changeful tonalities; the orchestra must be put to its mettle and lead to brilliant and sonorous climax. Such music easily invites the new voice of our orchestra. The overture went brightly, warmly, changefully, as a frank and joyous rhapsody of, and for, the spring; and it went as well as a nearly perfect piece of orchestral virtuosity in tonal beauty and balance, in clear rhythm and clear articulation in flowing phrase on phrase and in the vital vigor to which Dr. Muck whipped the climax. Heretofore our audiences have hardly known this pitch of Goldmark's vernal eloquence.

Mr. Chadwick [illegible] beat end he is seeking sits not too heavily upon him. He spurs himself to the writing of a tone-poem about Cleopatra and her Antony, and there is no hiding his effort. He undertakes a choral ode for a Columbian exhibition, and he takes frequent thought of the magnitude of his purpose. The muses whom he would sing have not been always too quick to answer his call. In his symphonies, he is conscious of the weight of precedent and example behind. By many a sign he has taken the four "Symphonic Sketches" that really make an orchestral suite, less seriously and more lightly and come with them into his truest, most interesting and most stirring self. The Chadwick of the "Jubilee" that begins them

No cool gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee!

is good to hear for the warmth of invention, the vigor of expression, the free air and quick spring, the sheer physical, mental and musical high spirits that pervade it. He shouts orchestrally because he cannot help it; he sings orchestrally because he help it, and the shout and the song are American through and through. Then—for he is following the formal moods of a symphony—he turns to the soft, caressing, longing nocturne of the cradle song that he calls "Noel," and that he points with a poet's verse about the Virgin Mother and her Holy Babe. But like many a modern in the arts—Dagnan-Bouveret in painting, for example—it is the everlasting human love and yearning of father and mother for their own child of earth that he is singing and idealizing as he sings.

And so to the bluff fancies of the scherzo of "Hobgoblin." He will have no pit-i-patting Puck out of Mendelssohn and no titillating fairy out of Berlioz. For him the big-eared, blear-eyed, grotesque, overgrown boy-fairy of a Hobgoblin, who is always at his tricks and mischief and withal a little clumsily—not the Hobgoblin of poets, but of farm wenches in the old days by the kitchen fire when the corners of the room waver in the shadows. And the music is duly bluff, impish, masculine. Finally the sheer musical humor of the final movement—a tramps' song "of old clay pipes and rum." Bach travestied on the xylophone, fun fast and furious up and down the orchestra, with only a pause for the strange flash of quiet and half-mysterious song. The big, frank gambolling of the humor is very American. No less so is the sudden coming of the meditative song. It will be time on Monday to write of Mr. Chadwick as the most truly American of all our composers. For the moment there is only to rejoice in him—free, full and strong—a man writing for men—in these "Symphonic Sketches."

H. T. P.

EVENING TIMES, PAWTUCKET, R. I., FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Providence will be the first of the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to say farewell to Dr. Muck, for his last appearance here will be at the third and last symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. As already has been announced, the management of the Boston Symphony has found it impossible to secure the services of Dr. Muck for another year.

For the last concert here Dr. Muck has arranged a most brilliant and popular programme. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's No. 6 in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." This was the great Russian's last gift to the world which he so ornamented, and the symphony had its first performance under his direction not long before he succumbed to the cholera which was raging in St. Petersburg at that time. For this reason the symphony is often called his "Swan Song," and until the appearance of his brother Modeste Tschaikowsky's authoritative biography it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky in the symphony embodied the premonition of his death.

The soloist will be Rudolf Ganz, the distinguished Swiss pianist, who is generally regarded now as the greatest of the younger generation of men who have made the piano their specialty. He is scholarly and intellectual in his playing, and at the same time is deeply emotional and has a remarkable feeling of instrumental color. He will play the ever beautiful concerto for the piano by Edvard Grieg.

The final number will be the brilliant Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death deprived France of an unquestionable musical genius.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert is on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of upon the usual Tuesday.

Miss Gerville-Reache's performance of this aria was inferior to that of Delilah's air.

The phrasing was too often broken without sufficient reason; the attack was not always precise. Furthermore, the opening section was taken at too slow a pace, and other passages were dragged. Nor was the diction always impressive. The first section gains when it is sung with suppressed agony, with the suggestion of Orpheus stunned and almost mute. As Miss Gerville-Reache conceived the aria, there was no one and great climax. Yet in this song there were thrilling moments, and there was the sight of a passionately eloquent singer, not a singing machine.

HERALD—BOSTON

FEBRUARY 9, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

"A Vagrom Ballad" of Chadwick's Suite Played for First Time in Boston.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, gave its 14th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Sketches, a suite.....Chadwick
"I Have Lost My Eurydice".....Gluck
"My Heart to Thy Dear Voice"....Saint-Saens
Overture—"In Spring".....Goldmark

Mr. Chadwick's suite, "Symphonic Sketches," is in four movements: "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin"—with reference to the mischievous Puck; "A Vagrom Ballad." The suite was played for the first time at these concerts. "Jubilee," "Noel" and "A Vagrom Ballad" were composed in 1895-6; "Hobgoblin" is of a later date—1904. At least three of these pieces have been played in Boston, and they were then applauded.

There were some that objected to the Finale of Mr. Schelling's Suite a fortnight ago because, forsooth, the chief motive of the finale, a Virginia reel, is "Dixie," and the Symphony orchestra should not play "Dixie," an undignified tune, at a symphony concert.

Rollicking finales with tunes more trivial by Haydn may be performed; little dances with sleigh bells and a posthorn by Mozart may be performed; for Haydn and Mozart are dead and reckoned among the great. Their unbuttoning may be excused or even praised. A contemporary composer must always be smug and dignified with a double breasted frock coat, choker, chaste and approved cravat. He may have nothing to say but formulas and platitudes; he may not have a spark of originality; he may be ponderous and dull; all will be forgiven him, provided he be eminently respectable in symphony, suite, overture, sonata.

What will the stanch admirers of the conventional, the sticklers for "dignity," say to Mr. Chadwick's "Vagrom Ballad," with its motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come:

What, pray, will they say to this?

I single out this ballad, for it is the most original, the strongest, the most imaginative and the most characteristic movement of the four.

Sentiment Pleases Many.

The "Jubilee" and the "Noel" have those qualities that make for immediate popularity. The former, with its pleasing suggestion of the double shuffle, its opening burst of joyous recklessness and "whoop-her-up-again-boys" spirit is marred, to my mind, by the length of a section that is sentimental in the male-quartet-on-the-old-plantation manner, yet it must be confessed that this sentiment pleases the many, and it no doubt has its place in a work that does not prescribe to itself too preposterously and is written frankly to entertain.

The "Noel" is a euphonious nocturne. The "Hobgoblin" scherzo is well made and it has a certain humor in keeping with the Shakespearian motto—the reference to Robin Goodfellow or Puck. But in the "Vagrom Ballad" there is the revelation of marked individuality. Here, the thought as well as the style is the man. There is a picturesque grimness in the music; there is the musical portraiture of a typical character.

Here is true imagination and of an uncommon quality. The movement is a capital musical jest, but it is much more than that: It is the work of a thoroughly equipped musician.

Neither the modern composer nor the modern hearer should wish always to be in "Ercles' vein," nor should either one long to associate, as far as musical enjoyment is concerned, only with Manfred and the melancholy husband of Mrs. Haller. Centuries ago Athenaeus suggested that the purpose of music, especially in banquet halls, is this: "It softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy." We have all gone to the other extreme; to us music is now associated with the spread and enlargement of gloom and with the attempt to solve the problems of the universe.

It is a good thing to hear occasionally music that is entertaining; music that by frankness of melody, by force of rhythm, and by the expression of animal spirits cheers and enlivens. Nor should it be forgotten that in this same "Vagrom Ballad" there is a section near the close full of mystery and wailing. Whether this section had in the composer's mind a burlesque significance, whether it pictures the woe of the tramp sentenced to "30 days," is immaterial. The music is here highly original and effective.

The audience appreciated warmly the suite, and Mr. Chadwick was twice called on to bow in thanks. The performance was an excellent one, though there is a question whether the sentimental nature of a portion of the first movement was not overemphasized.

Manhattan Star Heard.

Miss Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House sang for the first time at these concerts. She sang here some weeks ago at one of Mrs. McAlister's morning concerts, and then made a favorable impression. It was her intention to sing last night the music of Dido's death scene in Berlioz's "Trojans at Carthage." Inability to procure the orchestral parts prevented the performance.

She gave a superb interpretation of Delilah's air of seduction. Her voice is unusual in color, richness, compass. It is a glorious organ for the display of passion, with tones of irresistible appeal. In this aria she sang with a fine appreciation of the melodic line; with phrases that were now as caressing velvet and now as a steady and consuming flame; with dignity in her sensuous entreaty, for the woman that dwelt in the valley of Sorek was no ordinary wanton.

Seldom if ever has this one great melody of Saint-Saens been sung here with such beauty and wealth of tone, with such compelling charm of diction.

She was less successful in the song of Orpheus, which is largely dependent on the situation and the action for its due effect. Count the performances you have heard in concert [illegible] they have moved you?

MUSICAL MATTERS

Chadwick Suite Played at the Symphony.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight of Much Interest.

Cecilia's Performance of "Job"—Other Concerts.

Prof G. W. Chadwick's suite for orchestra opened the 14th Symphony program, the work being played for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mrs Gerville-Reache, a young contralto from the Manhattan opera house in New York, who sang excerpts from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saens' opera "Samson and Delilah." Goldmark's "Spring" overture closed the program, which was unusually short.

The symphonic sketches by Prof Chadwick are in four parts, three of which have been played in this city by other orchestras, and the musical character of each movement was suggested by various sentiments expressed in verse, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad" are the titles, and each one is treated in a manner to illustrate in instrumentation the chosen subject. In every instance Prof Chadwick has developed his ideas skilfully, and although utilizing modern methods and expressing the motifs by a modern orchestra, he is lucid and melodic in his forms, and his music is good to hear, for it is music that the average ear finds pleasing.

Skilled in scoring for orchestra and naturally a musician of original ideas, he has composed four little works that are valuable additions to musical literature. There is a deal of the "American" in the "Jubilee" part, with its strong rhythms and real tunes. The theme upon which "Noel" is based is plaintive in character, effective and very cleverly worked out.

In the "Hobgoblin" section the composer fairly reveled in quaint, intermittent and oddity accentuated bits of orchestration, suggesting Strauss at times, yet keeping well within bounds and avoiding too much of the discordant. And in this will-o'-the-wisp music the orchestra appeared as effective as in the gentler and more connected score of the previous number.

The moanings of the clarinet and xylophone and the contrasts in a tramp's life on the road as set to music in "A Vagrom Ballad" were very amusing, the story being told in musical pictures that vividly exemplified the text. The suite is so thoroughly enjoyable that it should become one of the lighter "stand-bys" of the orchestra. The audience expressed great delight at the spirited performance of this admirable work.

Miss Gerville-Reache has an excellent contralto, sepulchral in its lower register and generally pleasing in quality, though somewhat unwieldy at present. Inclined to be dramatic, the singer was hardly at ease on the concert stage and she was inclined to exaggerate sentiment, to forget that she was for the time being merely the singer. As a whole her work was very satisfactory, and liberal applause was her reward after each selection.

Goldmark's dainty "Spring" overture was given with all the requisite grace and beauty of contrasts.

There will be four novelties on this week's program. Max Reger's variations on a theme by J. A. Hiller opens the list, then comes two pieces by G. Schelderup, a Scandinavian composer. The closing number is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," a work that caused Tschaikowsky's enthusiasm and which Dr Muck has said is one of the most wonderful pieces of orchestral work he knows anything about.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

The second and last pension fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall this evening, and the program will be devoted exclusively to the works of Wagner. To add to the interest of the occasion the soloist will be Mme Schumann-Heink, who holds a unique position as a singer of the contralto roles of the music dramas. Boston has had so little opportunity to hear any Wagner music since Dr Muck came that the chance that this concert brings is greatly welcomed by all music lovers. It is an interesting fact that so far this season on the symphony programs there has appeared but one work by Wagner, that being the "Kaisermarsch." This is due to Dr Muck's well-known dislike to putting Wagner on a symphony program, it being his belief that it has no proper place there.

The orchestra will play the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," and Mme Schumann-Heink is to sing two scenes from "The Ring," one the "Erde" scene from the "Rheingold," and the other the "Waltraute" scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The rest of the program will comprise "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" overtures, and the "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal" preludes.

Mme Schumann-Heink has with great generosity donated her services to the worthy cause for which the concert is given, and goes to considerable inconvenience to do so, as she is to make a flying trip from Pittsburg to this city in order to be present.

Last Longy Concert.

The last concert to be given this season by the Longy club will take place in Potter hall tomorrow evening. Three numbers are on the program: Alberic Magnard's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano; Mozart's trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon, and Arnold Foerster's suite in D major for two violins, two oboes, two horns and two

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. CHADWICK AS A TRUE AMERICAN COMPOSER

The American Mood and Spirit That Are in His "Symphonic Sketches" of Saturday's Symphony Concert and in Other of His Music—Wagner, Dr. Muck and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the Pension Fund—The Wit of Walkley and Archer—News of the Opera Companies—Mr. Sothern to Carry Dundreary to London—A Coming Change at the Globe

Mr. Chadwick, as his "Symphonic Sketches" suggested once more at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is the most American of our composers, because oftener than with the rest his music in mood and spirit sounds distinctively American. For a composer to live permanently and work steadily in America is not to write American music. Mr. Loeffler, for example, so lives and works, but there is not an American trait so far as we can recall in his music. To have been born in America is no title to the writing of American music as the compositions of Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and sundry other Teutonized Americans readily proves. In fact and in suggestion it is "made in Germany" as truly as though it were so invoiced in some musical customhouse. To write music from the melodies of primitive peoples, like the Indians or the Negroes, who happen to live on American soil, is to write music that often is only geographically American. Dvorák was still a Czech when he wrote such a symphony and called it "From the New World"; Mr. Farwell and all his brethren are often only experimenting with an aboriginal music that has next to nothing to do with the American spirit of today. Mr. MacDowell was narrowly individual through and through, and he would have dreamed his dreams of Arthur's court, Celtic queens and Norse warriors anywhere, and shaped his "Woodland Sketches" or his sea-pieces as readily in Wiesbaden as in Boston.

And so forth and so on with other American composers. Russian music, with all allowance for its folk-tunes and its other palpable national idiosyncracies, is Russian because the mood and the spirit of it is clearly recognizable as such. The mood and spirit of Sibelius's symphonies and tone-poems, again, is unmistakably of the North. Smetana's music is Bohemian, not because Bohemian legends stirred his fancy or he utilized Bohemian tunes, but because in temper and atmosphere is clearly Czech. Massenet's smacks of Paris even when he imagines he is more German than Wagner or more Italian than Mascagni. Cho-Cho-San is a geisha of Japan, but her voice in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" is Italianate with her passion. A score of other examples are as ready, to prove that the true test of nationality in music is not any comparatively extraneous circumstances, but its underlying, pervading and persuading spirit.

Mr. Chadwick's music seems so often American because it bears this test. Recall, for example, the scherzo of one of his symphonies—that in F, if we remember rightly—and its mood is altogether American. Black, "buck" roustabouts dance on the wharf; an American composer watches them and puts into his music their mood and his. Recall the "Columbian Ode" for the World's Fair at Chicago—American in each succeeding mood of pride in the past, exultation in the present, and confidence in the future. Recall a movement here and there in Mr. Chadwick's chamber music, and again comes memory of a distinctly American spirit. Turn, in particular, to the "Symphonic Sketches," as Dr. Muck and his men played them on Friday and Saturday. He is a German; they are of many nationalities, and, being foreigners, he and they perhaps sentimentalized the slow, contrasting passages of the first and the last "sketches" more than a sensitive American conductor and band would do. Allow for this; and grant, too, that the nocturne of parental affection and longing of the second "sketch" is universal and not particular in spirit. The three other "sketches" remain and in them the mood is vividly, stirringly, and, in two at least, irresistibly American. Americans "fool," Americans "jolly," and European observers are fane to lament these ingrained habits in us. Is Mr. Chadwick's final "sketch"—"The Vagrom Ballad" of "clay pipes and rum and broken heads and blackened eyes and thirty days to come"—anything else than musical "fooling" and musical "jollying," American in spirit and expression, and often at its loudest and most careless? Comes the slow, mysterious, sober song near the end. The inevitable "contrasting passage," the merely academic might call it. As it seems to us, it is far more a just musical incarnation of the tendency in the American temperament to turn suddenly serious, and deeply and unaffectedly so, in the midst of its "fooling," to run away into sober fancies and moods, and then as quickly turn "jolly" again.

Return through the scherzo of "Hobgoblin," and it is bluff music with an unmistakable sturdy American tang. Mr. Chadwick has taken his boy-fairy out of English farm steads to set him in American farm houses. He is a Hobgoblin who musically sets his ten fingers to his nose like the American hobbledehoy that he is. Pass to the first "sketch" of "Jubilee." Here, as now and then elsewhere in Mr. Chadwick's later music, is the echo of Negro tunes; but the American quality of the music lies little in that. Rather it is in the high and volatile spirits of the music, the sheer rough-and-tumble of it at its fullest moments. As was said on Saturday, the music shouts because it cannot help it, and sings because it cannot help it, and each as only Americans would shout and sing. And the intervening suaver passage, as in the last movement, is only the other face of this American coin. No, Mr. Chadwick does not write American music because he was born [illegible] then recalls an American folk-tune. He writes it because it is often, and especially of late years, intrinsically American in mood, spirit, and appeal. H. T. P.

Symphony Hall: A Wagner Concert

For the third time within thirteen months and for the third time for the profit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra Dr. Muck and the band gave last night a concert of music by Richard Wagner. As far as purely orchestral pieces go, the conductor was still firm in his belief that, even in this comparatively opera-less town, fragments of the music-dramas may not be shifted from the stage to the concert room without violence to Wagner's purpose and without clouding their musical and dramatic significance. He will not give us the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhäuser"; the gods may not go into Dalhalla without the light-man's rainbow bridge; the sounds of the forest may not murmur unless the stage is set for the second act of "Siegfried"; and we may not even hear the doleful shepherd's pipe before the curtain rises on the third act of "Tristan" unless the whole preceding course of the drama has prepared us for it. Dr. Muck is clearly right in any musical capital that has an opera house with Wagner's operas in the working repertory. But our nearest opera house necessitates the one o'clock train to New York, and none of us may take it every day. Circumstances might alter cases; but they do not with the loyal and resolute Dr. Muck, and again last night he led his men through the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and to "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Parsifal," and the music that glorifies the dead Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." Why Dr. Muck should permit this one orchestral excerpt from the body of the music-dramas is hard to understand. True it is played when mists or a material curtain veil the stage, but it is an integral part of the dramatic action of "Götterdämmerung" springing immediately from the preceding scene and leading immediately into the following. It is orchestrally self-contained, but is not dramatically independent.

So too are "The Entrance of the Gods" in "Das Rheingold" or the "Waldweben" in "Siegfried," but Dr. Muck will not have them in concert.

And what is there to be said on this score about Erda's warning to Wotan out of "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's narrative to Brünnhilde out of "Götterdämmerung," which Mme. Schumann-Heink sang last night? True, she had generously promised her services to the orchestra for its Pension Fund and she had kept her promise at no little travel—from Pittsburg, on Saturday, even to Boston on Sunday. The concert was to be a Wagner concert, and music for an alto voice in "The Ring" operas is far between. None the less Erda's warning to Wotan of the dismal day of the doom that the ring shall work for the gods loses its significance, lifted from the crisis in the divine tragedy in which the earth opens and discloses her. All the sombre power with which Dr. Muck clothed the orchestral background, and all the incisiveness of foreboding and sweep of warning that Mme. Schumann-Heink gave her words could not make them illusive or potent. Erda was a concert singer in blue silk before an orchestra with tenor tubas, and not the "All Wise-One" out of the underworld and the everlasting years. Perhaps Dr. Muck eased his high artistic conscience by Waltraute's picturing of the gods awaiting their doom. Erda has predicted the gloomy day of it. Waltraute has seen it near at hand and she has come to the Valkyr's rock to pray Brünnhilde to avert it. Her speech is musically complete, though the outcome hangs in concert in dramatic suspense. It is a mighty musical narrative, vivid with sights of tragedy, ominous with the voice of coming doom. The concert-room, the concert singer and the concert orchestra vanished. There was only Wotan—

"Auf hehrem Sitze, Stumm und ernst,"

only the awe-struck heroes, only the silent valkyrs and the pale and darkening Valhalla. The piece was an excerpt and nothing else out of the very body of "Götterdammerung," but were its significance and its power perceptibly less, sung and played as it was last night, than they are on the stage?

Moreover, the final justification of the transfer of Wagner's music—overtures or excerpts—from the theatre is such a performance as it received yesterday and such pleasure as it gave to an audience that filled every place in Symphony Hall. The day is late to dwell upon Dr. Muck's qualities as a conductor of Wagner's music, so far as he has disclosed them in the narow field to which he has chosen to limit himself. It were almost as late to dwell upon the play that the new musical vitality, the new dramatic accent, the new incisiveness of articulation and the new sweep of ardent power in our orchestra have in such music. The two overtures, the two preludes, Siegfried's apotheosis, the picture of the doomed gods, could hardly have been more musically eloquent, more dramatically vivid, more moving for beauty, power or poignancy of expressive tone than they were as Dr. Muck and his men and Mme. Schumann-Heink brought them to life. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was alive again with the rude sea, the doomed mariner, the saving and glorifying Senta. The prelude to "Lohengrin" touched a beauty that was no less than ethereal in its sustained and transparent glamor. The everlasting human passions battled in tones again in the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fragments of "The Ring" were epic—and alive. The anguish and the beatitude of "Parsifal" cried in equal voice. And with each piece the audience, still and tense, surrendered itself to the music and the answering emotions that it stirred. If these things are in a concert-room, what might they not be in the opera house that may yet come? H. T. P.

[137]

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick, Symphonic Sketches. Orchestral Suite.
Buck.....Aria, "Che Faro."
Saint Saens....Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Soloist, Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache.
Goldmark......"Spring" overture.

The above was the programme of the regular Saturday evening concert. It was a little briefer and somewhat more convivial than usual, the latter fact being due to Mr. Chadwick's touches of humor. Yet his set of four symphonic sketches had considerable subtlety and contained some tender poetic touches as well.

But, after all, the "Vagrom Ballad" was the gem of the set. What a difficult thing it is to idealize the commonplace! Charles Dibbin did it with sailor music; Burns could glorify even the indigestible Haggis in poetry; but very few have succeeded in this difficult field. In "A Vagrom Ballad" Mr. Chadwick goes into the domain of Vagabondia, somewhat as Burns in "Willie brewed a peck o' maut." The American tramp has never appeared in the classical repertoire before this. The motto of the movement runs:—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the 'thirty days' to come."

It is an American "Till Eulenspiegel" in which not the hoboe but the bass clarinette and bassoons have work to do. Even that most trashy of instruments, the Xylophone, is introduced into the score.

AS MUCK ENVOY TO KAISER

Manager Ellis of the Symphony orchestra is to go abroad as special emissary for

DR. KARL MUCK.

Maj. Higginson in quest of a conductor to succeed Karl Muck.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date FEB 9- 1908

THE soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in this city, and her appearance in this branch of her art will unquestionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar sang in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the orchestra management to have her as soloist several times this winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in opera it has been able to secure her only for this single appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhaeuser," and the second the Page's song from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding." Dr. Karl Muck is spending most of his spare time at functions given in his honor as retiring conductor. He has made many friends during his stay in this country. The first of the formal farewells to be given him was at the Harvard Union by the Deutscher Verein of that university. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, and from this city Owen Wister.

From [illegible] The World
BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date FEB 8- 1908

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, with Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This will be Miss Farrar's first appearance in concert. She will sing two numbers, "Elizabeth's Prayer" from "Tannhaeuser" and the Page's song from "Figaro's Wedding."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Chadwick Suite Played at the Symphony.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight of Much Interest.

Cecilia's Performance of "Job"—Other Concerts.

Prof G. W. Chadwick's suite for orchestra opened the 14th Symphony program, the work being played for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mrs Gerville-Reache, a young contralto from the Manhattan opera house in New York, who sang excerpts from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saens' opera "Samson and Delilah." Goldmark's "Spring" overture closed the program, which was unusually short.

The symphonic sketches by Prof Chadwick are in four parts, three of which have been played in this city by other orchestras, and the musical character of each movement was suggested by various sentiments expressed in verse. "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad" are the titles, and each one is treated in a manner to illustrate in instrumentation the chosen subject. In every instance Prof Chadwick has developed his ideas skilfully, and although utilizing modern methods and expressing the motifs by a modern orchestra, he is lucid and melodic in his forms, and his music is good to hear, for it is music that the average ear finds pleasing.

Skilled in scoring for orchestra and naturally a musician or original ideas, he has composed four little works that are valuable additions to musical literature. There is a deal of the "American" in the "Jubilee" part, with its strong rhythms and real tunes. The theme upon which "Noel" is based is plaintive in character, effective and very cleverly worked out.

In the "Hobgoblin" section the composer fairly reveled in quaint, intermittent and oddity accentuated bits of orchestration, suggesting Strauss at times, yet keeping well within bounds and avoiding too much of the discordant. And in this will-o'-the-wisp music the orchestra appeared as effective as in the gentler and more connected score of the previous number.

The moanings of the clarinet and xylophone and the contrasts in a tramp's life on the road as set to music in "A Vagrom Ballad" were very amusing, the story being told in musical pictures that vividly exemplified the text. The suite is so thoroughly enjoyable that it should become one of the lighter "stand-bys" of the orchestra. The audience expressed great delight at the spirited performance of this admirable work.

Miss Gerville-Reache has an excellent contralto, sepulchral in its lower register and generally pleasing in quality, though somewhat unwieldy at present. Inclined to be dramatic, the singer was hardly at ease on the concert stage and she was inclined to exaggerate sentiment, to forget that she was for the time being merely the singer. As a whole her work was very satisfactory and liberal applause was her reward after each selection.

Goldmark's dainty "Spring" overture was given with all the requisite grace and beauty of contrasts.

There will be four novelties on this week's program. Max Reger's variations on a theme by J. A. Hiller opens the list, then comes two pieces by G. Schelderup, a Scandinavian composer. The closing number is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," a work that roused Tschaikowsky's enthusiasm and which Dr Muck has said is one of the most wonderful pieces of orchestral work he knows anything about.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

The second and last pension fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall this evening, and the program will be devoted exclusively to the works of Wagner. To add to the interest of the occasion the soloist will be Mme Schumann-Heink, who holds a unique position as a singer of the contralto roles of the music dramas. Boston has had so little opportunity to hear any Wagner music since Dr Muck came that the chance that this concert brings is greatly welcomed by all music lovers.

It is an interesting fact that so far this season on the symphony programs there has appeared but one work by Wagner, that being the "Kaisermarsch." This is due to Dr Muck's well-known dislike to putting Wagner on a symphony program, it being his belief that it has no proper place there.

The orchestra will play the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," and Mme Schumann-Heink is to sing two scenes from "The Ring," one the "Erde" scene from the "Rheingold," and the other the "Waltraute" scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The rest of the program will comprise "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" overtures, and the "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal" preludes.

Mme Schumann-Heink has with great generosity donated her services to the worthy cause for which the concert is given, and goes to considerable inconvenience to do so, as she is to make a flying trip from Pittsburg to this city in order to be present.

Last Longy Concert.

The last concert to be given this season by the Longy club will take place in Potter hall tomorrow evening. Three numbers are on the program: Alberic Magnard's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano; Mozart's trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon, and Arthur Bird's suite in D major for two flutes, two oboes, two horns and two

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. CHADWICK AS A TRUE AMERICAN COMPOSER

The American Mood and Spirit That Are in His "Symphonic Sketches" of Saturday's Symphony Concert and in Other of His Music—Wagner, Dr. Muck and Mme. Schumann-Heink for the Pension Fund—The Wit of Walkley and Archer—News of the Opera Companies—Mr. Sothern to Carry Dundreary to London—A Coming Change at the Globe

Mr. Chadwick, as his "Symphonic Sketches" suggested once more at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is the most American of our composers, because oftener than with the rest his music in mood and spirit sounds distinctively American. For a composer to live permanently and work steadily in America is not to write American music. Mr. Loeffler, for example, so lives and works, but there is not an American trait so far as we can recall in his music. To have been born in America is no title to the writing of American music as the compositions of Templeton Strong, Arthur Bird and sundry other Teutonized Americans readily proves. In fact and in suggestion it is "made in Germany" as truly as though it were so invoiced in some musical custom-house. To write music from the melodies of primitive peoples, like the Indians or the Negroes, who happen to live on American soil, is to write music that often is only geographically American. Dvorák was still a Czech when he wrote such a symphony and called it "From the New World"; Mr. Farwell and all his brethren are often only experimenting with an aboriginal music that has next to nothing to do with the American spirit of today Mr. MacDowell was narrowly individual through and through, and he would have dreamed his dreams of Arthur's court, Celtic queens and Norse warriors anywhere, and shaped his "Woodland Sketches" or his sea-pieces as readily in Wiesbaden as in Boston.

And so forth and so on with other American composers. Russian music, with all allowance for its folk-tunes and its other palpable national idiosyncracies, is Russian because the mood and the spirit of it is clearly recognizable as such. The mood and spirit of Sibelius's symphonies and tone-poems, again, is unmistakably of the North. Smetana's music is Bohemian, not because Bohemian legends stirred his fancy or he utilized Bohemian tunes, but because in temper and atmosphere is clearly Czech. Massenet's smacks of Paris even when he imagines he is more German than Wagner or more Italian than Mascagni. Cho-Cho-San is a geisha of Japan, but her voice in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" is Italianate with her passion. A score of other examples are as ready, to prove that the true test of nationality in music is not any comparatively extraneous circumstances, but its underlying, pervading and persuading spirit.

Mr. Chadwick's music seems so often American because it bears this test. Recall, for example, the scherzo of one of his symphonies—that in F, if we remember rightly—and its mood is altogether American. Black, "buck" roustabouts dance on the wharf; an American composer watches them and puts into his music their mood and his. Recall the "Columbian Ode" for the World's Fair at Chicago—American in each succeeding mood of pride in the past, exultation in the present, and confidence in the future. Recall a movement here and there in Mr. Chadwick's chamber music, and again comes memory of a distinctly American spirit. Turn, in particular, to the "Symphonic Sketches," as Dr. Muck and his men played them on Friday and Saturday. He is a German; they are of many nationalities, and, being foreigners, he and they perhaps sentimentalized the slow, contrasting passages of the first and the last "sketches" more than a sensitive American conductor and band would do. Allow for this; and grant, too, that the nocturne of parental affection and longing of the second "sketch" is universal and not particular in spirit. The three other "sketches" remain and in them the mood is vividly, stirringly, and, in two at least, irresistibly American. Americans "fool," Americans "jolly," and European observers are fane to lament these ingrained habits in us. Is Mr. Chadwick's final "sketch"—"The Vagrom Ballad" of "clay pipes and rum and broken heads and blackened eyes and thirty days to come"—anything else than musical "fooling" and musical "jollying," American in spirit and expression, and often at its loudest and most careless? Comes the slow, mysterious, sober song near the end. The inevitable "contrasting passage," the merely academic might call it. As it seems to us, it is far more a just musical incarnation of the tendency in the American temperament to turn suddenly serious, and deeply and unaffectedly so, in the midst of its "fooling," to run away into sober fancies and moods, and then as quickly turn "jolly" again.

Return through the scherzo of "Hobgoblin," and it is bluff music with an unmistakable sturdy American tang. Mr. Chadwick has taken his boy-fairy out of English farm steads to set him in American farm houses. He is a Hobgoblin who musically sets his ten fingers to his nose like the American hobbledehoy that he is. Pass to the first "sketch" of "Jubilee." Here, as now and then elsewhere in Mr. Chadwick's later music, is the echo of Negro tunes; but the American quality of the music lies little in that. Rather it is in the high and volatile spirits of the music, the sheer rough-and-tumble of it at its fullest moments. As was said on Saturday, the music shouts because it cannot help it, and sings because it cannot help it, and each as only Americans would shout and sing. And the intervening suaver passage, as in the last movement, is only the other face of this American volatility. No, Mr. Chadwick does not writ American music because he was born in Lowell or because he lives and works in Boston, or because he now and then recalls an American folk-tune. He writes it because it is often, and especially of late years, intrinsically American in mood, spirit, and appeal. H. T. P.

Symphony Hall: A Wagner Concert

For the third time within thirteen months and for the third time for the profit of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck and the band gave last night a concert of music by Richard Wagner. As far as purely orchestral pieces go, the conductor was still firm in his belief that, even in this comparatively opera-less town, fragments of the music-dramas may not be shifted from the stage to the concert room without violence to Wagner's purpose and without clouding their musical and dramatic significance. He will not give us the "Bacchanale" from "Tannhäuser"; the gods may not go into Dalhalla without the light-man's rainbow bridge; the sounds of the forest may not murmur unless the stage is set for the second act of "Siegfried"; and we may not even hear the doleful shepherd's pipe before the curtain rises on the third act of "Tristan" unless the whole preceding course of the drama has prepared us for it. Dr. Muck is clearly right in any musical capital that has an opera house with Wagner's operas in the working repertory. But our nearest opera house necessitates the one o'clock train to New York, and none of us may take it every day. Circumstances might alter cases; but they do not with the loyal and resolute Dr. Muck, and again last night he led his men through the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and to "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Parsifal," and the music that glorifies the dead Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." Why Dr. Muck should permit this one orchestral excerpt from the body of the music-dramas is hard to understand. True it is played when mists or a material curtain veil the stage, but it is an integral part of the dramatic action of "Götterdämmerung" springing immediately from the preceding scene and leading immediately into the following. It is orchestrally self-contained, but is not dramatically independent. So too are "The Entrance of the Gods" in "Das Rheingold" or the "Waldweben" in "Siegfried," but Dr. Muck will not have them in concert.

And what is there to be said on this score about Erda's warning to Wotan out of "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's narrative to Brünnhilde out of "Götterdämmerung," which Mme. Schumann-Heink sang last night? True, she had generously promised her services to the orchestra for its Pension Fund and she had kept her promise at no little travel—from Pittsburg, on Saturday, even to Boston on Sunday. The concert was to be a Wagner concert, and music for an alto voice in "The Ring" operas is far between. None the less Erda's warning to Wotan of the dismal day of the doom that the ring shall work for the gods loses its significance, lifted from the crisis in the divine tragedy in which the earth opens and discloses her. All the sombre power with which Dr. Muck clothed the orchestral background, and all the incisiveness of foreboding and sweep of warning that Mme. Schumann-Heink gave her words could not make them illusive or potent. Erda was a concert singer in blue silk before an orchestra with tenor tubas, and not the "All Wise-One" out of the underworld and the everlasting years. Perhaps Dr. Muck eased his high artistic conscience by Waltraute's picturing of the gods awaiting their doom. Erda has predicted the gloomy day of it. Waltraute has seen it near at hand and she has come to the Valkyr's rock to pray Brünnholde to avert it. Her speech is musically complete, though the outcome hangs in concert in dramatic suspense. It is a mighty musical narrative, vivid with sights of tragedy, ominous with the voice of coming doom. The concert-room, the concert singer and the concert orchestra vanished. There was only Wotan—

"Auf hehrem Sitze, Stumm und ernst,"

only the awe-struck heroes, only the silent valkyrs and the pale and darkening Valhalla. The piece was an excerpt and nothing else out of the very body of "Götterdammerung," but were its significance and its power perceptibly less, sung and played as it was last night, than they are on the stage?

Moreover, the final justification of the transfer of Wagner's music—overtures or excerpts—from the theatre is such a performance as it received yesterday and such pleasure as it gave to an audience that filled every place in Symphony Hall. The day is late to dwell upon Dr. Muck's qualities as a conductor of Wagner's music, so far as he has disclosed them in the narow field to which he has chosen to limit himself. It were almost as late to dwell upon the play that the new musical vitality, the new dramatic accent, the new incisiveness of articulation and the new sweep of ardent power in our orchestra have in such music. The two overtures, the two preludes, Siegfried's apotheosis, the picture of the doomed gods, could hardly have been more musically eloquent, more dramatically vivid, more moving for beauty, power or poignancy of expressive tone than they were as Dr. Muck and his men and Mme. Schumann-Heink brought them to life. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was alive again with the rude sea, the doomed mariner, the saving and glorifying Senta. The prelude to "Lohengrin" touched a beauty that was no less than ethereal in its sustained and transparent glamor. The everlasting human passions battled in tones again in the overture to "Tannhäuser." The fragments of "The Ring" were epic—and alive. The anguish and the beatitude of "Parsifal" cried in equal voice. And with each piece the audience, still and tense, surrendered itself to the music and the answering emotions that it stirred. If these things are in a concert-room, what might they not be in the opera house that may yet come? H. T. P.

[137]

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick. Symphonic Sketches. Orchestral Suite.
Gluck.....Aria. "Che Faro."
Saint Saens....Aria from "Samson and Delilah."
Soloist, Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache.
Goldmark......"Spring" overture.

The above was the programme of the regular Saturday evening concert. It was a little briefer and somewhat more convivial than usual, the latter fact being due to Mr. Chadwick's touches of humor. Yet his set of four symphonic sketches had considerable subtlety and contained some tender poetic touches as well.

But, after all, the "Vagrom Ballad" was the gem of the set. What a difficult thing it is to idealize the commonplace! Charles Didbin did it with sailor music; Burns could glorify even the indigestible Haggis in poetry; but very few have succeeded in this difficult field. In "A Vagrom Ballad" Mr. Chadwick goes into the domain of Vagabondia, somewhat as Burns in "Willie brewed a peck o' maut." The American tramp has never appeared in the classical repertoire before this. The motto of the movement runs,—

"A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the 'thirty days' to come."

It is an American "Till Eulenspiegel" in which not the hoboe but the bass clarinette and bassoons have work to do. Even that most trashy of instruments, the Xylophone, is introduced into the score.

AS MUCK ENVOY TO KAISER

Manager Ellis of the Symphony orchestra is to go abroad as special emissary for

DR. KARL MUCK.

Maj. Higginson in quest of a conductor to succeed Karl Muck.

From PUBLIC

Address PHILA.

Date FEB 9 - 1908

THE soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on the evening of February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in this city, and her appearance in this branch of her art will unquestionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar sang in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the orchestra management to have her as soloist several times this winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in opera it has been able to secure her only for this single appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhaeuser," and the second the Page's song from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding." Dr. Karl Muck is spending most of his spare time at functions given in his honor as retiring conductor. He has made many friends during his stay in this country. The first of the formal farewells to be given him was at the Harvard Union by the Deutscher Verein of that university. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding and from this city Owen Wister.

[illegible] Dream in the World

[illegible] BULLETIN

[illegible] PHILADELPHIA PA

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, with Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This will be Miss Farrar's first appearance in Philadelphia on concert. She will sing two numbers "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhauser," and the "Page's Song," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

SYMPHONY EXCELS ITSELF AT FUND CONCERT

Plays Wagner as Master's Works Never Were Played Here Before. Schumann-Heink Heard at Her Best.

Once or twice in the course of a season the music lover is thrilled to the marrow, lifted into the seventh heaven, delighted almost beyond expression. There were supreme moments of this description at last night's pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, first when the orchestra played the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and later when Mrs. Shumann-Heink, accompanied by the orchestra, sang Waltraute's dramatic account of the return of the War Father to Walhalla, from "The Dusk of the Gods." They represented the acme of the interpretive art. They recalled what President Eliot of Harvard said at the reception given the other night in Dr. Muck's honor—that great is the sway of the interpreter of music, greatest of all the arts.

Dr. Muck is averse to playing Wagner in concerts. So to prove how unreasonable this view is he put on a Wagner program last night and gave an immense audience such pleasure as is seldom derived from Wagner, even by Wagnermaniacs who read all the books about the master and hammer out his preludes on the piano. The Wagner of last night's "Lohengrin" prelude, for instance, and of the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," not to hark back to the first-mentioned numbers, is a musical demigod with whom the mere opera-goer has but a scraping acquaintance.

The orchestra last night sang the "Tannhaeuser" song as no tenor ever heard here has sung it—with a power and beauty nearly unearthly. So, too, division after division of the unsurpassed band achieved effects of action and melody that are not to be met in opera houses—at least, not on this side of the ocean. Nor is it believable that Mrs. Schumann-Heink's glorious voice and equally glorious art could be displayed in circumstances quite as favorable as were those of yesterday. Certainly in the nine years during which Bostonians have welcomed and honored her she has never excelled—if she has ever quite matched—her performance of this Sunday night. She sang Erda's scene from "The Rhinegold" first; then the Waltraute music, and though she sang the former as perhaps no other contralto living today could sing it, she sang the latter even more superlatively well. After this she was recalled about a dozen times.

But the orchestra deservedly shared the honors of the occasion with her. After the "Tannhaeuser" number Dr. Muck bade the men stand up and receive their measure of the great applause. It was a handsome tribute, from conductor as well as audience, to their extraordinary skill and spirit.

The concert began with "The Flying Dutchman" overture and ended with the prelude to "Parsifal."

CHADWICK NIGHT AT REGULAR SYMPHONY

Boston furnished the most interesting feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert in the shape of George W. Chadwick's "Symphony Sketches," played here for the first time. The sketches are entitled "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." The first two were composed in 1895, "A Vagrom Ballard" the following year, and "Hobgoblin" in 1904. As a whole they show Mr. Chadwick at his best.

Except for "Noel," whose melancholy beauty might fit other scenes and seasons than those mentioned in the program, there was hardly any need of description, moods and adventures were so skilfully and happily reflected in the music. It was more than tunes cleverly prepared for orchestra; it was a fine expression of humanity in varying aspects. Dr. Muck and the orchestra entered admirably into the spirit of the little pieces and the effect was delightful. The audience applauded until Mr. Chadwick had twice bowed his acknowledgments.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache, one of the contraltos of the Manhattan Opera Company, who sang airs from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." There was also much applause over these numbers. The concert ended with a fine performance of Goldmark's beautiful "Spring" overture.

This week's program consists altogether of new works—Reger's "Variations on a Theme by J. A. Hiller," Schjelderups "Two Pieces for Orchestra," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

PRESS
PHILADELPHIA PA

FEB 8 - 1908

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance in this branch of her art will unquestionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar has sung in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the management of the orchestra to have her as soloist several times this Winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in opera, it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser," and the second number will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

HARVARD SOCIETY PAYS TRIBUTE TO RETIRING SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

As a tribute to his work in Boston, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a farewell dinner by the Deutscher Verein Society of Harvard last evening in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. The tribute was essentially a Harvard affair and was attended by seventy-five members and guests. After the dinner the verein held a German "kneipe," to which all members of the university were invited.

The speakers were President Eliot, Dr. Muck, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, Professor Muensterberg and Professor Spaulding. The speakers were introduced by E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09.

Prominent Guests.

Among the guests were: Walter Damrosch of New York, Arthur Foote, the noted composer; Professor Spalding of the music department of Harvard University, Frederick Connors, the composer; the German Consul Reincke, Owen Wister and Messrs. Gebhard and Ganz, the well known pianists of this city.

Professor Hugo Munsterburg, in his address in German, said: "New England represents Puritan idealism—idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce aetheticism Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Higginson's Tribute.

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck, said: "Four years ago I met Dr. Muck in Berlin playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men. To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more.

"Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Vohl,' but 'Auf Viedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

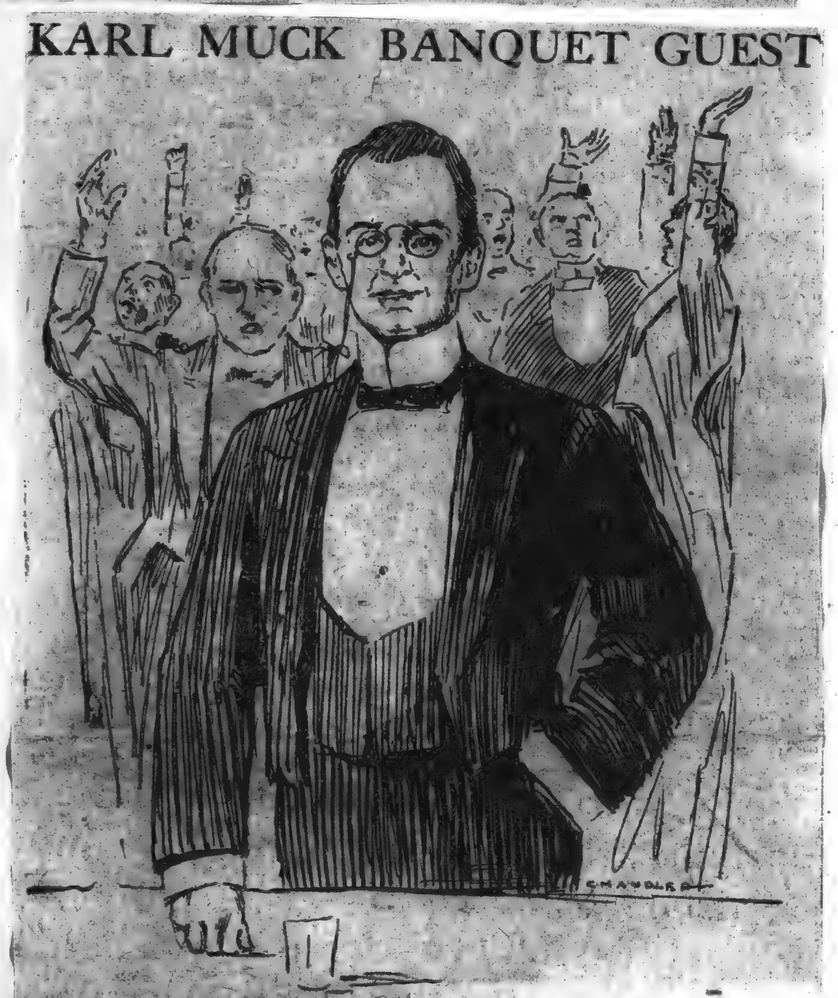
Finest of Arts.

President Eliot was the last speaker, and he began very modestly. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest of emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck."

HERALD—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1908

KARL MUCK BANQUET GUEST



KARL MUCK GUEST OF HARVARD MEN

Deutscher Verein Gives Dinner in His Honor—Prominent Men Speak.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor last night at a dinner given by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. President Hanfstaengl of the Deutscher Verein presided.

The speakers were President Eliot, Prof. Muensterberg, Maj. Higginson and Prof. Spalding.

Dr. Muck did not speak, but Maj. Higginson responded for him to the tribute paid by President Hanfstaengl as he arose and proposed his health.

Prof. Muensterburg said in parts: "New England represents Puritan idealism, idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck said in part: "To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to [138]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

from PHILADELPHIA PA

N.J.

date FEB 8 - 1908

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance in this branch of her art will arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar has sung in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the management of the orchestra to have her as soloist several times this winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in the opera it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhaeuser," and the second will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding," "Voi che sapete."

BULLETIN

PHILADELPHIA PA

FEB 8 - 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been pronounced the most popular conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had, is being made the object of much social attention in Boston, since it has been definitely settled that he will not return to this country another season. One of the most elaborate of the formal functions in his honor was given at the Harvard Union last Monday evening by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University, among those present being President Eliot, Professor Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

POST, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1908

HARVARD HONORS DR. MUCK

Symphony Leader Tendered Banquet in Union Trophy Room

No tribute accorded to the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will live longer in his memory than that to Dr. Karl Muck in the trophy room of the Harvard Union last evening.

At the head table with President Hanfstaengl, of the Deutscher Verein, were seated Dr. Muck, in the seat of honor, President Eliot, Professor Munsterburg, Professor Spaulding and Major Henry Lee Higginson.

Professor Spaulding of the musical department of Harvard, spoke of the advance in the study of orchestration that the last 10 years had seen in the department of which he was a leader.

Professor Munsterburg spoke in his native tongue. He said in part: "Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce estheticism Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Major Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck said:

"Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Wohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.' We can be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part." (Enthusiastic applause.)

President Eliot also paid tribute to Dr. Muck.

HERALD—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Second of Season Draws Large Crowd That Fills Standing Room.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second concert in aid of its pension fund last evening in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. There was a Wagner programme, including the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's scene from "Goetterdaemmerung."

There was a large audience, every seat and all the standing space being filled.

The Symphony orchestra seems to have dropped into a habit—an excellent habit—of giving a Wagner programme every year at one of its concerts for the pension fund, and it is evident, by the size and enthusiasm of the audience that turns out each year for this programme, that the Wagner "cult" has justified itself by a test of time. Perhaps the Wagnerites of some years ago have been thrashed out, and last night's audience was the pure wheat. It was at all events a deeply impressed, sincere and responsive audience.

Mme. Schumann-Heink had given her services, and in doing so had been at notable pains to fulfil a promise made some time ago. Her performance gave delight by the dramatic warmth of her voice and singing, but her success last evening was more than a merely professional success. The personality of the singer is potent, by its wholesome and direct appeal and the gracious attitude toward her hearers. Last evening there was the added element of voluntary service and this was warmly felt by both the audience and the orchestra. The enthusiasm after her two solos was extraordinary; the orchestra arose to express its indebtedness, and the audience recalled her again and again. The singer appeared much moved by the warmth and sincerity of the applause, as well she may have been, for the scene was a moving one to many beside.

Dr. Muck also was repeatedly recalled, [illegible] after the [illegible] performance [illegible] overture [illegible] to [illegible]

JOURNAL, FEBRUARY 10, 1908

SYMPHONY EXCELS ITSELF AT FUND CONCERT

Plays Wagner as Master's Works Never Were Played Here Before. Schumann-Heink Heard at Her Best.

Once or twice in the course of a season the music lover is thrilled to the marrow, lifted into the seventh heaven, delighted almost beyond expression. There were supreme moments of this description at last night's pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, first when the orchestra played the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and later when Mrs. Shumann-Heink, accompanied by the orchestra, sang Waltraute's dramatic account of the return of the War Father to Walhalla, from "The Dusk of the Gods." They represented the acme of the interpretive art. They recalled what President Eliot of Harvard said at the reception given the other night in Dr. Muck's honor—that great is the sway of the interpreter of music, greatest of all the arts.

Dr. Muck is averse to playing Wagner in concerts. So to prove how unreasonable this view is he put on a Wagner program last night and gave an immense audience such pleasure as is seldom derived from Wagner, even by Wagnermaniacs who read all the books about the master and hammer out his preludes on the piano. The Wagner of last night's "Lohengrin" prelude, for instance, and of the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," not to hark back to the first-mentioned numbers, is a musical demigod with whom the mere opera-goer has but a scraping acquaintance.

The orchestra last night sang the "Tannhaeuser" song as no tenor ever heard here has sung it—with a power and beauty nearly unearthly. So, too, division after division of the unsurpassed band achieved effects of action and melody that are not to be met in opera houses—at least, not on this side of the ocean. Nor is it believable that Mrs. Schumann-Heink's glorious voice and equally glorious art could be displayed in circumstances quite as favorable as were those of yesterday. Certainly in the nine years during which Bostonians have welcomed and honored her she has never excelled—if she has ever quite matched—her performance of this Sunday night. She sang Erda's scene from "The Rhinegold" first; then the Waltraute music, and though she sang the former as perhaps no other contralto living today could sing it, she sang the latter even more superlatively well. After this she was recalled about a dozen times.

But the orchestra deservedly shared the honors of the occasion with her. After the "Tannhaeuser" number Dr. Muck bade the men stand up and receive their measure of the great applause. It was a handsome tribute, from conductor as well as audience, to their extraordinary skill and spirit.

The concert began with "The Flying Dutchman" overture and ended with the prelude to "Parsifal."

CHADWICK NIGHT AT REGULAR SYMPHONY

Boston furnished the most interesting feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert in the shape of George W. Chadwick's "Symphony Sketches," played here for the first time. The sketches are entitled "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." The first two were composed in 1895, "A Vagrom Ballard" the following year, and "Hobgoblin" in 1904. As a whole they show Mr. Chadwick at his best.

Except for "Noel," whose melancholy beauty might fit other scenes and seasons than those mentioned in the program, there was hardly any need of description, moods and adventures were so skilfully and happily reflected in the music. It was more than tunes cleverly prepared for orchestra; it was a fine expression of humanity in varying aspects. Dr. Muck and the orchestra entered admirably into the spirit of the little pieces and the effect was delightful. The audience applauded until Mr. Chadwick had twice bowed his acknowledgments.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache, one of the contraltos of the Manhattan Opera Company, who sang airs from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice" and Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah." There was also much applause over these numbers. The concert ended with a fine performance of Goldmark's beautiful "Spring" overture.

This week's program consists altogether of new works—Reger's "Variations on a Theme by J. A. Hiller," Schjeledrups "Two Pieces for Orchestra," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

---

ess .....

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance in this branch of her art will unisne questionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar has sung in concert in Boston with great success.

It was the purpose of the management of the orchestra to [illegible] soloist several times this Winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in opera, it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser," and the second number will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

JOURNAL—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY [illegible], 1908.

HARVARD SOCIETY PAYS TRIBUTE TO RETIRING SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

As a tribute to his work in Boston, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a farewell dinner by the Deutscher Verein Society of Harvard last evening in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. The tribute was essentially a Harvard affair and was attended by seventy-five members and guests. After the dinner the verein held a German "kneipe," to which all members of the university were invited.

The speakers were President Eliot, Dr. Muck, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, Professor Muensterberg and Professor Spaulding. The speakers were introduced by E. F. Hanfstaengl, '09.

Prominent Guests.

Among the guests were: Walter Damrosch of New York, Arthur Foote, the noted composer; Professor Spaulding of the music department of Harvard University, Frederick Connors, the composer; the German Consul Reincke, Owen Wister and Messrs. Gebhard and Ganz, the well known pianists of this city.

Professor Hugo Munsterburg, in his address in German, said: "New England represents Puritan idealism—idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce aetheticism Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Higginson's Tribute.

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck, said: "Four years ago I met Dr. Muck in Berlin playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men. To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more.

"Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Vohl,' but 'Auf Viedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

Finest of Arts.

President Eliot was the last speaker, and he began very modestly. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest of emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck."

HERALD—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1908

KARL MUCK BANQUET GUEST

KARL MUCK GUEST OF HARVARD MEN

Deutscher Verein Gives Dinner in His Honor—Prominent Men Speak.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor last night at a dinner given by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard in the trophy room of the Harvard Union. President Hanfstaengl of the Deutscher Verein presided.

The speakers were President Eliot, Prof. Muensterberg, Maj. Higginson and Prof. Spalding.

Dr. Muck did not speak, but Maj. Higginson responded for him to the tribute paid by President Hanfstaengl as he arose and proposed his health.

Prof. Muensterburg said in part: "New England represents Puritan idealism, idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Maj. Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck said in part: "To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more."

President Eliot was the last speaker.

[138]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

rom ..... N. J.

ddress .....

ate ..... FEB 8 - 1908

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance in this branch of her art will arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar has sung in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the management of the orchestra to have her as soloist several times this winter, but owing to her numerous engagements in the opera it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhaeuser," and the second will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding." "Voi che sapete."

s .....

FEB - 1908

Dr. Karl Muck, who has been pronounced the most popular conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had, is being made the object of much social attention in Boston, since it has been definitely settled that he will not return to this country another season. One of the most elaborate of the formal functions in his honor was given at the Harvard Union last Monday evening by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University, among those present being President Eliot, Professor Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

POST, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1908

HARVARD HONORS DR. MUCK

Symphony Leader Tendered Banquet in Union Trophy Room

No tribute accorded to the retiring director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will live longer in his memory than that to Dr. Karl Muck in the trophy room of the Harvard Union last evening.

At the head table with President Hanfstaengl, of the Deutscher Verein, were seated Dr. Muck, in the seat of honor, President Eliot, Professor Munsterburg, Professor Spaulding and Major Henry Lee Higginson.

Professor Spaulding of the musical department of Harvard, spoke of the advance in the study of orchestration that the last 10 years had seen in the department of which he was a leader.

Professor Munsterburg spoke in his native tongue. He said in part: "Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce estheticism Americans must be gratified by Dr. Muck's services in this respect."

Major Higginson in responding for Dr. Muck said:

"Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Wohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.' We can be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part." (Enthusiastic applause.)

President Eliot also paid tribute to Dr. Muck.

HERALD—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1908.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Second of Season Draws Large Crowd That Fills Standing Room.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second concert in aid of its pension fund last evening in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. There was a Wagner programme, including the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhaeuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and Mme. Schumann-Heink sang Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold" and Waltraute's scene from "Goetterdaemmerung."

There was a large audience, every seat and all the standing space being filled.

The Symphony orchestra seems to have dropped into a habit—an excellent habit—of giving a Wagner programme every year at one of its concerts for the pension fund, and it is evident, by the size and enthusiasm of the audience that turns out each year for this programme, that the Wagner "cult" has justified itself by a test of time. Perhaps the Wagnerites of some years ago have been threshed out, and last night's audience was the pure wheat. It was at all events a deeply impressed, sincere and responsive audience.

Mme. Schumann-Heink had given her services, and in doing so had been at notable pains to fulfil a promise made some time ago. Her performance gave delight by the dramatic warmth of her voice and singing, but her success last evening was more than a merely professional success. The personality of the singer is potent, by its wholesome and direct appeal and the gracious attitude toward her hearers. Last evening there was the added element of voluntary service and this was warmly felt by both the audience and the orchestra. The enthusiasm after her two solos was extraordinary; the orchestra arose to express its indebtedness, and the audience recalled her again and again. The singer appeared much moved by the warmth and sincerity of the applause, as well she may have been, for the scene was a moving one to many beside.

Dr. Muck also was repeatedly recalled, especially after the brilliant performance of the "Tannhauser" overture, and he made the orchestra rise to respond to him.

FAREWELL DINNER TO DR. CARL MUCK

MAJ. HIGGINSON PAYS HIM HIGHEST TRIBUTE

Pres. Eliot Modestly Declares He Knows Nothing of Music, but Praises the Great Musician.

Cambridge, Feb. 8.—The Deutscher Verein of Harvard gave a farewell dinner this evening in the Union building to Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dinner was attended by more than 75 guests of the verein, the greater numbers of whom were Germans, and many of the speakers spoke in their native tongue.

E. F. Hanfstaengl '09, president of the verein, presided and introduced the speakers, among whom were Pres. Eliot, Maj. H. L. Higginson, Prof. Munsterberg and Prof. Spalding of the musical department. Dr. Muck did not speak, on account of a slight cold contracted during his recent western trip with the Symphony, and Maj. Higginson replied for him, saying:

"Four years ago I met Dr. Muck in Berlin, playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men. To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like getting the right road to heaven. The German emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more.

"He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay. It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay.

"Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city. All cry 'Give us Muck.' 'Keep Muck.' That is what they think of him in Vienna, an acknowledged center of music. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Vohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

Pres. Eliot, who was the last speaker, began very modestly. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest or emotions, with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck. Artistic expression of art is no need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. It has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck.

"But the prophet, the seer, the teacher, most desires the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music which go down through the centuries. Great music is great thought. Who else gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward as the great com-

From TRUTH

Address

Date

Dr. Muck, who appeared recently in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives his last concert in Boston on May 1st and on the 2d sails for Germany. He will remain in Berlin until the middle of June, when he goes to Bayreuth, where he will conduct the "Parsifal" performance. The Boston management has brought every influence to bear to induce Berlin to release him from his contract, but to no purpose, Berlin having decided that she needs him as much as Boston does. The Boston Symphony Orchestra have not decided upon his successor as yet, and probably will not before well into the spring, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

TO DR MUCK

Dinner in His Honor at Harvard.

Prof Munsterberg and Maj Higginson Praise Him.

"Brought Aestheticism That Americans Need."

The Deutscher Verein of Harvard last night gave a dinner in honor of Dr Muck, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. The dinner was in the nature of a farewell, as Dr Muck is to leave Boston soon to resume his work at Berlin. The dinner was held in the trophy room of the Harvard union.

Pres Hanfsaengl of the Deutscher Verein presided. The speakers were Pres Eliot, Major Higginson, Prof Munsterberg and Prof Spalding. Major Higginson responded for Dr Muck.

Prof Hugo Munsterberg of the department of psychology at Harvard, who has been honored several times by the German emperor, in his address, in German, said:

"New England represents Puritan idealism, idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, Americans must be gratified by Dr Muck's services in this respect."

Maj Higginson, in responding for Dr Muck, said:

"Four years ago I met Dr Muck in Berlin, playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men.

"To me, 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply.

"This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr Muck has been in every sort of city. All cry, 'Give us Muck!' 'Keep Muck.' That is what they think of him in Vienna, an acknowledged center of music.

"Dr Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe vohl,' but 'Auf wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part." (Enthusiastic applause.)

Pres Eliot was the last speaker, and he began very modestly.

"I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage, that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr Muck.

"Artistic expression of art is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries.

"Great music is great thought. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward as that of the great composers."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date FEB 9- 1908

The solo singer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in that city this week will be Mlle. Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House. She will sing the "Grand Air des Troyens," Berlioz; aria from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer, and from "Orpheus and Eurydice," Gluck.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play probably the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will sing "An jenen Tag," from [illegible] opera "Hans Heiling," and [illegible] "Die Meister[illegible]" last act of "Die Meister

WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 9- 1908

Music Notes.

The fourth Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. More than usual interest is excited by them because after these concerts Dr. Muck will make but one more visit to New York, as he severs his connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play probably the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing two numbers. The first will be the aria "An jenen [illegible]" from Marschner's opera "Hans [illegible]." His second number will be [illegible] address on German art [illegible] act of "Die Meister

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 10 1908

THE NEW YORK SYMPHONY.

A New Suite for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Schelling Played.

The concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall had elements of interest and novelty. The programme began with Schumann's first symphony in B flat that with his other symphonic works is appearing less and less often on concert programmes as the years roll over them. It was heard in a euphonious performance that was not, perhaps, one of the most finished that the orchestra can give; but it was heard with pleasure. The other orchestral piece was Goldmark's "Spring" overture, which came at the end.

Between them came Hr. Henry Bramsen, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who played with admirable art, with finished technique, and fine, though rather small, tone, Tschaikowsky's theme and variations for 'cello and orchestra, and Mr. Ernest Schelling, who played the piano part in his "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. It was the first performance of this work in New York; it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the composer, two weeks ago, and was first given last Autumn by Mr. Mengelberg's orchestra in Amsterdam, also with the composer.

The suite is in four movements. The term "fantastic" is well applied to it; the ideas are original, and the play of fancy through it is unrestrained, exuberant. The first movement, an "allegro marziale," has a first theme of strongly marked and syncopated rhythm somewhat suggestive of a Scottish spirit. The second is a light and breathless scherzo, and after an intermezzo adagio comes a very sportive finale, called by the composer a "Virginia reel." In this there are three themes, the first and last being respectively "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." Mr. Schelling has used these with much skill and much humorous brilliancy. There are few popular tunes that have a more stirring pulse, a more genuine melody than "Dixie," and few that have a more heartfelt sincerity than Stephen C. Forster's song. They are both, in truth, real musical material for a musician who has so much sympathy and so much technical resource as Mr. Schelling. His treatment of them is most interesting from a musical point of view, most effective. The whole suite betrays the workmanship of an accomplished pianist, one who knows all the effects of his instrument. The writing for it is most brilliant; it is constantly, almost uninterruptedly, employed. Yet the orchestra has much more than the function of a mere accompaniment; its part in the whole is organic. Mr. Schelling has sought many new and striking orchestral colors, and has written for the orchestra with much finesse and daring. It would be too much to say that some of these effects are not tentative, experimental; but many are unquestionably successful. They are likewise often difficult, and the score offers many problems for both conductor and players. There are complicated rhythms, as the measure of five beats in the Scherzando, taken at a most rapid pace. The substance of the musical ideas in all the four movements is individual and cast in an unconventional mold. There are a feeling for harmony and a use of harmonic progressions that are of true distinction, and they are modern in conception. It is not profound music, nor is the intention of the composer, as it seems, to be profound. He has sought for a free and untrammeled outlet for an active fancy, and the suite is full of such fancy.

The performance was an excellent one of a difficult score full of pitfalls. Mr. Schelling was thoroughly master of the pianoforte part, and played it with scintillating bravura. Mr. Damrosch achieved with the orchestra a performance that had much of the lightness and variety of color, as well as of the delicacy that it calls for. It pleased the public much.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY. 10 1908

New Suite by Schelling Played.

Ernest Schelling's Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself at the piano, lent particular interest to yesterday afternoon's concert of the New York Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall. This composition recently had its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston; but it was unknown to New York until yesterday, when Damrosch and the composer gave it a hearing.

The work has four movements, an allegro marziale; a scherzando e molto leggiero; an "intermezzo," adagio, and a "Virginia Reel," molto vivace. The themes of the first three movements have an African flavor; those of the last movements, three in number, comprise one that is original with Schelling, and the tunes of "Dixie" and "The Old Folks at Home," which the composer has utilized cleverly and with good taste. Throughout, Schelling's music is pretty and readily assimilated; besides it has the glow of enthusiasm. The harmonic progressions are effective; the instrumentation is neat. Altogether this suite represents pleasant musical fare for a Sunday afternoon audience, if it shows no signs of genius. Schelling played his part of the work admirably, and Damrosch worked hard to keep his men up to time.

The other numbers on the programme were Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat; Tschaikowsky's Theme and Variations for 'cello, with Henry Bramsen, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Springtime." Bramsen played with energy and spirit. His chief faults were impurity of intonation and a sentimentally retarded portamento.

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 9- 1908

Mlle. Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera Company appeared in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her numbers were an air from Berlioz's "[illegible]," an air from "[illegible] Prophet," and an air from Gluck's "Orphée."

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Karl Muck's next visit to New York, a fortnight hence, will be his last trip but one with the Boston Orchestra before he retires to Germany to stay. He sails from New York in May.

From now on a good part of Muck's time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor is held. The first of the formal farewells was given at the Harvard Union last Monday evening.

The Deutscher Verein of Harvard University invited President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg and many leading musicians to tell Muck what they thought of him. The first speaker introduced by President Hanfstaengl was Prof. Mimsterberg, who spoke in German. He said:

New England represents Puritan idealism—an idealism with little æstheticism. The mission of Germany in America is to add what is best there to what is best here, to form traditions for the future, not to create a present for the past. Music is not the black notes on the white page; music is alive, Dr. Muck has made the best in music alive, and though he returns, he will leave with us what he has brought.

Dr. Muck had a cold and could not reply. The man who supports the Boston Orchestra, Major Higginson, spoke for him:

Finding a conductor is like finding the road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay.

It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not "Lebe wohl," but "Auf wiedersehen." We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part.

President Eliot was the last speaker, and the assembly rose to acclaim his candor in the following confession:

I know nothing about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music speaks a universal language. There is no feeling that cannot be delicately or forcibly expressed. Music is versatile; it excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage!

Music is the finest of arts. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect! And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck.

Delight in artistic work is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries.

Great music is great thought. No other thought has such perfect transmission. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

1908

Kommende Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters sind in Carnegie Hall für Donnerstag, den 20. Februar, Abend, und Samstag, den 22. Februar, Nachmittag, angesetzt. Dr. Muck, dessen Urlaub von Berlin aus bekanntlich nicht erneuert wurde, wird außer diesen beiden Konzerten nur mehr zwei weitere in New York dirigiren. Der Solist für das Donnerstag-Konzert ist Herr Fritz Kreisler, der wahrscheinlich Beethoven's Violinkonzert zum Vortrag bringen wird. Im Samstag Nachmittagkonzert wirkt Herr Anton Van Rooy mit, welcher eine Arie aus Marschner's Oper „Hans Heiling" und die Ansprache von Hans Sachs aus dem letzten Akt der „Meistersinger" vortragen wird. — Im nächsten Russischen Symphonie-Konzert am kommenden Donnerstag Abend in Carnegie Hall wirkt Frl. May Mukle als Solistin mit, welche Davidow's Cellokonzert in A-moll zum Vortrag bringen wird. Das Programm umfaßt Balakirew's Tonpoem „Tamar", „Szenen aus der Krim" von Spendiarow und die Ouverture „Ruse d'Amour" von Glazunow. — Das Flonzaley-Quartett veranstaltet seinen nächsten Kammermusikabend in Mendelssohn Hall am 19. Februar, wobei eine neue Sonate von Guiseppe San Martini zum Vortrag gelangt. — Professor Samuel A. Baldwin, der Vorsteher des Musik-Departements des College of the City of New York (Convent Ave. und 139. Str.) veranstaltet auf der der Vollendung entgegengehenden neuen Orgel in der großen Halle der genannten Anstalt eine Serie von Orgelkonzerten, deren erstes am 11. Februar, Nachmittag, stattfindet. Das Programm umfaßt unter Anderem das Vorspiel zu Wagner's „Parsifal", Bach's Präludium und Fuge, Mendelssohn's Sonate No. 1 in F-moll etc. — Der nächste Kammermusik-Abend des Adele Margulies-Trio findet nächsten Dinstag Abend in Mendelssohn Hall statt. — Kommenden Dienstag Nachmittag veranstaltet Frau Harriet [illegible] ein Konzert, wobei nur [illegible] englische [illegible]

FEBRUARY 4, 1908

FAREWELL DINNER TO DR. CARL MUCK

MAJ. HIGGINSON PAYS HIM HIGHEST TRIBUTE

Pres. Eliot Modestly Declares He Knows Nothing of Music, but Praises the Great Musician.

Cambridge, Feb. 3.—The Deutscher Verein of Harvard gave a farewell dinner this evening in the Union building to Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dinner was attended by more than 75 guests of the verein, the greater numbers of whom were Germans, and many of the speakers spoke in their native tongue.

E. F. Hanfstaengl '09, president of the verein, presided and introduced the speakers, among whom were Pres. Eliot, Maj. H. L. Higginson, Prof. Munsterberg and Prof. Spalding of the musical department. Dr. Muck did not speak, on account of a slight cold contracted during his recent western trip with the Symphony, and Maj. Higginson replied for him, saying:

"Four years ago I met Dr. Muck in Berlin, playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men. To me 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like getting the right road to heaven. The German emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more.

"He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay. It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay.

"Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city. All cry 'Give us Muck.' 'Keep Muck.' That is what they think of him in Vienna, an acknowledged center of music. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe Vohl,' but 'Auf Viedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part."

Pres. Eliot, who was the last speaker, began very modestly. "I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest or emotions, with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck. Artistic expression of art is no need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. It has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck.

"But the prophet, the seer, the teacher, most desires the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music which go down through the centuries. Great music is great thought. Who else gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward as the great composers."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Dr. Muck, who appeared recently in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives his last concert in Boston on May 1st and on the 2d sails for Germany. He will remain in Berlin until the middle of June, when he goes to Bayreuth, where he will conduct the "Parsifal" performance. The Boston management has brought every influence to bear to induce Berlin to release him from his contract, but to no purpose, Berlin having decided that she needs him as much as Boston does. The Boston Symphony Orchestra have not decided upon his successor as yet, and probably will not before well into the spring, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 9- 1908

Music Notes.

The fourth Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. More than usual interest is excited by them because after these concerts Dr. Muck will make but one more visit to New York, as he severs his connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play probably the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing two numbers. The first will be the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling." His second number will be Hans Sachs's address on German art from the last act of "Die Meister

FEBRUARY 4, 1908.

HIGH TRIBUTE TO DR MUCK

Dinner in His Honor at Harvard.

Prof Munsterberg and Maj Higginson Praise Him.

"Brought Aestheticism That Americans Need."

The Deutscher Verein of Harvard last night gave a dinner in honor of Dr Muck, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. The dinner was in the nature of a farewell, as Dr Muck is to leave Boston soon to resume his work at Berlin. The dinner was held in the trophy room of the Harvard union.

Pres Hanfsaengl of the Deutscher Verein presided. The speakers were Pres Eliot, Major Higginson, Prof Munsterberg and Prof Spalding. Major Higginson responded for Dr Muck.

Prof Hugo Munsterberg of the department of psychology at Harvard, who has been honored several times by the German emperor, in his address, in German, said:

"New England represents Puritan idealism, idealism with a little aestheticism. It is the object of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, especially with harmony and music. Music in its deepest sense and truth, is truth, and truth must be alive. If it is the purpose of the Germans in this country to introduce aestheticism, Americans must be gratified by Dr Muck's services in this respect."

Maj Higginson, in responding for Dr Muck, said:

"Four years ago I met Dr Muck in Berlin, playing 'The White Lady' before an audience which appreciated good old-fashioned music. Later he conducted 'Lohengrin' before a different class of men.

"To me, 'getting in with' a conductor of an orchestra is like finding the right road to heaven. The German emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply.

"This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr Muck has been in every sort of city. All cry, 'Give us Muck!' 'Keep Muck.' That is what they think of him in Vienna, an acknowledged center of music.

"Dr Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not 'Lebe vohl,' but 'Auf wiedersehn.' We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part." (Enthusiastic applause.)

Pres Eliot was the last speaker, and he began very modestly.

"I know nothing," he said, "about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music has this advantage, that it speaks a universal language, it responds to the whole gamut of human affections. It excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage.

"Music is the finest of arts to me. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect. And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr Muck.

"Artistic expression of art is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries.

"Great music is great thought. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward as that of the great composers."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date FEB 9- 1908

The solo singer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in that city this week will be Mlle. Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House. She will sing the "Grand Air des Troyens," Berlioz; aria from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer, and from "Orpheus and Eurydice," Gluck.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play probably the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will sing "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address from the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 10 1908

THE NEW YORK SYMPHONY.

A New Suite for Piano and Orchestra by Ernest Schelling Played.

The concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall had elements of interest and novelty. The programme began with Schumann's first symphony in B flat that with his other symphonic works is appearing less and less often on concert programmes as the years roll over them. It was heard in a euphonious performance that was not, perhaps, one of the most finished that the orchestra can give; but it was heard with pleasure. The other orchestral piece was Goldmark's "Spring" overture, which came at the end.

Between them came Hr. Menry Bramsen, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who played with admirable art, with finished technique, and fine, though rather small, tone, Tschaikowsky's theme and variations for 'cello and orchestra, and Mr. Ernest Schelling, who played the piano part in his "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. It was the first performance of this work in New York; it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the composer, two weeks ago, and was first given last Autumn by Mr. Mengelberg's orchestra in Amsterdam, also with the composer.

The suite is in four movements. The term "fantastic" is well applied to it; the ideas are original, and the play of fancy through it is unrestrained, exuberant. The first movement, an "allegro marziale," has a first theme of strongly marked and syncopated rhythm somewhat suggestive of a Scottish spirit. The second is a light and breathless scherzo, and after an intermezzo adagio comes a very sportive finale, called by the composer a "Virginial reel." In this there are three themes, the first and last being respectively "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." Mr. Schelling has used these with much skill and much humorous brilliancy. There are few popular tunes that have a more stirring pulse, a more genuine melody than "Dixie," and few that have a more heartfelt sincerity than Stephen C. Forster's song. They are both, in truth, real musical material for a musician who has so much sympathy and so much technical resource as Mr. Schelling. His treatment of them is most interesting from a musical point of view, most effective. The whole suite betrays the workmanship of an accomplished pianist, one who knows all the effects of his instrument. The writing for it is most brilliant; it is constantly, almost uninterruptedly, employed. Yet the orchestra has much more than the function of a mere accompaniment; its part in the whole is organic. Mr. Schelling has sought many new and striking orchestral colors, and has written for the orchestra with much finesse and daring. It would be too much to say that some of these effects are not tentative, experimental; but many are unquestionably successful. They are likewise often difficult, and the score offers many problems for both conductor and players. There are complicated rhythms, as the measure of five beats in the Scherzando, taken at a most rapid pace. The substance of the musical ideas in all the four movements is individual and cast in an unconventional mold. There are a feeling for harmony and a use of harmonic progressions that are of true distinction, and they are modern in conception. It is not profound music, nor is the intention of the composer, as it seems, to be profound. He has sought for a free and untrammeled outlet for an active fancy, and the suite is full of such fancy.

The performance was an excellent one of a difficult score full of pitfalls. Mr. Schelling was thoroughly master of the pianoforte part, and played it with scintillating bravura. Mr. Damrosch achieved with the orchestra a performance that had much of the lightness and variety of color, as well as of the delicacy that it calls for. It pleased the public much.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

New Suite by Schelling Played.

Ernest Schelling's Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself at the piano, lent particular interest to yesterday afternoon's concert of the New York Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall. This composition recently had its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston; but it was unknown to New York until yesterday, when Damrosch and the composer gave it a hearing.

The work has four movements, an allegro marziale; a scherzando e molto leggiero; an "Intermezzo," adagio, and a "Virginia Reel," molto vivace. The themes of the first three movements have an African flavor; those of the last movements, three in number, comprise one that is original with Schelling, and the tunes of "Dixie" and "The Old Folks at Home," which the composer has utilized cleverly and with good taste. Throughout, Schelling's music is pretty and readily assimilated; besides it has the glow of enthusiasm. The harmonic progressions are effective; the instrumentation is neat. Altogether this suite represents pleasant musical fare for a Sunday afternoon audience, if it shows no signs of genius. Schelling played his part of the work admirably and Damrosch worked hard to keep his men up to time.

The other numbers on the programme were Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat; Tschaikowsky's Theme and Variations for 'cello, with Henry Bramsen, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Springtime." Bramsen played with energy and spirit. His chief faults were impurity of intonation and a sentimentally retarded portamento.

m TIMES,

lress New York City.

te FEB 9- 1908

Mlle. Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera Company appeared in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her numbers were an air from Berlioz's "Les Troyens," an air from "The Prophet," and an air from Gluck's "Orphée."

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Karl Muck's next visit to New York, a fortnight hence, will be his last trip but one with the Boston Orchestra before he retires to Germany to stay. He sails from New York in May.

From now on a good part of Muck's time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor is held. The first of the formal farewells was given at the Harvard Union last Monday evening.

The Deutscher Verein of Harvard University invited President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Münsterberg and many leading musicians to tell Muck what they thought of him. The first speaker introduced by President Hanfstaengl was Prof. Münsterberg, who spoke in German. He said:

New England represents Puritan idealism—an idealism with little æstheticism. The mission of Germany in America is to add what is best there to what is best here, to form traditions for the future, not to create a present for the past. Music is not the black notes on the white page; music is alive, Dr. Muck has made the best in music alive, and though he returns, he will leave with us what he has brought.

Dr. Muck had a cold and could not reply. The man who supports the Boston Orchestra, Major Higginson, spoke for him:

Finding a conductor is like finding the road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor has lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him, and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish that he could stay.

It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes just as well as music which delights him. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but also educated us. We would like to be sure that this is not "Lebe wohl," but "Auf wiedersehen." We can only be grateful on our part as he has asked me to say that he is on his part.

President Eliot was the last speaker, and the assembly rose to acclaim his candor in the following confession:

I know nothing about music. I am sorry to say that in this respect my education has been neglected. But music speaks a universal language. There is no feeling that cannot be delicately or forcibly expressed. Music is versatile; it excites the gayest emotions with also the most pathetic. And the martial tones, how stimulating they are to our courage!

Music is the finest of arts. Consider its range of expression. It needs also such adequate skill in the man who expresses the sentiments of the music. What a debt we owe to Germany in this respect! And no one has given us a more admirable expression of his native art than Dr. Muck.

Delight in artistic work is the greatest need of our country. The highest reward to any profession is that which a great composer wins. There is nothing like it in the world. He has a line of great disciples and a line of great interpreters like Dr. Muck. What the prophet, the seer and the teacher most desires, the composer sees in his ideas expressed to music, which go down through the centuries.

Great music is great thought. No other thought has such perfect transmission. Who gets such perfect interpretation of his thoughts as the great composer? On this account I know of no other profession in the world which has so great a reward.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

rom New York City.

ddress

ate 1908

Kommende Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters sind in Carnegie Hall für Donnerstag, den 20. Februar, Abend, und Samstag, den 22. Februar, Nachmittag, angesetzt. Dr. Muck, dessen Urlaub von Berlin aus bekanntlich nicht erneuert wurde, wird außer diesen beiden Konzerten nur mehr zwei weitere in New York dirigiren. Der Solist für das Donnerstag-Konzert ist Herr Fritz Kreisler, der wahrscheinlich Beethoven's Violinkonzert zum Vortrag bringen wird. Im Samstag Nachmittagkonzert wirkt Herr Anton Van Rooy mit, welcher eine Arie aus Marschner's Oper „Hans Heiling" und die Ansprache von Hans Sachs aus dem letzten Akt der „Meistersinger" vortragen wird. — Im nächsten Russischen Symphonie-Konzert am kommenden Donnerstag Abend in Carnegie Hall wirkt Frl. May Muckle als Solistin mit, welche Dame Davidow's Cellokonzert in A-moll zum Vortrag bringen wird. Das Programm umfaßt Balakirew's Tonpoem „Tamar", „Szenen aus der Krim" von Spendiarow und die Ouverture „Russe d'Amour" von Glazunow. — Das Flonzaley-Quartett veranstaltet seinen nächsten Kammermusikabend in Mendelssohn Hall am 19. Februar, wobei eine neue Sonate von Guiseppe San Martini zum Vortrag gelangt. — Professor Samuel A. Baldwin, der Vorsteher des Musik-Departements des College of the City of New York (Convent Ave. und 139. Str.) veranstaltet auf der der Vollendung entgegengehenden neuen Orgel in der großen Halle der genannten Anstalt eine Serie von Orgelkonzerten, deren erstes am 11. Februar, Nachmittag, stattfindet. Das Programm umfaßt unter Anderem das Vorspiel zu Wagner's „Parsifal", Bach's Präludium und Fuge, Mendelssohn's Sonate No. 1 in F-moll etc. — Der nächste Kammermusik-Abend des Abele Margulies-Trio findet nächsten Dinstag Abend in Mendelssohn Hall statt. — Kommenden Dinstag Nachmittag veranstaltet Frau Harriet Foster ein Gesangsrecital, wobei nur moderne amerikanische, englische, französische

W YORK AMERICAN
New York City.
FEB 9- 1908

THE DUSK OF THE OPERA GODS—

More than half of the brief opera season is now over. More than half of the novelties we were promised at the rival opera houses have been produced.

And, to the amazement of the croakers who predicted evil for the Manhattan management, Mr. Hammerstein is still doing well at his opera house, while Mr. Conried has—so far—retained his hold on the Metropolitan.

But, none the less, from signs and omens which have multiplied as the season has gone on, we may perceive that soon—possibly even before this article is printed—changes in the management of the Metropolitan Opera House will have been privately or publicly decided on.

For some weeks past the state of affairs at the older of the two opera houses, and in the neighborhood, has resembled that which as a rule precedes a change of Popes in Rome.

Every one nearly or remotely interested in the choice of the next management has been intriguing and gossiping. Every one with the least hope of replacing Mr. Conried has been mining and countermining.

Vainly has Mr. Conried assured his friends, his foes and the whole world that he has not resigned, that he has not been asked to resign, and that he has no intention of resigning.

Statements of that sort are always issued by the dignitaries at the Vatican in the last days of a pontificate—or of an opera management. They mean nothing.

Whether he objects or not, Mr. Conried can hardly hope or expect to stay much longer in control of the theatre which, for the past five years, he has managed, sometimes ably, sometimes even brilliantly, sometimes—less brilliantly.

Not even his friends (if, unlike most opera managers he has any) would wish him to expose himself to the fret and fume, the excitement and distress of a sixth season.

To the critics and the chroniclers, you may say, it matters little who controls the big Broadway opera house. They have no axes to grind, no operas to sell, and they are not looking out for engagements as tenors, barytones or basses. Why should they worry?

Well, to begin with, they are not worrying. But, for all that, as music lovers, more directly concerned with opera than the average theatregoer, they are interested in the solution of the problem which now agitates the Metropolitan directorates.

Many men have lately been mentioned and discussed as possible managers. Among them have been Mr. Andreas Dippel, the well known tenor; Mr. Charles E. Ellis, the alter ego of Colonel Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Signor Tito Ricordi, head of the big Italian publishing firm; Signor Gatti-Casazza, now director of the Scala; Mr. Gustav Mahler, the eminent conductor; Signor Toscanini, his distinguished Milan confrere; Mr. George H. Wilson, once of the Pittsburg Symphony Society; Mr. Ernest Goerlitz, Mr. Conried's strenuous business manager; M. Carre, director of the Paris Opera Comique; M. Gailhard, who for many years had charge of the Grand Opera House in Paris, and Mr. Henry Russell, manager of the San Carlo Opera Company. Months ago, too, we heard rumors that an effort might be made to bring over Jean de Reszke or Ernst Possart as Mr. Conried's successor. Mr. Hammerstein was once hinted at. So was that distinguished Italian amateur, the Duke di San Martino.

Which, if any, of all these possible—and "impossible"—managers will win the prize?

It would be impolitic, and, indeed, impertinent, for a mere critic or chronicler to express personal preferences. The wealthy gentlemen who own the Metropolitan Opera House, and those also wealthy gentlemen who constitute what is at present called the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company, would, quite naturally, resent having advice offered to them by outsiders as to the man or men who should direct the most important musical institution in America.

They, and not we, poor worms, provide the money for upholding the Metropolitan. Their interest in the solution of the managerial problem is therefore immeasurably greater than ours, or even that of the Metropolitan subscribers.

Yet—without venturing on anything so offensive as advice—shall we not be permitted to make a suggestion or two, not as to who should succeed Mr. Conried, but as to the general considerations which should guide the two all-powerful directorates in choosing his successor?

After all, even if we are not investing our money in opera to any great extent—an occasional dollar or two for an extra seat in the family circle really does not count—we owe a duty to our readers, many of whom are musical enthusiasts, and especially to those of them who are steady and fanatical operagoers.

Besides, as a small part of the great public, we take pride in the Metropolitan. We wish it well. We hope that it may long be prosperous. We hope that it may be spurred on to new efforts by the competition of the Manhattan.

It would be painful to us, as plain opera lovers, to see it entrusted to wrong hands—to find it, perhaps, the prey of vulgar business speculators, or of persons who could not, under oath, explain the difference between a tenor and a tremolo.

Sometimes, to be sure, they mean almost the same thing.

Since the foundation of the Metropolitan Opera House, a quarter of a century ago, business, rather than art, has been the first consideration of its managements.

No one would be unreasonable enough to hint that the Metropolitan should be conducted on unbusinesslike—or anti-business-like—principles.

The gentlemen who own it, and support it, have a right (if they choose to exercise it) to demand protection against loss and a fair profit on their investments.

But to men who are accustomed to play with millions—to win and lose fortunes in one afternoon—the largest profit that could be dreamt of in connection with the Metropolitan must seem trifling, compared with the social dignity and the reputation for enlightened enterprise which attach to them as its directors.

That, I have no doubt, is the view some members of the Conried company take of their position.

I remember well what one director told me a few years ago:

"You surely don't suppose we are in the opera business in order to make money? If we want money, we go to Wall Street."

On another occasion, the same director, one of the youngest and most influential on the board, said to me, on the way down to his office:

"In America we think too little of art. Artists are princes, and should be treated like princes."

Some of them are already, if we take their annual earnings as a criterion.

Henry Abbey, who had the instincts of a gambler, though of an honest gambler, set the pace when in the Autumn of 1892 he opened the New Metropolitan Opera House and paid recklessly to outdo his competitor at the Academy. I question whether Mr. Abbey (heaven rest him!) knew much about music or cared two straws about art. But he knew that unless he treated his artists with princely lavishness they would leave him for Colonel Mapleson.

Mr. Grau, again, while he had a certain respect for art, never pretended that he understood it. That was frank of him, at all events. And it was his frankness that saved him from many of the annoyances which have overtaken his successor.

But, with the passing of the years and the influx of new blood at the Metropolitan, the gentlemen who supply the capital for that house have grown sensitive.

Some of them take an earnest and alert interest in music, sculpture and painting. Many have played, or expect to play, prominent parts in society, politics and educational movements. Few of them would probably be willing to let the future manager or assistant manager (whoever he might be) of the Metropolitan direct the affairs of that opera house solely, or chiefly, for the sake of putting money into his purse—or into theirs.

Europe, as well as America, has its eyes on the Metropolitan. The triumphs of that institution, like its failures and its faults—which, as the cynical Frenchman told us long ago, are worse than crimes—are talked of in the London clubs, on the Paris boulevards and in the Milan coffee houses. In a way, its directors have been changed from merely local factors into personages of international consequence. Noblesse oblige. They owe it to themselves, to their new grandeur and to the public to see that art is not killed by traders in the Temple—their Temple and, in a small way, ours.

What do I mean?

Nothing. Absolutely nothing—except, of course, that the production of new works of art, the engagement of great singers, the creation of an artistic "atmosphere," or "stimmung," the perfecting of the already excellent orchestra, the gradual reforming of costuming blunders, of criminal color schemes and archæological anachronisms, should (and, as we hope humbly, will) be more thought of when Mr. Conried's successor is chosen than dollars and cents, or even "business principles."

Soon—perhaps very soon—the Metropolitan directorates may have to consider more than the selection of a manager for the Metropolitan.

I know that I am treading on very delicate ground. But what I write many think, and, but for a dread of touching on unpleasant themes, would have said loudly before now.

Soon—very soon—the directorates will have to find successors for some of the great artists who for the past ten, twenty or more years have spelt fortune and misfortune at the Metropolitan.

We love them. We respect them. We are grateful to them.

They have been to us as the gods and the goddesses of opera. Their influence has been wide, deep, and good.

But, as we may learn from Wagner, whom they have taught us—some of them—to admire and perhaps to understand, there comes a time in the affairs of gods and goddesses when they, like mortals, must make way for other deities.

Are we not nearing, fast nearing, a "Goetterdaemmerung" in opera?

New composers have arisen. New conductors have been born into the world—great conductors. Is it possible that there are no new singers to interpret the new forms of opera for us?

Voices have never been rare in France and Italy. There are good voices, and possibly great voices, right here in America. Great artists with great voices will at all times be even as black swans—rare birds on earth.

But if diligent search were made for them—not by hired venal hacks, like some of the agents to whom managers of opera houses have so long delegated their functions, but by the managers and their directors themselves, or by persons blessed with the necessary education, intelligence and ears (ears are very important) to guide them in their quest—might not few black swans from time to time be added to the Metropolitan aviary?

Mr. Hammerstein's new singing birds are not all swans. But among them are some artists with great voices. And there are others on their way here. Wait till you hear Dufranne. Possibly, too, unless she has changed since I heard her, you will find something to admire in Mr. Conried's new soprano, Berta Morena. Yet Mr. Grau had made no effort to engage either of those artists.

Something will have to be done, and done quickly, if the singing standard of the Metropolitan Opera House in the future is to be as high as in the past, and, let me add, even in the present.

For it is not a vain, false voice that tells you now:

We are near the Dusk of the great opera Gods and Goddesses.

TOWN & COUN
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 9- 1908

A Patron of Music

Mr. Frederick K. Stearns, who this season has been so active in advancing the interests of music in Detroit, sailed during the fortnight for Egypt and the Holy Land. He is accompanied by Mr. Wayland Stearns, and will be absent for about four months. His wife, Mrs. Stearns, who accompanied him to New York to bid him bon voyage, is now in this city as the guest of her sister, Mrs. Muchmore. The musical event of this season in Detroit was the concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Walter Damrosch, conductor, and this was largely the outcome of the personal efforts and the generosity of Mr. Stearns, who has been much to the fore in the plans for building a spacious and modern music hall in Detroit. For the New York Symphony Concert, Mr. Stearns had as his guests in the audience about 1,000 music-loving people. After the concert, there was a reception for Mr. Damrosch at "Red Gables," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Stearns on Jefferson Avenue in Detroit. While Mrs. Stearns is in New York, her daughter, Mrs. Ralph M. Dyer will preside at a dinner in compliment to Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD TRIB.
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date FEB 11 1908

NOTHING is more wonderful, nor, perhaps, more truly terrible, than a Boston Symphony Orchestra programme. It contains, as a rule, some eighty to ninety closely printed pages. The majority of these pages is devoted to a closely packed commentary upon the four innocent pieces of music that the orchestra is to play at its pair of concerts. It is well written but somewhat ponderous. A Boston criminal was once given a choice between reading a dozen of these programmes or perpetual exile. He turned willingly—indeed, without a moment's hesitation—toward the frontier.

I met the author of these tomes once. 'Twas Philip Hale. I wished to discuss music with him. He preferred, however, to hear of Marie Dressler. I understand now why. His mind had been crushed, overwhelmed with the onerous duties of preparing these programmes. One would imagine that inasmuch as our colleague, H. E. Krehbiee, the Edmund Burke of musical criticism, can analyze a Philharmonic programme in four pages, that the Bostonian could do the same. Not so Philip. Here are some quotations from him: "Noel per aphæresim cænunt Galli pro Emmanuel."

That is a note on a Chadwick symphony. I had imagined that a Chadwick symphony was sufficiently awful without such annotation. Then Philip Hale branches off into derivation of words, orthoepy, folklore, the dramatist Heywood and Kotzi of Kiloshi. When he gets to the fragrant and delightful subject of Mlle. Jeanne Gerville-Reache he writes 500 words of biography of her teacher, printed in old style agate.

Later, in the same musical dictionary style, we have references to sans culottides, Richard Grant White, the Princess Sayn Wittgenstein, August Anne Page; the Christy Minstrels, "One Ten Dollars to O'Grady," Patrick J. O. Hoolahan, Chief Justice Beatty Kingston and the great King [illegible]. Ingredient, but it is not music.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date FEB 8- 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. Dr. Muck will make but once more visit to New York, as he severs his connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address from the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date FEB 9- 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. More interest than usual is aroused by the concerts, because they will mark Dr. Muck's next to last visit in New York. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who probably will play the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, baritone of the Metropolitan opera company, who will sing the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Helling," and Hans Sachs's address from the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

[140]

WORLD,
ess Bklyn Eagle New York City.
FEB 9- 1908

Friday evening, Feb. [illegible] is the [illegible] of the last but one of the [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] will be Fritz Kreisler

W YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.

By Charles Henry Meltzer

THE DUSK OF THE OPERA GODS

MORE than half of the brief opera season is now over. More than half of the novelties we were promised at the rival opera houses have been produced.

And, to the amazement of the croakers who predicted evil for the Manhattan management, Mr. Hammerstein is still doing well at his opera house, while Mr. Conried has—so far—retained his hold on the Metropolitan.

But, none the less, from signs and omens which have multiplied as the season has gone on, we may perceive that soon—possibly even before this article is printed—changes in the management of the Metropolitan Opera House will have been privately or publicly decided on.

For some weeks past the state of affairs at the older of the two opera houses, and in the neighborhood, has resembled that which as a rule precedes a change of Popes in Rome.

Every one nearly or remotely interested in the choice of the next management has been intriguing and gossiping. Every one with the least hope of replacing Mr. Conried has been mining and countermining.

Vainly has Mr. Conried assured his friends, his foes and the whole world that he has not resigned, that he has not been asked to resign, and that he has no intention of resigning.

Statements of that sort are always issued by the dignitaries at the Vatican in the last days of a pontificate—or of an opera management. They mean nothing.

Whether he objects or not, Mr. Conried can hardly hope or expect to stay much longer in control of the theatre which, for the past five years, he has managed, sometimes ably, sometimes even brilliantly, sometimes—less brilliantly.

Not even his friends (if, unlike most opera managers he has any) would wish him to expose himself to the fret and fume, the excitement and distress of a sixth season.

To the critics and the chroniclers, you may say, it matters little who controls the big Broadway opera house. They have no axes to grind, no operas to sell, and they are not looking out for engagements as tenors, barytones or basses. Why should they worry?

Well, to begin with, they are not worrying. But, for all that, as music lovers more directly concerned with opera than the average theatregoer, they are interested in the solution of the problem which now agitates the Metropolitan directorates.

Many men have lately been mentioned and discussed as possible managers. Among them have been Mr. Andreas Dippel, the well known tenor; Mr. Charles E. Ellis, the alter ego of Colonel Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Signor Tito Ricordi, head of the big Italian publishing firm; Signor Gatti-Casazza, now director of the Scala; Mr. Gustav Mahler, the eminent conductor; Signor Toscanini, his distinguished Milan confreres; Mr. George H. Wilson, once of the Pittsburg Symphony Society; Mr. Ernest Goerlitz, Mr. Conried's strenuous business manager; M. Carre, director of the Paris Opera Comique; M. Gailhard, who for many years had charge of the Grand Opera House in Paris, and Mr. Henry Russell, manager of the San Carlo Opera Company. Months ago, too, we heard rumors that an effort might be made to bring over Jean de Reszke or Ernst Possart as Mr. Conried's successor. Mr. Hammerstein was once hinted at. So was that distinguished Italian amateur, the Duke di San Martino.

Which, if any, of all these possible—and "impossible"—managers will win the prize?

It would be impolitic, and, indeed, impertinent, for a mere critic or chronicler to express personal preferences. The wealthy gentlemen who own the Metropolitan Opera House, and those also wealthy gentlemen who constitute what is at present called the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company, would, quite naturally, resent having advice offered to them by outsiders as to the man or men who should direct the most important musical institution in America.

They, and not we, poor worms, provide the money for upholding the Metropolitan. Their interest in the solution of the managerial problem is therefore immeasurably greater than ours, or even that of the Metropolitan subscribers.

Yet—without venturing on anything so offensive as advice—shall we not be permitted to make a suggestion or two, not as to who should succeed Mr. Conried, but as to the general considerations which should guide the two all-powerful directorates in choosing his successor?

After all, even if we are not investing our money in opera to any great extent—an occasional dollar or two for an extra seat in the family circle really does not count—we owe a duty to our readers, many of whom are musical enthusiasts, and especially to those of them who are steady and fanatical operagoers.

Besides, as a small part of the great public, we take pride in the Metropolitan. We wish it well. We hope that it may long be prosperous. We hope that it may be spurred on to new efforts by the competition of the Manhattan.

It would be painful to us, as plain opera lovers, to see it entrusted to wrong hands—to find it, perhaps, the prey of vulgar business speculators, or of persons who could not, under oath, explain the difference between a tenor and a tremolo.

Sometimes, to be sure, they mean almost the same thing.

Since the foundation of the Metropolitan Opera House, a quarter of a century ago, business, rather than art, has been the first consideration of its managements.

No one would be unreasonable enough to hint that the Metropolitan should be conducted on unbusinesslike—or anti-business-like—principles.

The gentlemen who own it, and support it, have a right (if they choose to exercise it) to demand protection against loss and a fair profit on their investments.

But to men who are accustomed to play with millions—to win and lose fortunes in one afternoon—the largest profit that could be dreamt of in connection with the Metropolitan must seem trifling, compared with the social dignity and the reputation for enlightened enterprise which attach to them as its directors.

That, I have no doubt, is the view some members of the Conried company take of their position.

I remember well what one director told me a few years ago:

"You surely don't suppose we are in the opera business in order to make money? If we want money we go to Wall Street."

On another occasion, the same director, one of the youngest and most influential on the board, said to me, on the way down to his office:

"In America we think too little of art. Artists are princes, and should be treated like princes."

Some of them are already, if we take their annual earnings as a criterion.

Henry Abbey, who had the instincts of a gambler, though of an honest gambler, set the pace when in the Autumn of 1883 he opened the New Metropolitan Opera House and paid recklessly to outdo his competitor at the Academy. I question whether Mr. Abbey (heaven rest him!) knew much about music or cared two straws about art. But he knew that unless he treated his artists with princely lavishness they would leave him for Colonel Mapleson.

Mr. Grau, again, while he had a certain respect for art, never pretended that he understood it. That was frank of him, at all events. And it was his frankness that saved him from many of the annoyances which have overtaken his successor.

But, with the passing of the years and the influx of new blood at the Metropolitan, the gentlemen who supply the capital for that house have grown sensitive.

Some of them take an earnest and alert interest in music, sculpture and painting. Many have played, or expect to play, prominent parts in society, politics and educational movements. Few of them would probably be willing to let the future manager or assistant manager (whoever he might be) of the Metropolitan direct the affairs of that opera house solely, or chiefly, for the sake of putting money into his purse—or into theirs.

Europe, as well as America, has its eyes on the Metropolitan. The triumphs of that institution, like its failures and its faults—which, as the cynical Frenchman told us long ago, are worse than crimes—are talked of in the London clubs, on the Paris boulevards and in the Milan coffee houses. In a way, its directors have been changed from merely local factors into personages of international consequence. Noblesse oblige. They owe it to themselves, to their new grandeur and to the public to see that art is not killed by traders in the Temple—their Temple and, in a small way, ours.

What do I mean?

Nothing. Absolutely nothing—except, of course, that the production of new works of art, the engagement of great singers, the creation of an artistic "atmosphere," or "stimmung," the perfecting of the already excellent orchestra, the gradual reforming of costuming blunders, of criminal color schemes and archaeological anachronisms, should (and, as we hope humbly, will) be more thought of when Mr. Conried's successor is chosen than dollars and cents, or even "business principles."

Soon—perhaps very soon—the Metropolitan directorates may have to consider more than the selection of a manager for the Metropolitan.

I know that I am treading on very delicate ground. But what I write many think, and, but for a dread of touching on unpleasant themes, would have said loudly before now.

Soon—very soon—the directorates will have to find successors for some of the great artists who for the past ten, twenty or more years have spelt fortune and misfortune at the Metropolitan.

We love them. We respect them. We are grateful to them.

They have been to us as the gods and the goddesses of opera. Their influence has been wide, deep, and good.

But, as we may learn from Wagner, whom they have taught us—some of them—to admire and perhaps to understand, there comes a time in the affairs of gods and goddesses when they, like mortals, must make way for other deities.

Are we not nearing, fast nearing, a "Gotterdaemmerung" in opera?

New composers have arisen. New conductors have been born into the world—great conductors. Is it possible that there are no new singers to interpret the new forms of opera for us?

Voices have never been rare in France and Italy. There are good voices, and possibly great voices, right here in America. Great artists with great voices will at all times be even as black swans—rare birds on earth.

But if diligent search were made for them—not by hired venal hacks, like some of the agents to whom managers of opera houses have so long delegated their functions, but by the managers and their directors themselves, or by persons blessed with the necessary education, intelligence and ears (ears are very important) to guide them in their quest—might not few black swans from time to time be added to the Metropolitan aviary?

Mr. Hammerstein's new singing birds are not all swans. But among them are some artists with great voices. And there are others on their way here. Wait till you hear Dufranne. Possibly, too, unless she has changed since I heard her, you will find something to admire in Mr. Conried's new soprano, Berta Morena. Yet Mr. Grau had made no effort to engage either of those artists.

Something will have to be done, and done quickly, if the singing standard of the Metropolitan Opera House in the future is to be as high as in the past, and, let me add, even in the present.

For it is not a vain, false voice that tells you now:

We are near the Dusk of the great opera Gods and Goddesses.

---

s

A Patron of Music

Mr. Frederick K. Stearns, who this season has been so active in advancing the interests of music in Detroit, sailed during the fortnight for Egypt and the Holy Land. He is accompanied by Mr. Wayland Stearns, and will be absent for about four months. His wife, Mrs. Stearns, who accompanied him to New York to bid him bon voyage, is now in this city as the guest of her sister, Mrs. Much more. The musical event of this season in Detroit was the concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Walter Damrosch, conductor, and this was largely the outcome of the personal efforts and the generosity of Mr. Stearns, who has been much to the fore in the plans for building a spacious and modern music hall in Detroit. For the New York Symphony Concert, Mr. Stearns had as his guests in the audience about 1,000 music-loving people. After the concert, there was a reception for Mr. Damrosch at "Red Gables," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Stearns on Jefferson Avenue in Detroit. While Mrs. Stearns is in New York, her daughter, Mrs. Ralph M. Dyer will preside at a dinner in compliment to Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORLD,
ess New York City.
FEB 9- 1908

Friday evening, Feb. 21, is the date of the last but one of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date
FEB

NOTHING is more wonderful, nor, perhaps, more truly terrible, than a Boston Symphony Orchestra programme. It contains, as a rule, some eighty to ninety closely printed pages. The majority of these pages is devoted to a closely packed commentary upon the four innocent pieces of music that the orchestra is to play at its pair of concerts. It is well written but somewhat ponderous. A Boston criminal was once given a choice between reading a dozen of these programmes or perpetual exile. He turned willingly—indeed, without a moment's hesitation—toward the frontier.

I met the author of these tomes once. 'Twas Philip Hale. I wished to discuss music with him. He preferred, however, to hear of Marie Dressler. I understand now why. His mind had been crushed, overwhelmed with the onerous duties of preparing these programmes. One would imagine that inasmuch as our colleague, H. E. Krehbiee, the Edmund Burke of musical criticism, can analyze a Philharmonic programme in four pages, that the Bostonian could do the same. Not so Philip. Here are some quotations from him: "Noel per aphaeresim canunt Galli pro Emmanuel."

That is a note on a Chadwick symphony. I had imagined that a Chadwick symphony was sufficiently awful without such annotation. Then Philip Hale branches off into derivation of words, orthoepy, folklore, the dramatist Heywood and Kottni of Kibaldi. When he gets to the fragrant and delightful subject of Mlle. Jeanne Gerville-Reache he writes 500 words of biography of her teacher, printed in old style agate.

Later, in the same musical dictionary style, we have references to sans culottides, Richard Grant White, the Princess Sayn Wittgenstein, sweet Anne Page; the Christy Minstrels, "I Owe Ten Dollars to O'Grady," Patrick J. O. Hoolahan, Turgenef, Diderot, Beatty Kingston and the great King Dushianta. 'Tis magnificent, but it is not music.

om EVENING MAIL,
ddress New York City.
ate FEB 8- 1908

* * *

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. Dr. Muck will make but once more visit to New York, as he severs his connection with the orchestra at the end of this season. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address from the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

* * *

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
ate

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. More interest than usual is aroused by the concerts, because they will mark Dr. Muck's next to last visit in New York. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who probably will play the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, baritone of the Metropolitan opera company, who will sing the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address from the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

[140]

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

It is fair to presume that there have been many expressions of regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be conductor of the "Parsifal" performance there. From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as a token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, February 3, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Professor Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

...Ste Ste Cecile" by Faure.

Dr. Muck, the fine and popular conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead that orchestra but twice more in Brooklyn. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth where he will stay until the end of August for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. The gossip is that Nikisch will return to succeed Muck, but that cannot be confirmed.

...ddress ...Standard Union,
...ate ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 9 - 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

...Daily Citizen,
...ss ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date FEB 11 1908

WANTED—NEW ORCHESTRA LEADER.

Boston, Feb. 10.—Manager Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad soon as special emissary for Major Henry L. Higginson in quest of a new conductor for the organization. Emperor William has refused to allow Dr. Carl Muck to spend another season here in charge, in spite of urgent entreaties.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...Union,
Bro... N. Y.
...ss ...FEB 9 - 1908

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as tokens of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Mr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, Feb. 3, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Prof. Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

...Daily Eagle,
...Brooklyn, N. Y.
...ss ...FEB 8 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, February 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to ... to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in ...

...Standard Union
...om ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
...dress ...
...te ...FEB - 8 1908

...Symphony Orchestra will ... Friday even-

CABLE ADDRESS, "MEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...m ...
...ress ...
...e ...FEB 7 - 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

In announcing the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence on New Year's eve the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky was among the works promised, but at the last minute it had to be changed to Brahm's symphony in D major, for Dr. Muck had intended to do the "Pathetic" at the last concert. This last concert will be given next Wednesday evening at 8:15 o'clock, in Infantry hall, and it will also mark the farewell appearance in Providence of the conductor, who for the past two seasons has made so brilliant a record with Boston's great orchestra. One of the greatest of the pianists now before the public will be the soloist, Mr. Rudolf Ganz, who has had quite a number of engagements with the orchestra this year. He will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The other number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

Special attention is again called to the fact that the concert will be on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of on Tuesday night as it usually is.

AT FAREWE L CONCERT

The farewell Providence concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra for this season was attended last evening by one of the largest audiences of music lovers ever gathered in Infantry hall. It was also the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra, and he received a w rm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work bringing a spontaneous ovation.

It seems to be generally agreed that he is the finest conductor the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever had. The regret that he must, at the close of the present season, return to Berlin to keep his engagements is widespread and genuine.

The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, op. 74 ..... Tschaikowsky
Adagio, allegro non troppo.
Allegro con gracia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale: Ad gio lamentoso.

Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte, op. 16 ..... Grieg
Allegro molto moderate.
Adagio.
Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra ..... Chabrier

"Espana," the closing number, made a fine contrast with the symphony, as it is a brilliant and picturesque composition, abounding in life and gayety and so strong in "color" that its title is almost superfluous, and it w s played with remarkable spirit and sympathy.

The soloist was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, who played Grieg's concerto in A-minor in a masterly manner. A clean-cut virile and capable artist is Mr. Ganz, and the impression he made was not to be mistaken. Several hearty recalls were given him.

Among music lovers in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hepe Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughan, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Corliss, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copel nd, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kend ll, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James Field, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Potter, Hon and Mrs. A K. Goodwin, Miss Marg ret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. M ine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin Kern, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P. Williams, Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Gree..., Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. C..., MissBlanche Davis, Mrs. Webster K...ht, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Fran... W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 16. 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

Trio of Novelties at Symphony Concert.

There was nothing antique about the 15th Symphony program, for the three novelties were composed by men who are alive, and if examples of modern music were desired Dr Muck arranged an excellent combination to fill the bill. There were about a dozen variations by the Bavarian Reger on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller; Gerhard Schjelderup of Norway was represented by "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and a caprice on Spanish themes was the work of the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In Reger and the Russian composer were shown the masterly skill in instrumentation achieved by men who understand the development of the present-day orchestra. Reger has taken a simple theme and worked up a dozen variations, and from his ability in this direction doubtless he could have evolved a dozen or more as striking as the first group.

It is wonderful what he has done in the way of combinations, as if the resources of the orchestra were about limitless and he able to manipulate all. The piece is formless, of course, but it is curiously interesting, and the performance certainly gave pleasure to the auditors.

In the pair of mosaics by Schjelderup the "Summer Night" proved to be a charmingly dainty little piece, with a delicate interchange of phrases twixt the solo, violin and horn, beautifully played, developing into a mildly strenuous crescendo. Then again all is peace, "moonlight and rippling waters" up to the pianissimo finale.

The grace and refinement of performance made this little work very effective. The next musical picture was agreeably outlined, but was not as impressive as Wagner's treatment of a similar idea in the second act of "Lohengrin."

The titles and subtitles give a faint clue to the scope of a work which is fairly bedlamatic in parts. There is a "morning" effect composed of a half dozen different incidents ranging from a peaceful dawn to a battle and military music.

Variations that vie with those by Reger, played earlier in the concert, are followed by a third movement that treats the first in a new and more abstruse manner. Then comes a whiff of musical chaos, a kind of gypsy scene, which is followed by the genuine fandango, colossal in instrumentation, inspiring and fairly bewildering in the multiplicity of variations in its instrumental associations, in pairs and groups.

In five parts is the caprice on Spanish themes divided, and the report that it is regarded as an extraordinarily brilliant piece of composition is correct. It is all of that. And probably the stupendous difficulties of the work accounts for its absence from the repertory of most of our orchestras. Dr Muck seemed to thoroughly enjoy his work of conducting, and it was labor for him and his men, and the result justified the experiment of production. The performance was an "event" in the season.

This week the orchestra will make its fourth trip. The 16th program will have Mr. Heinrich Warnke as soloist in a ... [illegible]

JOURNAL-FEBRUARY 17, 1908

DR. MUCK'S TRIBUTE TO HIS ORCHESTRA

Audience Enthusiastic Over Saturday's Program of Novelties, Conductor Joins in Applause.

A program of novelties was offered at the Symphony concert Saturday night. The numbers were Reger's "Variations on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," Schjelderup's "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Reger is a young Bavarian, some of whose admirers consider him the first composer of the day. In these variations he shows himself to be daring, imaginative, enthusiastic, an accomplished juggler of orchestral resources and effects. The work was splendidly performed; in fact, the orchestra was brought up by the applause, and the rare spectacle was seen of the conductor joining with the audience in a tribute to the band's great virtuosity.

Schjelderup's little tone pictures also made a very favorable impression. They are as beautiful, in a descriptive way, as the poetry of Wordsworth.

And in the climax of the second piece there was a suggestion of Kipling's famous line, in which the imperial bard tells of the sun coming up like thunder out of China 'cross the bay. Then the marvelously transporting power of music was shown again in the veteran Russian composer's Spanish dances.

Altogether it was one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season; and the enthusiasm must have pleased Dr. Muck, who has had some doubts about the popularity of novelties.

Still more novelties are announced for this week. Balakireff's symphony in C major and Dohnanyi's concert piece for cello, with Mr. Warnke as soloist, will be played here for the first time. The other number will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture.

...ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
...ess ...PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 12 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening. The programme will comprise Tschaikowsky's ... symphony, Grieg's concerto ... and Chabrier's ... The concert ...

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

It is fair to presume that there have been many expressions of regret that Dr. Muck is to sever his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season, although the news came with little surprise to those who have been acquainted with the situation. Dr. Muck obtained his first leave of absence from Berlin for the season of 1906-1907 only with the greatest difficulty, and not until he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera in Berlin for six years, dating from the autumn of 1907. When it became a question a year ago last December to have this leave of absence extended for another year it required all the influence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could bring to bear to induce the Kaiser to grant the request. Dr. Muck refused absolutely to lift a finger in the cause for, while he was anxious to stay, he justly said that as he had given the Kaiser a promise to stay here but one year he could not in good faith ask for an extension of that time. That the Kaiser finally and after much hesitation did give his consent to Dr. Muck's coming to Boston for a second season was regarded in Berlin as a most unusual concession to American sentiment. During the early part of this season the management of the orchestra hoped that some way might be found to secure Dr. Muck's release from his Berlin contract, but the authorities there would not listen to any proposition to this end, saying that Berlin needed his services quite as much as Boston and could not spare him any longer. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth, where he will stay until the end of August, for he is again to be conductor of the "Parsifal" performance there. From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as a token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, February 8, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Professor Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as tokens of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Mr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, Feb. 3, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Prof. Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, February 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will ... at the Baptist Temple Friday even-

... Le Crucifix" by Faure.

Dr. Muck, the fine and popular conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead that orchestra but twice more in Brooklyn. Dr. Muck will leave America early in May, his last concerts in Boston being on May 1 and 2. With Mrs. Muck he will go to Berlin, where he will stay until the middle of June. Then he goes to Bayreuth where he will stay until the end of August for he is again to be the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances there. The gossip is that Nikisch will return to succeed Muck, but that cannot be confirmed.

...ston,
...ate
FEB 9 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Feb. 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
1908
Date

WANTED—NEW ORCHESTRA LEADER.

Boston, Feb. 10.—Manager Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go abroad soon as special emissary for Major Henry L. Higginson in quest of a new conductor for the organization. Emperor William has refused to allow Dr. Carl Muck to spend another season here in charge, in spite of urgent entreaties.

CABLE ADDRESS, "OMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m ess
s

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, February 21, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Brooklyn, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NEXT WEEK

In announcing the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence on New Year's eve the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky was among the works promised, but at the last minute it had to be changed to Brahm's symphony in D major, for Dr. Muck had intended to do the "Pathetic" at the last concert. This last concert will be given next Wednesday evening at 8:15 o'clock, in Infantry hall, and it will also mark the farewell appearance in Providence of the conductor, who for the past two seasons has made so brilliant a record with Boston's great orchestra. One of the greatest of the pianists now before the public will be the soloist, Mr. Rudolf Ganz, who has had quite a number of engagements with the orchestra this year. He will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The other number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

Special attention is again called to the fact that the concert will be on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of on Tuesday night as it usually is.

NEWS-DEMOCRAT, PROVIDENCE, R. I.
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1908

OVATION GIVEN DR. MUCK AT FAREWE L CONCERT

The farewell Providence concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra for this season was attended last evening by one of the largest audiences of music lovers ever gathered in Infantry hall. It was also the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra, and he received a w rm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work bringing a spontaneous ovation.

It seems to be generally agreed that he is the finest conductor the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever had. The regret that he must, at the close of the present season, return to Berlin to keep his engagements is widespread and genuine.

The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, op. 74 ..... Tschaikowsky
Adagio, allegro non troppo.
Allegro con gracia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale: Ad gio lamentoso.

Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte, op. 16 ..... Grieg
Allegro molto moderate.
Adagio.
Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra..... ..... Chabrier

"Espana," the closing number, made a fine contrast with the symphony, as it is a brilliant and picturesque composition, abounding in life and gayety and so strong in "color" that its title is almost superfluous, and it w s played with remarkable spirit and sympathy.

The soloist was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, who played Grieg's concerto in A-minor in a masterly manner. A clean-cut virile and capable artist is Mr. Ganz, and the impression he made was not to be mistaken. Several hearty recalls were given him.

Among music lovers in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hope Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughan, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Corliss, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copel nd, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kend ll. Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James Field, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Potter, Hon and Mrs. A K. Goodwin, Miss Marg ret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. M ine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin Kern, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P William... Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Gree... Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. C...s, MissBlanche Davis, Mrs. Webster K...ght, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Fran... W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter.

GLOBE—FEBRUARY 16, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

Trio of Novelties at Symphony Concert.

There was nothing antique about the 15th Symphony program, for the three novelties were composed by men who are alive, and if examples of modern music were desired Dr Muck arranged an excellent combination to fill the bill. There were about a dozen variations by the Bavarian Reger on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller; Gerhard Schjelderup of Norway was represented by "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and a caprice on Spanish themes was the work of the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In Reger and the Russian composer were shown the masterly skill in instrumentation achieved by men who understand the development of the present-day orchestra. Reger has taken a simple theme and worked up a dozen variations, and from his ability in this direction doubtless he could have evolved a dozen or more as striking as the first group.

It is wonderful what he has done in the way of combinations, as if the resources of the orchestra were about limitless and he able to manipulate all. The piece is formless, of course, but it is curiously interesting, and the performance certainly gave pleasure to the auditors.

In the pair of mosaics by Schjelderup the "Summer Night" proved to be a charmingly dainty little piece, with a delicate interchange of phrases twixt the solo, violin and horn, beautifully played, developing into a mildly strenuous crescendo. Then again all is peace, "moonlight and rippling waters" up to the pianissimo finale.

The grace and refinement of performance made this little work very effective. The next musical picture was agreeably outlined, but was not as impressive as Wagner's treatment of a similar idea in the second act of "Lohengrin."

The titles and subtitles give a faint clue to the scope of a work which is fairly bedlamatic in parts. There is a "morning" effect composed of a half dozen different incidents ranging from a peaceful dawn to a battle and military music.

Variations that vie with those by Reger, played earlier in the concert, are followed by a third movement that treats the first in a new and more abstruse manner. Then comes a whiff of musical chaos, a kind of gypsy scene, which is followed by the genuine fandango, colossal in instrumentation, inspiring and fairly bewildering in the multiplicity of variations in its instrumental associations, in pairs and groups.

In five parts is the caprice on Spanish themes divided, and the report that it is regarded as an extraordinarily brilliant piece of composition is correct. It is all of that. And probably the stupendous difficulties of the work accounts for its absence from the repertory of most of our orchestras. Dr Muck seemed to thoroughly enjoy his work of conducting, and it was labor for him and his men, and the result justified the experiment of production. The performance was an "event" in the season.

This week the orchestra will make its fourth trip. The 15th program will have Mr. Heinrich Warnke as soloist in a 'cello concert piece by Dohnanyi, first time here. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and, for its first performance here, Balakireff's C-major symphony complete the selections.

JOURNAL-FEBRUARY 17, 1908

DR. MUCK'S TRIBUTE TO HIS ORCHESTRA

Audience Enthusiastic Over Saturday's Program of Novelties, Conductor Joins in Applause.

A program of novelties was offered at the Symphony concert Saturday night. The numbers were Reger's "Variations on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," Schjelderup's "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalaya," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Reger is a young Bavarian, some of whose admirers consider him the first composer of the day. In these variations he shows himself to be daring, imaginative, enthusiastic, an accomplished juggler of orchestral resources and effects. The work was splendidly performed; in fact, the orchestra was brought up by the applause, and the rare spectacle was seen of the conductor joining with the audience in a tribute to the band's great virtuosity.

Schjelderup's little tone pictures also made a very favorable impression. They are as beautiful, in a descriptive way, as the poetry of Wordsworth.

And in the climax of the second piece there was a suggestion of Kipling's famous line, in which the imperial bard tells of the sun coming up like thunder out of China 'cross the bay. Then the marvelously transporting power of music was shown again in the veteran Russian composer's Spanish dances.

Altogether it was one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season; and the enthusiasm must have pleased Dr. Muck, who has had some doubts about the popularity of novelties.

Still more novelties are announced for this week. Balakireff's symphony in C major and Dohnanyi's concert piece for cello, with Mr. Warnke as soloist, will be played here for the first time. The other number will be Schumann's "Manfred" overture.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening. The programme will comprise Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Grieg's concerto for piano in A minor and Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody." The concert will also be the last appearance of Dr. Muck in Providence, for when the orchestra returns next year it will have another conductor, as Dr. Muck is to return to Germany at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in that city. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

[141]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Music New to Boston, with a Set of Variations and a Fugue by Reger to Begin It, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Glorified Fandango to End It, and Two Pieces by the Norwegian, Schjelderup, Between — A Concert of Sharp Contrasts in the Feats of Reger and the Russian

When Weingartner writes his book about the mental processes of composers, conductors, virtuosi and musicians generally, he ought to put a chapter into it on the spur of the south to the imagination of the north. Tschaikovski wrote tone-poems of the Italian Francesca and Paolo and the semi-Italian Romeo and Juliet and amused himself with the making of an "Italian Caprice" and a "Florentine Serenade." Grieg saw Anitra dancing in the glare of the desert. Hugo Wolf, shivering in winter in Vienna, warmed himself with the writing of an Italian song-book and set his two operas in a Spain in which he had never put foot. As report runs, Grenada itself is as unknown to Debussy as Teheran, but he duly conjured his impressions of it by night into tones. And so forth with many other examples of this call of the south to northern composers, and two in particular from the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Gerhard Schjeldenrup is a Norwegian composer who lives and works in Dresden, and one of his two pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck had on his programme was a "tone-picture" of sunrise over the Himalayas. Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Russian composer, and even those fanatic Slavs who call Tschaikovski German acknowledge him as such. And the concert ended with his "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Orchestral sunrises are prone to be orchestral sunrises, whether Mascagni or Richard Strauss makes them or whether the sun mounts over Japanese rice fields like Mascagni's or over the summit of the Himalayas like Schjelderup's. The form and even the key of these pieces is almost a convention—the beginnings in faint tonal gleams and quivers, the orchestra becoming more and more firm and full-voiced, and the sun at last pouring forth its light in the full effulgence of C major. Schjelderup has both followed and varied the conventional pattern. He begins with the inevitable fitful tonal gleams, but with a true and expressive imagination they do suggest the glint of points of light, catching snow or rock. Individual vision is in the imagining of them and individual voice in the expression of them. The sun mounts more conventionally, but still with a persuasive breadth, as of great, empty, warming spaces, in the orchestral voices and then the light bursts in the unexpected tonality of E major—incidental music; it seems, for the theatre, but music that keeps its pictorial quality elsewhere. A similar sensitiveness to atmosphere runs through Schjelderup's other piece played yesterday, "A Summer Night on the Fiord"—tone-picturing rather in the manner of Whistler's nocturnes with the orchestra weaving ehe background of still darkness, while the song of the English horn or of the solo violin makes the long dashes of bright or distant color. And here again imagination and a sense of suggestive tonal quality played in Schjelderup's music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" is anything but conventional, except as all Spanish dance rhythms have become through much repetition to have that quality. But Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Slav, a very full-blooded, ebullient, imaginative Slav, turned loose among them, and a Slav who is a master of imaginative and expressive instrumentation. Here was a new field to conquer and the lust and the passion of conquest, and the lust and the passion of instrumental color that are in Rimsky-Korsakoff have seemingly made the process as intoxicating to the composer as it is to his hearers. Away sweeps the orchestra in a tempestuous "daybreak," as the title runs, of tumultuous rhythms and clamorous orchestral voices. Clearly the composer is in the vein. He has mixed his instrumental palette with the highest and keenest orchestral tints; he has lifted his arm to fling them sharp and glowing on this tonal canvas; and he varies them at every stroke. Nay, his orchestral day must break twice with new modulations and new instrumental tints as the impressionist painters like to paint the same atmosphere about the same object at succeeding moments. Between is a pause for a set of five variations that are sheer orchestral bravura unable to contain itself in its rising rhapsody.

Then to the heart of the matter—five whirling cadenzas, flute over drums, clarinet over cymbals, harp over triangle; a gypsy song of the sharpest and abruptest of rhythms; a hint of the fandango, the mounting zest for it and then the instrumental riot of the dance itself. Not always do the Russian composers dance, as do their own pounding or whirling peasants. All dances are theirs to set the spark to their imaginations and blow the fire that it kindles through their tones. And now this Slav, who feels in instrumental colors and quivers to every rhythm, dances his fandango. It is the palest of words to call the music brilliant. It is poor justice to call it a rhapsody of rhythm and instrumental colors. More nearly it is a delirium of them. And Rimsky-Korsakoff once taught mathematics in a naval school!

The foil seemingly stood at the beginning of the programme in Reger's eleven variations and fugue upon a light theme out of an eighteen century operetta by Hiller; but Reger, as well, is capable of rhapsodies, though they are of a very different sort than Rimsky-Korsakoff's. Reger has his passion for forms and patterns of sound for their own sake; he rhapsodised, not in instrumental coloring, but in counterpoint. The fugue with which he ends the variations is as truly impassioned and rhapsodic sound as the Russian's fandango. It was as intoxicating to make and to hear, and it comes to as stirring climax. In a sense a composer may do what he will in a fugue, above almost any other musical form, is an established thing—a very wall against which the haters of academic method and tradition endlessly butt their angry heads. And lo! Reger has taken that form and written music in it that is alive with passion and fire. Moreover, it is the pure passion and fire of exciting, contending and marching sound tht asks no aid from exotic dance rhythms, sensual tang and glowing atmosphere. Thus, of the two, perhaps Reger's fugue is a finer, fuller and more truly musical achievement than Rimsky-Korsakoff's fandango. Reger, above most other composers of our time, feels the power and the beauty of sound, not for what they may express, but for what they are in themselves. As the variations proved, he can be passionate, playful, contemplative, joyous—what he wills—with them. He comes seemingly to the writing of music with a zest for it and nothing else. He seeks the pleasures and the triumphs of sound with a kind of austerity that is rare and good in these days of tone-poems, tone-pictures and all the other forms of music with a mission. By so much, in spite of every limitation and every dryness, he is nearly unique.

H. T. P.

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will make its usual monthly journey to New York, and the cities to the southward as far as Washington. Miss Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House will assist it in Philadelphia; Mr. Van Rooy of the same theatre at one of the concerts in New York, and Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, at the other, and at the concerts in Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. The programmes comprise music played at recent concerts here—Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Reger's Variations and Strauss's Til Eulenspiegel," and other pieces. There will be, of course, no Symphony Concerts here on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 21 and 22.

The symphony by Balakireff announced for the next pair of Symphony Concerts two weeks hence, will not then be played. Instead, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will repeat the new symphony by Hermann Bischoff, of the younger German composers, that they first played at the beginning of last month, and which was interesting, individual and complex enough to invite a second hearing. Balakireff's symphony, which is new to Boston, will follow at the concerts of March 6 and 7.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 28, in Symphony Hall, sixteenth Symphony Rehearsal, with a repetition of Bischoff's new and notable symphony, first played here last month, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," and a new concert-piece for 'cello by Dohnanyi on the programme and Mr. Warnke for the 'cellist.

Saturday evening, Feb. 29, in Symphony Hall, sixteenth Symphony Concert, with the programme just noted.

Clipping Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 9 - 1908

Providence will be the first of the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to say farewell to Dr. Muck, for his last appearance here will be at the third and last symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. As already has been announced, the management of the Boston Symphony has found it impossible to secure the services of Dr. Muck for another year, greatly as it desired so to do. The Kaiser allowed him to come to America for the first time only after he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera for six years and when he had given his promise that he would stay here but a year.

On account of this promise Dr. Muck could take no part in the negotiations that went on the greater part of last winter to have his leave of absence extended to the season of 1907-08, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that the Kaiser was persuaded to grant this favor. It was hoped that it might be arranged in some way to secure his release from the Berlin contract, and at least to get another extension of his leave of absence for the season of 1908-09, but it was quickly discovered that this was out of the question, so that next year the Orchestra must have a new conductor.

For the last concert here Dr. Muck has arranged a most brilliant and popular programme. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's number 6 in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." This was the great Russian's last gift to the world which he so ornamented, and the symphony had its first performance under his direction not long before he succumbed to the cholera which was raging in St. Petersburg at that time. For this reason the symphony is often called his "Swan Song," and until the appearance of his brother, Modeste Tschaikowsky's, authoritative biography it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky in the symphony embodied the premonition of his death.

This theory has gone the way of many interesting theories, for we know now that Tschaikowsky did not commit suicide, and had no idea that death was so soon to take him away, and the mood of the symphony is simply an expression of the prevailing unhappy despairing side of the composer's nature.

The soloist will be Mr. Ruolf Ganz, the distinguished Swiss pianist, who is generally regarded now as the greatest of the younger generation of men who have made the piano their specialty. He is scholarly and intellectual in his playing, and at the same time is deeply emotional and has a remarkable feeling of instrumental color. He will play the ever beautiful concerto for the piano, by Edvard Grieg.

The final number will be the brilliant Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death deprived France of an unquestionable musical genius. In this work he takes a familiar Spanish dance tune and plays with it in a most beautiful and fascinating manner.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert is on Wednesday night, Feb. [illegible] instead of upon the usual Tuesday.

CORDIAL WELCOME TO REGER'S MUSIC

His Extraordinary Variations Delight Audience at Symphony Hall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Variations and fugue on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller (1770).....Reger
Summer day on the Fiord.....Schjelderup
Sunrise over the Himalaya.....Schjelderup
Spanish caprice.....Rimsky-Korsakoff

All these pieces were performed in Boston for the first time.

Max Reger chose for the theme of his opus 100 a little roguish tune sung by a country girl in Hiller's operetta, "The Harvest Wreath." On this theme he built 11 variations—one of them has nearly 200 measures—and a fugue. This set of variations is his third work for orchestra. His "Sinfonietta" provoked both hisses and applause in German concert halls. The composer was called by some an immortal; by others a madman throwing notes about. His "Serenade," which has been played here, also made enemies. The set of variations, first performed at Cologne Oct. 15 of last year, has been praised to the skies. We find Johannes Reichert of Dresden saying that each variation is a concise symphonic movement; that the variations are great because they are not variations. On the other hand, some say there never were such orchestral variations as these of Reger. There are others who are still noisier in their joy and characterize the work as "epoch making." Thus they indulge themselves in the hazardous pleasure of prophecy.

Is this set of variations a great work? Or does it remind the hearer of Mueller's translation from the Buddhist Gospels?

Hammer, hammer, tinkle, tinkle,
The shake, the shiver and the slumber,
The never-ending beginning,
The beginning that never ends.

Two sections of this work impress at once the average hearer: the second variation, by reason of its charm of mood and in consequence of a euphony that is seldom found in Reger's compositions, a euphony in this instance both harmonic and orchestral; hten there is the fugue, which, built up with extraordinary skill, is colossal in structure, irresitsible in its rhythmic sweep, rich in engrossing material and literally overpowering in the climax. These two sections at once excite interest and compel admiration. For in them is not only unusual technical skill displayed, but there is in the one case a direct emotional appeal, and in the other the hearer recognizes an expression of grandeur.

In the other variations there are emotional moments, but they are incidental, or they seem to be only digressions, as though the commentator of a serious and dry text should enliven a page by a display of fancy in a foot note. There is everywhere an exhibition of astonishing technic, a mastery over all sorts of harmonic complications, and as some one has said, Reger delights to wallow in counterpoint. Some of these exhibitions are dreary as far as any enjoyment outside of appreciation of the mastery is concerned.

There is much that is without aesthetic significance, nor can I agree with those who applaud Reger's use of the orchestra. He is not sensitive in his harmonic schemes; he is not a colorist; he has little sense of finesse; he does not care for nuances, demi-tints; he prefers to be rough and boisterous; and when he condescends to play with an emotion, he plays with it awkwardly. Worst of all, he knows not the value of reserve; he insists on hammering his knowledge into you; not for a moment would he allow you to infer that he is an uncommonly skilful musician. Nor will he spare you though you beg for mercy and show him your watch. Like the narrator in "The Thousand Nights and a Night," he says his allotted say.

The work is very difficult and exhausting, but the performance was a superb one, in its elasticity and virility. Dr. Muck again showed a quality which he has in the highest degree: the ability to interpret a composition as the composer would probably have it interpreted, the ability to comprehend the composer's intentions, and also to infer from the "Milieu" of the composer that which vitalizes in the presentation of his thoughts. The audience received the work with unusual favor and Dr. Muck was more than once recalled.

Gerhard Schjelerup, a Norwegian now nearly 50 years old, studied at Paris and then went to Germany. Since 1896 he has dwelt in Dresden. He has known years of poverty and distress. He is described as a man of liberal education, a gentle, brave and independent soul, who is neglected by his colleagues because he will not ally himself to any musical party. Living in Dresden he remembers the friends of his native land, and he cannot forget them even when he sees in his mind's eye the sun rising over the colossal Himalaya.

The two pieces belong to the better class of pictorial music, which should never be confounded with that which is purely panoramic. Schjelderup gives his hearers credit for imagination. They must assist him, or, at least, step toward him. Whether the "local color" is pronounced, whether the title of the first piece might be applied to an inlet of another northern land, is immaterial. To him who has never seen a Norwegian fiord, the one portrayed by Schjelderup in tones is plausible; it is romantic, it is beautiful.

Whether Schjelderup's sun could not have risen with equal effect over a Norwegian mountain or one of the Alps is again immaterial. The music was written for a Norwegian drama performed in Dresden a few years ago. It may have more significance in the playhouse. As a concert piece it is interesting and effective. The two pieces are free flights of fancy. They are poetic and individual. Here is a Norwegian who does not dilute Grieg. While he is a modern in the use of the orchestra and in his harmonic scheme he is not bizarre or "precieux."

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice was pronounced by no less a man than Tschaikowsky to be "a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" [illegible]

[illegible] work is performed, but the above

[illegible] a marvel of instrumentation. Berlioz preceded [illegible] Korsakoff and orchestral pieces have been worked since Tschaikowsky penned. The caprice is entertaining. There is more of Spain in Chabrier's Rhapsody or in Debussy's piano piece "Evening in Grenada." The performance was brilliant and the daring feats of the composer were rivalled by the orchestra.

POST, FEBRUARY [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest, for it presented four composition new to the public of this city and these compositions were of unusual interest and merit.

Max Reger has been wildly heralded from abroad as the greatest composer of the period, a second Bach, etc. Such acclaim is always sufficient to prejudice unfavorably the thoughtful and discriminative. His serenade for orchestra, op. 95, was coldly received when given in this city last season, and an interesting violin and piano sonata fared but little better when given by Messrs. Marteau and Gollner in the spring of 1906. Was this the man who was to set his stamp upon the time?

The variations and fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller for full orchestra, op. 100, were first given by Frits Steinbach in Cologne last October; they were given their first performance in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Dec. 20, 1907; they were performed in Basle, Switzerland, some three or four weeks ago with marked success.

These variations may be ranked one of the greatest works that have been produced by any contemporaneous composer. It is true that they are thick with technical devices, that they cannot be enjoyed with an idle mind, that at first hearing certain places seemed prolix and overladen with counterpoint. But the measures are rife with fantasy, with large imagination, and at the same time an extraordinary grip of the subject matter.

However intricate the writing may become, the listener rarely loses the thread of the theme, and one could speak endlessly of the masterly workmanship to be found on every page. The subject melody is worked out and metamorphosed through variations that express a whole gamut of thought and feeling. The fugue finale is colossal.

Counterpoint written by a master is not a science, but a glorification of music, and few passages in this creation fail in being direct and strongly impressive in hitting the mark. The composer who can conceive the [illegible] its fine [illegible] the strong fourth, the seventh, the mightily passionate 10th, is one to be reckoned with.

The subject of the fugue is wonderfully rhythmic, of a length and character that would bring many to grief, but this subject is freely wielded by Reger with a richness of conception and structural power that amount here and there to glorious excess. One pair of ears cannot assimilate all this. The final pages of the fugue, which is truly the flower and culmination of a tremendous achievement, are resounding and stupendous to the point of sublimity.

The work was received with great enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is to be heartily thanked, first, for producing it; secondly, for a tremendous virile and incisive performance of remarkable technical excellence.

Two orchestral pieces, by Scheiderup, a Scandinavian now living in Dresden, were next on the programme: "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," the latter being an excerpt from stage music composed for a drama, "Opferfeur," by Karl Gjellerup, which was produced in Dresden in 1908.

The pieces are hardly of permanent value. The "Summer Night on the Fiord" is an agreeable nocturne, but little more. The piece that followed is a long, well-orchestrated crescendo that leads up to a scenic climax—the sunburst. It depends entirely for its effect upon just such a splendid building up as Dr. Muck achieved from a wonderfully pianissimo beginning, and would no doubt be a great deal more convincing as the accompaniment of a scene on the stage, for it is essentially a theatrical inspiration.

Few figures in modern music present a more remarkable personality than Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Slav to the backbone in his predominating instinct for color and rhythm, a philosopher, a scientist, and at one time, we are told, almost a pedant in his devotion to musical mathematics. How many contemporaneous Russians, save he, compose music that is vital, sincere or truly characteristic?

The "Spanish Caprice" is not the least characteristic product of his genius. With a technique for instrumentation that can only be called marvellous, and with a receptive imagination such as only a descendant of the East could possess, he has woven these Spanish tunes into a unit that is a whirlwind of color, of rhythm, of dazzling harmonic gorgeousness. Few men have understood as this Russian the magical souls of instruments; in listening one becomes obsessed and spellbound with their enchantment. A glowing performance brought a brilliant conclusion to the concert.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 9 - 1908

An event to which the music lovers are looking forward eagerly is the appearance here next Friday of Mme. Lillian Norica, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, which has already aroused much interest, notwithstanding the fact that the Boston Symphony concert comes on Wednesday. It is a case of embarrassment of riches for [illegible] have two

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Music New to Boston, with a Set of Variations and a Fugue by Reger to Begin It, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Glorified Fandango to End It, and Two Pieces by the Norwegian, Schjelderup, Between — A Concert of Sharp Contrasts in the Feats of Reger and the Russian

When Weingartner writes his book about the mental processes of composers, conductors, virtuosi and musicians generally, he ought to put a chapter into it on the spur of the south to the imagination of the north. Tschaikovski wrote tone-poems of the Italian Francesca and Paolo and the semi-Italian Romeo and Juliet and amused himself with the making of an "Italian Caprice" and a "Florentine Serenade." Grieg saw Anitra dancing in the glare of the desert. Hugo Wolf, shivering in winter in Vienna, warmed himself with the writing of an Italian song-book and set his two operas in a Spain in which he had never put foot. As report runs, Grenada itself is as unknown to Debussy as Teheran, but he duly conjured his impressions of it by night into tones. And so forth with many other examples of this call of the south to northern composers, and two in particular from the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Gerhard Schjeldenrup is a Norwegian composer who lives and works in Dresden, and one of his two pieces for orchestra that Dr. Muck had on his programme was a "tone-picture" of sunrise over the Himalayas. Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Russian composer, and even those fanatic Slavs who call Tschaikovski German acknowledge him as such. And the concert ended with his "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Orchestral sunrises are prone to be orchestral sunrises, whether Mascagni or Richard Strauss makes them or whether the sun mounts over Japanese rice fields like Mascagni's or over the summit of the Himalayas like Schjelderup's. The form and even the key of these pieces is almost a convention—the beginnings in faint tonal gleams and quivers, the orchestra becoming more and more firm and full-voiced, and the sun at last pouring forth its light in the full effulgence of C major. Schjelderup has both followed and varied the conventional pattern. He begins with the inevitable fitful tonal gleams, but with a true and expressive imagination they do suggest the glint of points of light, catching snow or rock. Individual vision is in the imagining of them and individual voice in the expression of them. The sun mounts more conventionally, but still with a persuasive breadth, as of great, empty, warming spaces, in the orchestral voices and then the light bursts in the unexpected tonality of E major—incidental music, it seems, for the theatre, but music that keeps its pictorial quality elsewhere. A similar sensitiveness to atmosphere runs through Schjelderup's other piece played yesterday. "A Summer Night on the Fiord"—tone-picturing rather in the manner of Whistler's nocturnes with the orchestra weaving ehe background of still darkness, while the song of the English horn or of the solo violin makes the long dashes of bright or distant color. And here again imaginaion and a sense of suggestive tonal quality played in Schjelderup's musci.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" is anything but conventional, except as all Spanish dance rhythms have become through much repetition to have that quality. But Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Slav, a very full-blooded, ebullient, imaginative Slav, turned loose among them, and a Slav who is a master of imaginative and expressive instrumentation. Here was a new field to conquer and the lust and the passion of conquest, and the lust and the passion of instrumental color that are in Rimsky-Korsakoff have seemingly made the process as intoxicating to the composer as it is to his hearers. Away sweeps the orchestra in a tempestuous "daybreak," as the title runs, of tumultuous rhythms and clamorous orchestral voices. Clearly the composer is in the vein. He has mixed his instrumental palette with the highest and keenest orchestral tints: he has lifted his arm to fling them sharp and glowing on this tonal canvas: and he varies them at every stroke. Nay, his orchestral day must break twice with new modulations and new instrumental tints as the impressionist painters like to paint the same atmosphere about the same object at succeeding moments. Between is a pause for a set of five variations that are sheer orchestral bravura unable to contain itself in its rising rhapsody.

Then to the heart of the matter—five whirling cadenzas, flute over drums, clarinet over cymbals, harp over triangle; a gypsy song of the sharpest and abruptest of rhythms; a hint of the fandango, the mounting zest for it and then the instrumental riot of the dance itself. Not always do the Russian composers dance, as do their own pounding or whirling peasants. All dances are theirs to set the spark to their imaginations and blow the fire that it kindles through their tones. And now this Slav, who feels in instrumental colors and quivers to every rhythm, dances his fandango. It is the palest of words to call the music brilliant. It is poor justice to call it a rhapsody of rhythm and instrumental colors. More nearly it is a delirium of them. And Rimsky-Korsakoff once taught mathematics in a naval school!

The foil seemingly stood at the beginning of the programme in Reger's eleven variations and fugue upon a light theme out of an eighteen century operetta by Hiller; but Reger, as well, is capable of rhapsodies, though they are of a very different sort than Rimsky-Korsakoff's. Reger has his passion for forms and patterns of sound for their own sake; he rhapsodizes, not in instrumental coloring, but in counterpoint. The fugue with which he ends the variations is as truly impassioned and rhapsodic sound as the Russian's fandango. It was as intoxicating to make and to hear, and it comes to as stirring climax. In a sense a composer may do what he will in a fandango that ends a "Spanish Caprice." Neither rule nor precedent haste him. A fugue, above almost any other musical form, is an established thing—a very wall against which the haters of academic method and tradition endlessly butt their angry heads. And lo! Reger has taken that form and written music in it that is alive with passion and fire. Moreover, it is the pure passion and fire of exciting, contending and marching sound tht asks no aid from exotic dance rhythms, sensual tang and glowing atmosphere. Thus, of the two, perhaps Reger's fugue is a finer, fuller and more truly musical achievement than Rimsky-Korsakoff's fandango. Reger, above most other composers of our time, feels the power and the beauty of sound, not for what they may express, but for what they are in themselves. As the variations proved, he can be passionate, playful, contemplative, joyous—what he wills—with them. He comes seemingly to the writing of music with a zest for it and nothing else. He seeks the pleasures and the triumphs of sound with a kind of austerity that is rare and good in these days of tone-poems, tone-pictures and all the other forms of music with a mission. By so much, in spite of every limitation and every dryness, he is nearly unique.

H. T. P.

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will make its usual monthly journey to New York, and the cities to the southward as far as Washington. Miss Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House will assist it in Philadelphia; Mr. Van Rooy of the same theatre at one of the concerts in New York, and Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, at the other, and at the concerts in Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. The programmes comprise music played at recent concerts here—Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Reger's Variations and Strauss's Til Eulenspiegel," and other pieces. There will be, of course, no Symphony Concerts here on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 21 and 22.

The symphony by Balakireff announced for the next pair of Symphony Concerts two weeks hence, will not then be played. Instead, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will repeat the new symphony by Hermann Bischoff, of the younger German composers, that they first played at the beginning of last month, and which was interesting, individual and complex enough to invite a second hearing. Balakireff's symphony, which is new to Boston, will follow at the concerts of March 6 and 7.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 28, in Symphony Hall, sixteenth Symphony Rehearsal, with a repetition of Bischoff's new and notable symphony, first played here last month, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," and a new concert-piece for 'cello by Dohnanyi on the programme and Mr. Warnke for the 'cellist.

Saturday evening, Feb. 29, in Symphony Hall, sixteenth Symphony Concert, with the programme just noted.

...Clipping Bureau in the World

FEB 9 - 1908

Providence will be the first of the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to say farewell to Dr. Muck, for his last appearance here will be at the third and last symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. As already has been announced, the management of the Boston Symphony has found it impossible to secure the services of Dr. Muck for another year, greatly as it desired so to do. The Kaiser allowed him to come to America for the first time only after he had signed a new contract with the Royal Opera for six years and when he had given his promise that he would stay here but a year.

On account of this promise Dr. Muck could take no part in the negotiations that went on the greater part of last winter to have his leave of absence extended to the season of 1907-08, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that the Kaiser was persuaded to grant this favor. It was hoped that it might be arranged in some way to secure his release from the Berlin contract, and at least to get another extension of his leave of absence for the season of 1908-09, but it was quickly discovered that this was out of the question, so that next year the Orchestra must have a new conductor.

For the last concert here Dr. Muck has arranged a most brilliant and popular programme. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's number 6 in B minor, best known as the "Pathetic." This was the great Russian's last gift to the world which he so ornamented, and the symphony had its first performance under his direction not long before he succumbed to the cholera which was raging in St. Petersburg at that time. For this reason the symphony is often called his "Swan Song," and until the appearance of his brother, Modeste Tschaikowsky's, authoritative biography it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky in the symphony embodied the premonition of his death.

This theory has gone the way of many interesting theories, for we know now that Tschaikowsky did not commit suicide, and had no idea that death was so soon to take him away, and the mood of the symphony is simply an expression of the prevailing unhappy despairing side of the composer's nature.

The soloist will be Mr. Ruolf Ganz, the distinguished Swiss pianist, who is generally regarded now as the greatest of the younger generation of men who have made the piano their specialty. He is scholarly and intellectual in his playing, and at the same time is deeply emotional and has a remarkable feeling of instrumental color. He will play the ever beautiful concerto for the piano by Edvard Grieg.

The final number will be the brilliant Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death deprived France of an unquestionable musical genius. In this work he takes a familiar Spanish dance tune and plays with it in a most beautiful and fascinating manner.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert is on Wednesday night, Feb. ... instead of upon the usual Tuesday ...

142

CORDIAL WELCOME TO REGER'S MUSIC

His Extraordinary Variations Delight Audience at Symphony Hall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Variations and fugue on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller (1770).....Reger
Summer day on the Fiord.....Schjelderup
Sunrise over the Himalaya.....Schjelderup
Spanish caprice.....Rimsky-Korsakoff

All these pieces were performed in Boston for the first time.

Max Reger chose for the theme of his opus 100 a little roguish tune sung by a country girl in Hiller's operetta, "The Harvest Wreath." On this theme he built 11 variations—one of them has nearly 200 measures—and a fugue. This set of variations is his third work for orchestra. His "Sinfonietta" provoked both hisses and applause in German concert halls. The composer was called by some an immortal; by others a madman throwing notes about. His "Serenade," which has been played here, also made enemies. The set of variations, first performed at Cologne Oct. 15 of last year, has been praised to the skies. We find Johannes Reichert of Dresden saying that each variation is a concise symphonic movement; that the variations are great because they are not variations. On the other hand, some say there never were such orchestral variations as these of Reger. There are others who are still noisier in their joy and characterize the work as "epoch making." Thus they indulge themselves in the hazardous pleasure of prophecy.

Is this set of variations a great work? Or does it remind the hearer of Mueller's translation from the Buddhist Gospels?

Hammer, hammer, tinkle, tinkle,
The shake, the shiver and the slumber,
The never-ending beginning,
The beginning that never ends.

Two sections of this work impress at once the average hearer: the second variation, by reason of its charm of mood and in consequence of a euphony that is seldom found in Reger's compositions, a euphony in this instance both harmonic and orchestral; hten there is the fugue, which, built up with extraordinary skill, is colossal in structure, irresitsible in its rhythmic sweep, rich in engrossing material and literally overpowering in the climax. These two sections at once excite interest and compel admiration. For in them is not only unusual technical skill displayed, but there is in the one case a direct emotional appeal, and in the other the hearer recognizes an expression of grandeur.

In the other variations there are emotional moments, but they are incidental, or they seem to be only digressions, as though the commentator of a serious and dry text should enliven a page by a display of fancy in a foot note. There is everywhere an exhibition of astonishing technic, a mastery over all sorts of harmonic complications, and as some one has said, Reger delights to wallow in counterpoint. Some of these exhibitions are dreary as far as any enjoyment outside of appreciation of the mastery is concerned.

There is much that is without aesthetic significance, nor can I agree with those who applaud Reger's use of the orchestra. He is not sensitive in his harmonic schemes; he is not a colorist; he has little sense of finesse; he does not care for nuances, demi-tints; he prefers to be rough and boisterous; and when he condescends to play with an emotion, he plays with it awkwardly. Worst of all, he knows not the value of reserve; he insists on hammering his knowledge into you; not for a moment would he allow you to infer that he is an uncommonly skilful musician. Nor will he spare you though you beg for mercy and show him your watch. Like the narrator in "The Thousand Nights and a Night," he says his allotted say.

The work is very difficult and exhausting, but the performance was a superb one, in its elasticity and virility. Dr. Muck again showed a quality which he has in the highest degree: the ability to interpret a composition as the composer would probably have it interpreted, the ability to comprehend the composer's intentions, and also to infer from the "Milieu" of the composer that which vitalizes in the presentation of his thoughts. The audience received the work with unusual favor and Dr. Muck was more than once recalled.

Gerhard Schjelerup, a Norwegian now neaerly 50 years old, studied at Paris and then went to Germany. Since 1896 he has dwelt in Dresden. He has known years of poverty and distress. He is described as a man of liberal education, a gentle, brave and independent soul, who is neglected by his colleagues because he will not ally himself to any musical party. Living in Dresden he remembers the friends of his native land, and he cannot forget them even when he sees in his mind's eye the sun rising over the colossal Himalaya.

The two pieces belong to the better class of pictorial music, which should never be confounded with that which is purely panoramic. Schjelderup gives his hearers credit for imagination. They must assist him, or, at least, step toward him. Whether the "local color" is pronounced, whether the title of the first piece might be applied to an inlet of another northern land, is immaterial. To him who has never seen a Norwegian fiord, the one portrayed by Schjelderup in tones is plausible; it is romantic, it is beautiful.

Whether Schjelderup's sun could not have risen with equal effect over a Norwegian mountain or one of the Alps is again immaterial. The music was written for a Norwegian drama performed in Dresden a few years ago. It may have more significance in the playhouse. As a concert piece it is interesting and effective. The two pieces are free flights of fancy. They are poetic and individual. Here is a Norwegian who does not dilute Grieg. While he is a modern in the use of the orchestra and in his harmonic scheme he is not bizarre or "precieux."

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice was pronounced by no less a man than Tschaikowsky to be "a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation." This was said over 20 years ago. The praise may now seem extravagant, as far as the whole work is concerned, but the more ...ight scene and Gypsy song" is certainly a marvel of instrumentation, though Berlioz preceded Rimsky-Korsakoff and orchestral miracles have been worked since Tschaikowsky praised. The caprice is entertaining, but there is more of Spain in Chabrier's Rhapsody or in Debussy's piano piece "Evening in Grenada." The performance was brilliant and the daring feats of the composer were rivalled by the orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest, for it presented four composition new to the public of this city and these compositions were of unusual interest and merit.

Max Reger has been wildly heralded from abroad as the greatest composer of the period, a second Bach, etc. Such acclaim is always sufficient to prejudice unfavorably the thoughtful and discriminative. His serenade for orchestra, op. 9b, was coldly received when given in this city last season, and an interesting violin and piano sonata fared but little better when given by Messrs. Marteau and Gollner in the spring of 1906. Was this the man who was to set his stamp upon the time?

The variations and fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller for full orchestra, op. 100, were first given by Fritz Steinbach in Cologne last October; they were given their first performance in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Dec. 20, 1907; they were performed in Basle, Switzerland, some three or four weeks ago with marked success.

These variations may be ranked one of the greatest works that have been produced by any contemporaneous composer. It is true that they are thick with technical devices, that they cannot be enjoyed with an idle mind, that at first hearing certain places seemed prolix and overladen with counterpoint. But the measures are rife with fantasy, with large imagination, and at the same time an extraordinary grip of the subject matter.

However intricate the writing may become, the listener rarely loses the thread of the theme, and one could speak endlessly of the masterly workmanship to be found on every page. The subject melody is worked out and metamorphosed through variations that express a whole gamut of thought and feeling. The fugue finale is colossal.

Counterpoint written by a master is not a science, but a glorification of music, and few passages in this creation fail in being direct and strongly impressive in hitting the mark. The composer who can conceive the second ... its fine counterpoint, the strong fourth, the seventh, the mightily passionate 10th, is one to be reckoned with.

The subject of the fugue is wonderfully rhythmic, of a length and character that would bring many to grief, but this subject is freely wielded by Reger with a richness of conception and structural power that amount here and there to glorious excess. One pair of ears cannot assimilate all this. The final pages of the fugue, which is truly the flower and culmination of a tremendous achievement, are resounding and stupendous to the point of sublimity.

The work was received with great enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is to be heartily thanked, first, for producing it; secondly, for a tremendous virile and incisive performance of remarkable technical excellence.

Two orchestral pieces, by Schelderup, a Scandinavian now living in Dresden, were next on the programme: "Summer Night on the Fiord" and "Sunrise Over the Himalayas," the latter being an excerpt from stage music composed for a drama, "Opferteur," by Karl Gjellerup, which was produced in Dresden in 1903.

The pieces are hardly of permanent value. The "Summer Night on the Fiord" is an agreeable nocturne, but little more. The piece that followed is a long, well-orchestrated crescendo that leads up to a scenic climax—the sunburst. It depends entirely for its effect upon just such a splendid building up as Dr. Muck achieved from a wonderfully pianissimo beginning, and would no doubt be a great deal more convincing as the accompaniment of a scene on the stage, for it is essentially a theatrical inspiration.

Few figures in modern music present a more remarkable personality than Rimsky-Korsakoff, a Slav to the backbone in his predominating instinct for color and rhythm, a philosopher, a scientist, and at one time, we are told, almost a pedant in his devotion to musical mathematics. How many contemporaneous Russians, save he, compose music that is vital, sincere or truly characteristic?

The "Spanish Caprice" is not the least characteristic product of his genius. With a technique for instrumentation that can only be called marvellous, and with a receptive imagination such as only a descendant of the East could possess, he has woven these Spanish tunes into a unit that is a whirlwind of color, of rhythm, of dazzling harmonic gorgeousness. Few men have understood as this Russian the magical souls of instruments; in listening one becomes obsessed and spellbound with their enchantment. A glowing performance brought a brilliant conclusion to the concert.

...ipping Bureau in the World

...s ... FEB 9 - 1908

An event to which the music lovers are looking forward eagerly is the appearance here next Friday of Mme. Lillian Nordica, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, which has already aroused much interest, notwithstanding the fact that the Boston Symphony concert comes on Wednesday. It is almost an embarrassment of riches for Providence to have two such concerts in the same week. To add to the pleasure of musical society there are some smaller affairs of interest on the inte...

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY
FEBRUARY 17, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Reger. Variations on a Merry Theme by Hiller, Schjelderup. "Summer night on the Fjord." "Sunrise over the Himalaya." Rimsky-Korsakoff. Capriccio on Spanish Airs.

This programme was entirely orchestral and entirely new. One did not miss a soloist, for the interest was sustained throughout. Reger shone forth in a new light in this concert. If we have heretofore classed him with the modern experimentalists we must now make some reservations: he is a great and learned composer. Whatever we may think of some of his ascetic productions, he has, in the variations on Hiller's theme, proved that he can, when he chooses, stand beside Brahms. The orchestral variations came as a revelation of latent powers that we had not suspected.

They are not variations in the usual sense; they are developments and fantasies of the most advanced character. In variation the composer decorates his house (the theme) in different ways, and re-paints and ornaments it, while keeping the original structure; in development he pulls his edifice to pieces and builds new structures out of the tonal material. One can however, still recognize the bricks, (the phrases and figures,) and enjoy, all the more, the ingenuity of derivation.

Hiller would scarcely have understood what was done with his innocent theme, for the old melody was modernized in a most decisive manner. Usually a set of variations affords an opportunity for a parade of orchestral forces, each group of instruments passing in review by itself. But Reger worked on much broader lines than these and treated each variation as if it had been a symphonic movement. We thought Nos. 7, 10 and 11 the best of the set, but all were interesting and remarkable.

But the crowning glory of the work came with the final fugue. This was the finest exhibition of modern counterpoint since Brahms wrote his German Requiem. It is the best modern orchestral fugue that we have yet heard. The surprise began with the first entrance of the subject.

Fugal subjects are hampered by so many restrictions that it is almost impossible to invent a new subject that is practicable. Borrowing of a fugal subject is as admissible as one clergyman taking the text of another for his sermon, and the subject is, in fact, merely a musical text. Handel uses the subject of Bach's fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 20) in his "And with His stripes are we healed", and Mozart uses the same as his first subject in his double fugue "Kyrie Eleison" in his Requiem. Mozart uses the subject of the Bach fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 7) in the fugal exposition of his "Magic Flute" overture, chief theme, and many other instances of borrowing fugal themes might be cited.

But Reger has managed to bring forth a fugal subject that is new. It is long but very clear and striking, and the strong accent of its opening phrase serves as easy identification through all the intricacies that follow. After a magnificent exposition there comes, not the usual modern desertion of the fugal form, but a clear and wonderful set of strettos, one after the other, in a manner that Bach himself would not have been ashamed of. A countersubject is worked up with the subject in a strict manner. Finally there comes an overwhelming Coda in which the trombones have passages that test the lungs of the players to the verge of bursting.

And the performance! It was another of Dr. Muck's triumphs, only to be compared with what he achieved some time ago with Brahms' first symphony. It again proved our conductor an absolute genius in his field.

Orchestra and conductor were compelled to bow to the great and long-continued applause, for the public sensed that the work and its interpretation were memorable. We may not always agree with the asceticism and the restless modulations of Reger, but we shall have a different opinion of his musical abilities henceforth.

Schjelderup suffered somewhat by juxtaposition with that overpowering Coda, but his work was in such a totally different school that it ought not to have been in competition with the preceding number. One could scarcely put oneself into the dreamy mood of a Summer evening on a Norwegian Fjord directly after the exciting intellectual flight with Reger. It was a beautiful composition which came in the wrong place. We should like to hear this delicate "Stimmungsbild" after a Mozart symphony or a Mendelssohn overture. We have sailed on the northern fjords and have sensed their wonderful beauty, their dreamy melancholy, and we feel that Schjelderup has caught the spirit of his theme in a manner that Grieg himself could not have excelled. The instrument that best pictures this pensive sadness is the English horn, and this was charmingly used and excellently played in the number. The excellent use of the horns must also be spoken of and commended. The number was heartily applauded and we hope that it may be heard again.

We were not so much in sympathy with the Himalayan picture. It reminded a little of Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" in its working up to a self-evident climax, and, equally of course, it began with a picture of the morning stillness of the "solitary mountain top." One might have expected some very "high passages" in this Himalayan sketch, but we did not find them.

From India Dr. Muck took his personally conducted party to Spain, and allowed them to dance the Fandango. We were scarcely in mood for the brilliant composition which ended the programme. It contained many strong points of orchestration, and, of course, the bold rhythms and syncopations of Spanish dances were in the background. Dr. Muck at times handled the orchestra as if it were a mighty guitar, or a Bandurria, that larger guitar which is the national instrument of Spain.

There were fine obbligato passages for violin, clarinette and harp, and these were effectively performed. Many strong effects were in the work, but as a whole it was a glorification of the dance. We [illegible] so much of this, even on the [illegible] that the school is a trifle [illegible] performed with much [illegible] appreciated, but, [illegible] allowed

Reger at the Symphony Concert

Reger's new set of variations, and most of all the concluding fugue, were heard as intently and applauded as heartily at the Symphony Concert of Saturday as they had been on Friday. Unmistakably they interested and stirred both audiences much more than did his "Serenade" of last spring, and the talk of the corridors ran more eagerly to them than to all the whirling brilliancy of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish dance. True, the sheer vitality and vigor of the fugue, as so much puissant and conquering sound—and the more as Dr. Muck and his men played it—were irresistible, until it was not in flesh and blood to withstand such a sweeping and mounting orchestral flood. True, the reflective and moody charm of one or two of the variations and the sharp piquancy of one or two others were immediately and pleasantly beguiling, so that, Reger or no Reger, they would have pleased their hearers. Yet, with due allowance for all this, it is easy to believe that behind the interest and applause, especially on Saturday night, was quick and intelligent recognition of the composer's peculiar temperament and talent which almost set him at variance with his time. Music with a mission outside itself is the fashion of the hour. It may impart anything from Nietzsche's philosophy as Strauss reads it, to the glint of the sea as it shimmers before Debussy's eyes, or even to young Mr. Boehe's memories of his winter holiday at Taormina. But carry something outside itself, it must.

Reger, on the other hand, is all for music for its own sake. He seeks the emotions of his hearers by the beauty, the power, the piquancy, the fantasies, the contrasts, or any other intrinsic trait of ordered and imaginative sound. He kindles their interest by the line, the curve, the whole design of his tonal patterns as well by the fashion with which he shades and colors and decorates their contours. He is content to weave patterns and tapestries in tones, but at his best he also weaves them with an imagination and feeling, an eagerness for beauty, a zest for power, a fervor of invention and execution little less than that which fire the makers of tone-poems, tone-pictures, and tone-dramas. He sets sound singing for itself, battling with itself, playing with itself, and bids his hearers to the song, the contest, or the sport. The thought, the passion, the pleasure in the writing of music for its own sake suffice him. He would have the answering thought, emotion and delight of his hearers suffice them.

Reger has shortcomings, being young, queer, very self-sufficient, very scornful of his musical time and its ways. He can be dry with an insistent and aggressive dryness; he can write music that is now coarse and now acid to the ear; he can spin passages as though a contrapuntal loom were clicking, clicking, clicking in his own head and in his hearers' ears; and as yet he lacks sensitiveness and quick resource with orchestral timbres. He loves a kind of angry perversity of harmony or dissonance as though he were snapping and sneering at the expected. Writing endlessly, he inevitably writes much that is more fluent than significant, more facile than inventive. He even seems to set himself problems and puzzles, and then expect his hearers to watch his efforts and solutions with a joy like to his own. Yet when these and twenty other reserves have been made, he remains the apostle of music for its own sake, of the pleasures, intellectual and sensuous, of sound in the making and in the hearing, crying in a wilderness of "programme" pieces. And at its best and fullest, as in the fugue of the variations and in some of the bright or the deep song of the "Serenade," his listeners answer the cry—freshly and gladly.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

Mr. Converse's orchestral suite, "Jeanne d'Arc," which he arranged from his incidental music to Percy MacKaye's like-named drama, will be played at the Symphony Concerts next month. Mr. Goodrich's orchestra undertook the four pieces last winter, and now Dr. Muck has put them on his programmes. In March, moreover, he will repeat them in New York.

...MEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YOR
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...n ...
...ress ...
...e ... FEB 10 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE WEDNESDAY

The last weeks of Dr. Muck's stay in America will doubtless be remembered by him as weeks into which he was compelled to crowd more social duties than, to say the least had been his habit in the past, for Dr. Muck does not go in heavily for society. But so popular have he and Mrs. Muck become not merely in Boston, but wherever else they have visited, a large number of functions in their honor have been announced. The first one of importance was that given on Monday evening, Feb. 3, at Harvard Union, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard university, where Dr. Muck was the guest of the evening. His last appearance in Providence will be at the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall at 8:15 o'clock on next Wednesday evening, Feb.

Tickets for this concert are now selling at Steinert's.

[143]

Saturday Night
DETROIT, MICH.
FEB 8- 1908

The Boston Symphony

SOMEONE in listening to music by Mozart and Haydn, at one time, remarked: "Ah! music was young in those days."

One felt almost like repeating the same remark while listening to Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony as it was played by the Boston orchestra. One does not even need to compare it with the works of the ultra-modern composers, in order to feel this, but only with some of the other symphonies of the Master of Bonn.

Take, for example, the sublime earnestness of the fifth symphony which preceded it, and the subtle suggestiveness of the seventh which immediately followed it; were it not for the absolute integrity of musical style in the three, it would be difficult to believe that Beethoven wrote the Pastoral, so different is the world presented therein. That Beethoven wrote it with a purpose is evident, a purpose that considered Nature in her simplest aspects. Not only does the music seem young, but if one compares it with some of the nature pieces of more modern times, Beethoven's manner of looking at nature was decidedly young also. The music is still delightful, but because of the simplicity of its charm. Judged, however, from the standpoint of musical composition and profound emotional content, it will be one of the first of Beethoven's works to pass into oblivion. The repertoire of available concert music is increasing so enormously that a gradual process of sifting will become absolutely essential. It will be impossible to include all the works of any one composer. The performance of the Boston orchestra was flawless, no small feat in such a composition, for it often compels more skill to achieve perfection in a simple work than in one that calls upon the complete resources at one's command.

If a work like Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony calls for a certain amount of reserve in its performance, the more modern Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel of Richard Strauss demands none. Strauss says that he intended it as a musical joke, and a wonderfully clever and brilliant one it is, although many persist in taking it seriously. As music, pure and simple, it is brilliantly fascinating, an interest that is only heightened by the touch of spice given in the grotesque story that lies back of it. It made an instant appeal to the audience, as was made amply manifest by the rapt attention and spontaneous applause.

The concert as a whole gave the greatest pleasure to the large audience present. It is with profound regret that this concert must be considered as a farewell to Dr. Muck, for both as a musician and a man he has shown himself to be rarely endowed. The few who met him socially cannot sufficiently express their admiration, and the many who heard the two concerts given in Detroit the past two seasons are equally enthusiastic as to his ability with the orchestra. The kaiser's leave of absence cannot be extended for a longer period, and hence he must return to Germany at the end of this season.

...
FEB 1 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last weeks of Dr. Muck's stay in America will doubtless be remembered by him as weeks into which he was compelled to crowd more social duties than, to say the least, had been his habit in the past, for Dr. Muck does not go in heavily for society. But so popular have he and Mrs. Muck become not merely in Boston, but wherever they have visited, a large number of functions in their honor have been announced. The first one of importance was that given on Monday evening, Feb. 3, at Harvard Union by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University, where Dr. Muck was the guest of the evening. His last appearance in Providence will be at the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock on next Wednesday evening, Feb.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 9- 1908

...Last Concert of Series Will be ... Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony concert in ... try Hall on next Wednesday ... promises to be a notable affair in more ways than one. In the first place, it is the last concert of the series, and will give music lovers of this city their final opportunity to hear the orchestra this year. More important even than that is that it will mark Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Providence. As already announced, the management of the orchestra has been unable to secure for Dr. Muck a further leave of absence from his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and the end of this season he must return to Germany to resume his duties there and the Boston Symphony Orchestra must again try to secure a conductor.

The programme for Wednesday's concert is one which should appeal to all classes of music lovers. The symphony is by all odds the most popular and at the same time most beautiful of modern works in that form. It has been called the "Swan Song" of the composer, because it was finished and had its first performance under his direction shortly before his unexpected and untimely death, and until his brother's authoritative biography was published it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky wrote the symphony under the impression that he was soon to die, but his letters and diary prove to the contrary. Dr. Muck played this symphony in Boston last year, and made a veritable sensation by his highly colored and emotional reading of the work.

Mr. Rudolf Ganz, the soloist, should need no introduction in Providence. This young Swiss, who, on account of his many years of residence in this country, has become an exceedingly good American, is unquestionably to-day one of the great men of the piano. There are certain scholarly and intellectual qualities in his playing that rather set him aside from the majority of men who practice his branch of the art, and to these are most happily wedded strong emotional feeling and a remarkable sense for color.

The final number is the Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, one of the most brilliant of the younger Frenchmen, whose untimely death deprived France of a real genius. The rhapsody is one of the most brilliant works in the modern repertory.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert will be on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of on Tuesday night, as it usually is.

...om ...
...dress ...
...te ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In announcing the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence on New Year's eve the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky was among the works promised, but at the last minute it had to be changed to Brahm's symphony in D-Major, for Dr. Muck had intended to do the "Pathetic" at the last concert.

This last concert will be given next Wednesday evening in Infantry Hall, and it will also mark the farewell appearance in Providence of the conductor, who for the past two seasons has made so brilliant a record with Boston's great orchestra. One of the greatest of the pianists now before the public will be the soloist, Mr. Rudolf Ganz, who has had quite a number of engagements with the orchestra this year. He will play Grieg's concerto in A-Minor. The other number will be Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

...
...ress ... FEB 11 1908
...e ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lest patrons of the Boston Symphony should make a mistake and go to Infantry Hall to-night to hear the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is well to repeat again that the concert will be to-morrow, Wednesday evening, this evening, the night on which it naturally would have fallen.

The slight change in schedule was made necessary by some important engagements in Boston, and although from the beginning it has been announced that this concert would take place on Wednesday habit is very strong, and it is to be hoped that no one will take the trouble to go to Infantry Hall this evening, only to find it quite dark.

...MEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in ...
From ...
Address ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Lest patrons of the Boston Symphony should make a mistake and go to Infantry hall tonight to hear the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is well to repeat again that the concert will be tomorrow, Wednesday evening, this evening, the night on which it naturally would have fallen. Its slight change in schedule was made necessary by some important engagements in Boston, and although from the beginning it has been announced that this concert would take place on Wednesday habit is very strong, and it is to be hoped that no one will take the trouble to go to Infantry hall this evening only to find it quite dark.

ADVERTISER, FEBRUARY 17, 1908

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Reger, Variations on a Merry Theme by Hiller, Schjelderup. "Summer night on the Fjord." "Sunrise over the Himalaya."
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Capriccio on Spanish Airs.

This programme was entirely orchestral and entirely new. One did not miss a soloist, for the interest was sustained throughout. Reger shone forth in a new light in this concert. If we have heretofore classed him with the modern experimentalists we must now make some reservations; he is a great and learned composer. Whatever we may think of some of his ascetic productions, he has, in the Variations on Hiller's theme, proved that he can, when he chooses, stand beside Brahms. The orchestral variations came as a revelation of latent powers that we had not suspected.

They are not variations in the usual sense; they are developments and fantasies of the most advanced character. In variation the composer decorates his house (the theme) in different ways, and re-paints and ornaments it, while keeping the original structure; in development he pulls his edifice to pieces and builds new structures out of the tonal material. One can however, still recognize the bricks, (the phrases and figures,) and enjoy, all the more, the ingenuity of derivation.

Hiller would scarcely have understood what was done with his innocent theme, for the old melody was modernized in a most decisive manner. Usually a set of variations affords an opportunity for a parade of orchestral forces, each group of instruments passing in review by itself. But Reger worked on much broader lines than these and treated each variation as if it had been a symphonic movement. We thought Nos. 7, 10 and 11 the best of the set, but all were interesting and remarkable.

But the crowning glory of the work came with the final fugue. This was the finest exhibition of modern counterpoint since Brahms wrote his German Requiem. It is the best modern orchestral fugue that we have yet heard. The surprise began with the first entrance of the subject.

Fugal subjects are hampered by so many restrictions that it is almost impossible to invent a new subject that is practicable. Borrowing of a fugal subject is as admissible as one clergyman taking the text of another for his sermon, and the subject is, in fact, merely a musical text. Handel uses the subject of Bach's fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 20) in his "And with His stripes are we healed", and Mozart uses the same as his first subject in his double fugue "Kyrie Eleison" in his Requiem. Mozart uses the subject of the Bach fugue ("Well-tempered Clavichord" Book II., No. 7) in the fugal exposition of his "Magic Flute" overture, chief theme, and many other instances of borrowing fugal themes might be cited.

But Reger has managed to bring forth a fugal subject that is new. It is long but very clear and striking, and the strong accent of its opening phrase serves as easy identification through all the intricacies that follow. After a magnificent exposition there comes, not the usual modern desertion of the fugal form, but a clear and wonderful set of strettos, one after the other, in a manner that Bach himself would not have been ashamed of. A countersubject is worked up with the subject in a strict manner. Finally there comes an overwhelming Coda in which the trombones have passages that test the lungs of the players to the verge of bursting.

And the performance! It was another of Dr. Muck's triumphs, only to be compared with what he achieved some time ago with Brahms' first symphony. It again proved our conductor an absolute genius in his field.

Orchestra and conductor were compelled to bow to the great and long-continued applause, for the public sensed that the work and its interpretation were memorable. We may not always agree with the asceticism and the restless modulations of Reger, but we shall have a different opinion of his musical abilities henceforth.

Schjelderup suffered somewhat by juxtaposition with that overpowering Coda, but his work was in such a totally different school that it ought not to have been in competition with the preceding number. One could scarcely put oneself into the dreamy mood of a Summer evening on a Norwegian Fjord directly after the exciting intellectual flight with Reger. It was a beautiful composition which came in the wrong place. We should like to hear this delicate "Stimmungsbild" after a Mozart symphony or a Mendelssohn overture. We have sailed on the northern fjords and have sensed their wonderful beauty, their dreamy melancholy, and we feel that Schjelderup has caught the spirit of his theme in a manner that Grieg himself could not have excelled. The instrument that best pictures this pensive sadness is the English horn, and this was charmingly used and excellently played in the number. The excellent use of the horns must also be spoken of and commended. The number was heartily applauded and we hope that it may be heard again.

We were not so much in sympathy with the Himalayan picture. It reminded a little of Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" in its working up to a self-evident climax, and, equally of course, it began with a picture of the morning stillness of the "solitary mountain top." One might have expected some very "high passages" in this Himalayan sketch, but we did not find them.

From India Dr. Muck took his personally conducted party to Spain, and allowed them to dance the Fandango. We were scarcely in mood for the brilliant composition which ended the programme. It contained many strong points of orchestration, and, of course, the bold rhythms and syncopations of Spanish dances were in the foreground. Dr. Muck at times handled the orchestra as if it were a mighty guitar, or a Bandurria, that larger guitar which is the national instrument of Spain.

There were fine obbligato passages for solo violin, clarinette and harp, and these were effectively performed. Many strong contrasts were in the work, but as a whole it was a glorification of the dance. We have had so much of this, even on the light opera stage, that the school is a trifle threadbare. It was performed with much spirit and was evidently appreciated, but, [illegible] concert Max Reger overshadowed

Louis C. Elson.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1908

Reger at the Symphony Concert

Reger's new set of variations, and most of all the concluding fugue, were heard as intently and applauded as heartily at the Symphony Concert of Saturday as they had been on Friday. Unmistakably they interested and stirred both audiences much more than did his "Serenade" of last spring, and the talk of the corridors ran more eagerly to them than to all the whirling brilliancy of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish dance. True, the sheer vitality and vigor of the fugue, as so much puissant and conquering sound—and the more as Dr. Muck and his men played it—were irresistible, until it was not in flesh and blood to withstand such a sweeping and mounting orchestral flood. True, the reflective and moody charm of one or two of the variations and the sharp piquancy of one or two others were immediately and pleasantly beguiling, so that, Reger or no Reger, they would have pleased their hearers. Yet, with due allowance for all this, it is easy to believe that behind the interest and applause, especially on Saturday night, was quick and intelligent recognition of the composer's peculiar temperament and talent which almost set him at variance with his time. Music with a mission outside itself is the fashion of the hour. It may impart anything from Nietzsche's philosophy as Strauss reads it, to the glint of the sea as it shimmers before Debussy's eyes, or even to young Mr. Boehe's memories of his winter holiday at Taormina. But carry something outside itself, it must.

Reger, on the other hand, is all for music for its own sake. He seeks the emotions of his hearers by the beauty, the power, the piquancy, the fantasies, the contrasts, or any other intrinsic trait of ordered and imaginative sound. He kindles their interest by the line, the curve, the whole design of his tonal patterns as well by the fashion with which he shades and colors and decorates their contours. He is content to weave patterns and tapestries in tones, but at his best he also weaves them with an imagination and feeling, an eagerness for beauty, a zest for power, a fervor of invention and execution little less than that which fire the makers of tone-poems, tone-pictures, and tone-dramas. He sets sound singing for itself, battling with itself, playing with itself, and bids his hearers to the song, the contest, or the sport. The thought, the passion, the pleasure in the writing of music for its own sake suffice him. He would have the answering thought, emotion and delight of his hearers suffice them.

Reger has shortcomings, being young, queer, very self-sufficient, very scornful of his musical time and its ways. He can be dry with an insistent and aggressive dryness; he can write music that is now coarse and now acid to the ear; he can spin passages as though a contrapuntal loom were clicking, clicking, clicking in his own head and in his hearers' ears; and as yet he lacks sensitiveness and quick resource with orchestral timbres. He loves a kind of angry perversity of harmony or dissonance as though he were snapping and sneering at the expected. Writing endlessly, he inevitably writes much that is more fluent than significant, more facile than inventive. He even seems to set himself problems and puzzles, and then expect his hearers to watch his efforts and solutions with a joy like to his own. Yet when these and twenty other reserves have been made, he remains the apostle of music for its own sake, of the pleasures, intellectual and sensuous, of sound in the making and in the hearing, crying in a wilderness of "programme" pieces. And at its best and fullest, as in the fugue of the variations and in some of the bright or the deep song of the "Serenade," his listeners answer the cry—freshly and gladly.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

Mr. Converse's orchestral suite, "Jeanne d'Arc," which he arranged from his incidental music to Percy MacKaye's like-named drama, will be played at the Symphony Concerts next month. Mr. Goodrich's orchestra undertook the four pieces last winter, and now Dr. Muck has put them on his programmes. In March, moreover, he will repeat them in New York.

HEIKE'' NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

e .....

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE WEDNESDAY

The last weeks of Dr. Muck's stay in America will doubtless be remembered by him as weeks into which he was compelled to crowd more social duties than, to say the least had been his habit in the past, for Dr. Muck does not go in heavily for society. But so popular have he and Mrs. Muck become, not merely in Boston, but wherever else they have visited, a large number of functions in their honor have been announced. The first one of importance was that given on Monday evening, Feb. 3, at Harvard Union, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard university, where Dr. Muck was the guest of the evening. His last appearance in Providence will be at the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry hall at 8:15 o'clock on next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. Tickets for this concert are now selling at Steinert's.

[143]

The Boston Symphony

SOMEONE in listening to music by Mozart and Haydn, at one time, remarked: "Ah! music was young in those days."

One felt almost like repeating the same remark while listening to Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony as it was played by the Boston orchestra. One does not even need to compare it with the works of the ultra-modern composers, in order to feel this, but only with some of the other symphonies of the Master of Bonn.

Take, for example, the sublime earnestness of the fifth symphony which preceded it, and the subtle suggestiveness of the seventh which immediately followed it; were it not for the absolute integrity of musical style in the three, it would be difficult to believe that Beethoven wrote the Pastoral, so different is the world presented therein. That Beethoven wrote it with a purpose is evident, a purpose that considered Nature in her simplest aspects. Not only does the music seem young, but if one compares it with some of the nature pieces of more modern times, Beethoven's manner of looking at nature was decidedly young also. The music is still delightful, but because of the simplicity of its charm. Judged, however, from the standpoint of musical composition and profound emotional content, it will be one of the first of Beethoven's works to pass into oblivion. The repertoire of available concert music is increasing so enormously that a gradual process of sifting will become absolutely essential. It will be impossible to include all the works of any one composer. The performance of the Boston orchestra was flawless, no small feat in such a composition, for it often compels more skill to achieve perfection in a simple work than in one that calls upon the complete resources at one's command.

If a work like Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony calls for a certain amount of reserve in its performance, the more modern Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel of Richard Strauss demands none. Strauss says that he intended it as a musical joke, and a wonderfully clever and brilliant one it is, although many persist in taking it seriously. As music, pure and simple, it is brilliantly fascinating, an interest that is only heightened by the touch of spice given in the grotesque story that lies back of it. It made an instant appeal to the audience, as was made amply manifest by the rapt attention and spontaneous applause.

The concert as a whole gave the greatest pleasure to the large audience present. It is with profound regret that this concert must be considered as a farewell to Dr. Muck, for both as a musician and a man he has shown himself to be rarely endowed. The few who met him socially cannot sufficiently express their admiration, and the many who heard the two concerts given in Detroit the past two seasons are equally enthusiastic as to his ability with the orchestra. The kaiser's leave of absence cannot be extended for a longer period, and hence he must return to Germany at the end of this season.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last weeks of Dr. Muck's stay in America will doubtless be remembered by him as weeks into which he was compelled to crowd more social duties than, to say the least, had been his habit in the past, for Dr. Muck does not go in heavily for society. But so popular have he and Mrs. Muck become not merely in Boston, but wherever they have visited, a large number of functions in their honor have been announced. The first one of importance was that given on Monday evening, Feb. 3, at Harvard Union by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University, where Dr. Muck was the guest of the evening. His last appearance in Providence will be at the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on next Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. Tickets for this concert are now [illegible] at Steinert's.

Morning Night

FEB 3 - 1908

om .....

dress .....

te .....

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Series Will be Given Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on next Wednesday evening promises to be a notable affair in more ways than one. In the first place, it is the last concert of the series, and will give music lovers of this city their final opportunity to hear the orchestra this year. More important even than that is that it will mark Dr. Muck's farewell appearance in Providence. As already announced, the management of the orchestra has been unable to secure for Dr. Muck a further leave of absence from his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and at the end of this season he must return to Germany to resume his duties there and the Boston Symphony Orchestra must again try to secure a conductor.

The programme for Wednesday's concert is one which should appeal to all classes of music lovers. The symphony is by all odds the most popular and at the same time most beautiful of modern works in that form. It has been called the "Swan Song" of the composer, because it was finished and had its first performance under his direction shortly before his unexpected and untimely death, and until his brother's authoritative biography was published it was generally believed that Tschaikowsky wrote the symphony under the impression that he was soon to die, but his letters and diary prove to the contrary. Dr. Muck played this symphony in Boston last year, and made a veritable sensation by his highly colored and emotional reading of the work.

Mr. Rudolf Ganz, the soloist, should need no introduction in Providence. This young Swiss, who, on account of his many years of residence in this country, has become an exceedingly good American, is unquestionably to-day one of the great men of the piano. There are certain scholarly and intellectual qualities in his playing that rather set him aside from the majority of men who practice his branch of the art, and to these are most happily wedded strong emotional feeling and a remarkable sense for color.

The final number is the Spanish Rhapsody by Emmanuel Chabrier, one of the most brilliant of the younger Frenchmen, whose untimely death deprived France of a real genius. The rhapsody is one of the most brilliant works in the modern repertory.

Attention is again called to the fact that the concert will be on Wednesday night, Feb. 12, instead of on Tuesday night, as it usually is.

om .....

dress .....

te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In announcing the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence on New Year's eve the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky was among the works promised, but at the last minute it had to be changed to Brahm's symphony in D-Major, for Dr. Muck had intended to do the "Pathetic" at the last concert.

This last concert will be given next Wednesday evening in Infantry Hall, and it will also mark the farewell appearance in Providence of the conductor, who for the past two seasons has made so brilliant a record with Boston's great orchestra. One of the greatest of the pianists now before the public will be the soloist, Mr. Rudolf Ganz, who has had quite a number of engagements with the orchestra this year. He will play Grieg's concerto in A-Minor. The other number will be Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

1 .....

ess .....

e .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lest patrons of the Boston Symphony should make a mistake and go to Infantry Hall to-night to hear the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is well to repeat again that the concert will be to-morrow, Wednesday evening, instead of on this evening, the night on which it naturally would have fallen.

The slight change in schedule was made necessary by some important engagements in Boston, and although from the beginning it has been announced that this concert would take place on Wednesday habit is very strong, and it is to be hoped that no one will take the trouble to go to Infantry Hall this evening, only to find it quite dark.

HEIKE'' NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Lest patrons of the Boston Symphony should make a mistake and go to Infantry hall tonight to hear the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is well to repeat again that the concert will be tomorrow, Wednesday evening, at 8:15, instead of on this evening, the night on which it naturally would have fallen. Its slight change in schedule was made necessary by some important engagements in Boston, and although from the beginning it has been announced that this concert would take place on Wednesday habit is very strong, and it is to be hoped that no one will take the trouble to go to Infantry hall this evening only to find it quite dark.

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 16 1908

Fritz Kreisler Will Play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin at the Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Concerts and Recitals.

THE fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major.

The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled respectively, "Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noël" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

I.

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

The second movement, "Noël," is described as "a little Christian song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, a "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

FEB 16 1908

Auf einem Bankett, das der Deutsche Verein der Harvard-Universität kürzlich zu Ehren des Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Dr. Karl Muck, veranstaltet hat, feierte Herr Henry Lee Higginson, der Gründer der weltberühmten Orchestervereinigung, den genannten Dirigenten durch folgende Worte: „Einen guten Orchesterleiter zu finden, heißt den Weg zum Himmel entdecken, — nur daß das Erstere viel schwieriger ist. Der deutsche Kaiser hat uns Dr. Muck für ein Jahr überlassen. Als dieses Jahr zu Ende war, bat ich um ein weiteres und erhielt eine gütige Zusage. Ein solches Anliegen jetzt zu wiederholen — das kann ich wohl nicht thun. Dr. Muck würde gern bleiben, und wie gern wir ihn behalten würden, das können Sie sich leicht vorstellen! Es macht der Kunst Dr. Muck's alle Ehre, daß er ebenso gut Musik aufführen kann, die ihm nicht gefällt, als solche, die ihm an's Herz gewachsen ist. Dr. Muck ist ein wenig überall gewesen und hat überall die festlichste Aufnahme gefunden. Er hat uns in Amerika nicht nur zufriedengestellt und erfreut, er hat auch erzogen. Gern hoffe ich es, daß ihm gegenüber nicht um ein „Lebe wohl", sondern um ein „Auf Wie-

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date FEB 16 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. Another important feature will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical light. It had its first performance in Cologne last October, and Carl Pohlig gave it in Philadelphia last December. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas, and is said to have treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral ingenuity for which he is noted. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will bring forward Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera House. He will sing the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger." At this concert Dr. Muck will introduce here a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The four movements are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noël" were composed in December, 1895, a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

The second movement, "Noël," is described as "a little Christmas song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 16 1908

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. An important number on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas, and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major. The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera-House. One of his numbers will give the New York public the opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which brings the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art. The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

m EVENING SUN,

New York City.

ress FEB 15 1908

te

Karl Muck, quitting the Boston Symphony this year, makes his last visit but one to New York next week. His Carnegie Hall programme presents Kreisler in Beethoven's violin concerto, the new Max Reger variations and fugue, and a Bach suite in D, on Thursday night. The Saturday matinée has Van Rooy in songs from "Meistersinger" and "Hans Heiling," four new "Symphonic Sketches" by G. W. Chadwick and the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss. MacDowell's "Autumn" suite, op. 42, leads the Brooklyn concert on Friday, with Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Goldmark's "Prometheus" and Lalo's violin "Symphonic Espagnole" for Kreisler.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

FEB 16 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, opus 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is of a decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity of hearing Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An Jenem Tag" from Marchner's opera "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sach's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The concert will open with a suite by George W. Chadwick, "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and tambourine
To paint my jubilee.
For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me. D. R.

The second movement, "Noel," is described as "a little Christmas song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, a "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

FEB 16 1908

THE fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and on Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A feature of the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major.

The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

FEB 16 1908

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT THIS WEEK

Fritz Kreisler Will Be the Soloist—Mme. Gadski Coming.

Leading the music programme of the week is the announcement of the season's fourth philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Baptist Temple will be the setting and Friday evening the time.

Dr. Karl Muck will conduct and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

FEB 11 1908

A NEW star has risen in the splendor above the horizon of Boston. Miss Gerville-Réache, a French contralto, who was heard at the Metropolitan Opera House rather often during the latter part of the season, was the soloist of the week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Boston saw a great light.

Now, it is a considerable honor for any singer to appear with the Boston orchestra in the iron régime of Muck. A pianist or a violinist of the first rank, armed with a great concerto, may fit into the plan of a symphony concert for the foremost orchestra of the world. But the trumpery pleasings of a mere singing man or woman have no proper place in a concert of serious music. The retention as soloists of a singer or two is the last concession to a vanishing barbarism. When Boston shall be wholly civilized not even a Melba or a Schumann-Heink will be tolerated at the solemn festivals of her sacred orchestra. This year Mme Schumann-Heink appeared as soloist early in the season. Mme Melba was to have been the second and last singer at the concerts last week. But Mme Melba has elected to remain in Australia this winter. Hence Miss Gerville-Réache. Without further delay let us give ear to Mr. Hale in the Boston Herald:

Miss Gerville-Reache gave a superb interpretation of Delilah's air of seduction. Her voice is unusual in color, richness, compass. It is a glorious organ for the display of passion, with tones of irresistible appeal. In this aria she sang with a fine appreciation of the melodic line; with phrases that were now as caressing velvet and now as a steady and consuming flame; with dignity in her sensuous entreaty, for the woman that dwelt in the valley of Sorek was no ordinary wanton.

Seldom if ever has this one great melody of Saint-Saens been sung here with such beauty and wealth of tone, with such compelling charm of diction.

She was less successful in the song of Orpheus, which is largely dependent on the situation and the action for its due effect. Yet in this song there were thrilling moments, and there was the sight of a passionately eloquent singer, not a singing machine.

m EVENING POST,

ress New York City.

te FEB 15 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major. The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger." The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

FEB 15 1908

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist at the second concert in aid of the Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund given in Boston last Sunday night. A Wagner programme was given.

m SUN,

ress New York City.

te FEB 16 1908

The next Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's violin concerto, and the orchestral novelty will be Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme of Hiller's. Saturday afternoon Anton Van Rooy will sing, and another orchestral novelty, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," will be performed.

[144]

TIMES,

New York City.

ess ..... FEB 16 1908

Fritz Kreisler Will Play Beethoven's Concerto for Violin at the Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Concerts and Recitals.

THE fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, Feb. 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major.

The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled respectively, "Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noël" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the Summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

I.
No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint m' jubilee.

The second movement, "Noël," is described as "a little Christian song," and has this motto

Through the sof.. calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby: all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, a "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

STAATS ZEITUNG,

is ..... New York City.

Auf einem Bankett, das der Deutsche Verein der Harvard-Universität kürzlich zu Ehren des Dirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, Dr. Karl Muck, veranstaltet hat, feierte Herr Henry Lee Higginson, der Gründer der weltberühmten Orchestervereinigung, den genannten Dirigenten durch folgende Worte: „Einen guten Orchesterleiter zu finden, heißt den Weg zum Himmel entdecken, — nur daß das Erstere viel schwieriger ist. Der deutsche Kaiser hat uns Dr. Muck für ein Jahr überlassen. Als dieses Jahr zu Ende war, bat ich um ein weiteres und erhielt eine gütige Zusage. Ein solches Anliegen jetzt zu wiederholen — das kann ich wohl nicht thun. Dr. Muck würde gern bleiben, und wie gern wir ihn behalten würden, das können Sie sich leicht vorstellen! Es macht der Kunst Dr. Muck's alle Ehre, daß er ebenso gut Musik aufführen kann, die ihm nicht gefällt, als solche, die ihm an's Herz gewachsen ist. Dr. Muck ist ein wenig überall gewesen und hat überall die festlichste Aufnahme gefunden. Er hat uns in Amerika nicht nur zufriedengestellt und erfreut, er hat uns auch erzogen. Gern hoffe ich es, daß es sich ihm gegenüber nicht um ein „Lebewohl" handelt, sondern um ein „Auf Wiedersehen".

From TRIBUNE

Address ..... New York City.

Date ..... FEB 16 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and Saturday afternoon, February 22. On Thursday evening Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. Another important feature will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical light. It had its first performance in Cologne last October, and Carl Pohlig gave it in Philadelphia last December. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas, and is said to have treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral ingenuity for which he is noted. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will bring forward Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera House. He will sing the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger." At this concert Dr. Muck will introduce here a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The four movements are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noël," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noël" were composed in December, 1895, a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and a tambourine,
To paint my jubilee.

The second movement, "Noël," is described as "a little Christmas song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.
(Translation.)

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From WORLD,

Address ..... New York City.

Date ..... FEB 16 1908

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's Concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. An important number on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas, and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major. The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera-House. One of his numbers will give the New York public the opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An Jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which brings the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art. The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noël" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and tambourine
To paint my jubilee.
For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me.

D. R.

The second movement, "Noel," is described as "a little Christmas song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, a "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

THE fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 20, and on Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A feature of the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major.

The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria, "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT THIS WEEK

Fritz Kreisler Will Be the Soloist—Mme. Gadski Coming.

Leading the music programme of the week is the announcement of the season's fourth philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Baptist Temple will be the setting and Friday evening the time.

Dr. Karl Muck will conduct and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

Karl Muck, quitting the Boston Symphony this year, makes his last visit but one to New York next week. His Carnegie Hall programme presents Kreisler in Beethoven's violin concerto, the new Max Reger variations and fugue, and a Bach suite in D, on Thursday night. The Saturday matinée has Van Rooy in songs from "Meistersinger" and "Hans Heiling," four new "Symphonic Sketches" by G. W. Chadwick and the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss.

MacDowell's "Autumn" suite, op. 42, leads the Brooklyn concert on Friday, with Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Goldmark's "In the Spring" and Lalo's violin "Symphonic Espagnole" for Kreisler.

[144]

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

FEB 16 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's concerto for violin. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, opus 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. It had its first performance in Cologne last October. Carl Pohlig gave it its first performance in America at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia last December, and its first performance in Boston was on the 14th and 15th of this month. Reger has taken a tuneful theme from one of Hiller's operettas and has treated it with all the contrapuntal and orchestral skill for which he is famous. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's Suite in D major.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is of a decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the rare opportunity of hearing Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An Jenem Tag" from Marchner's opera "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sach's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger."

The concert will open with a suite by George W. Chadwick, "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The four movements are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and a "Vagrom Ballad" "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895; a "Vagrom Ballad" in February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" in the summer of 1904. The first movement, "Jubilee," carries the following motto:

No cold gray tones for me!
Give me the warmest red and green,
A cornet and tambourine
To paint my jubilee.
For when pale flutes and oboes play
Of sadness I beg and pray:
Give me the violets and the May,
But no gray skies for me.

D. R.

The second movement, "Noel," is described as "a little Christmas song," and has this motto:

Through the soft, calm moonlight comes the sound,
A mother lulls her baby; all around
The gentle snow lies glistening;
On such a night the Virgin mother mild
In dreamless slumber wrapped the Holy Child,
While angel hosts were listening.

The third movement, "Hobgoblin," carries as its motto Shakespeare's "That Shrewd and Knavish Sprite Called Robin Goodfellow." The composer has in mind "the rascally imp that frights maidens of the villagery, skims milk, mocks the breathless housewife at the churn, misleads night wanderers, disconcerts sorely the wisest aunt telling the saddest tale."

The fourth movement, a "Vagrom Ballad," carries the following motto:

A tale of tramps and railway ties,
Of old clay pipes and rum,
Of broken heads and blackened eyes,
And the "thirty days" to come.

The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

A NEW star has risen in dazzling splendor above the horizon of Boston. Miss Gerville-Réache, a French contralto, who was heard at the Manhattan Opera House rather often in the early part of the season, was the soloist last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Boston saw a great light.

Now, it is a considerable honor for any singer to appear with the Boston orchestra in the iron régime of Muck. A pianist or a violinist of the first rank, armed with a great concerto, may fit into the plan of a symphony concert for the foremost orchestra of the world. But the trumpery pleasings of a mere singing man or woman have no proper place in a concert of serious music. The retention as soloists of a singer or two is the last concession to a vanishing barbarism. When Boston shall be wholly civilized not even a Melba or a Schumann-Heink will be tolerated at the solemn festivals of her sacred orchestra. This year Mme Schumann-Heink appeared as soloist early in the season. Mme Melba was to have been the second and last singer at the concerts last week. But Mme Melba has elected to remain in Australia this winter. Hence Miss Gerville-Réache. Without further delay let us give ear to Mr. Hale in the Boston Herald:

Miss Gerville-Reache gave a superb interpretation of Delilah's air of seduction. Her voice is unusual in color, richness, compass. It is a glorious organ for the display of passion, with tones of irresistible appeal. In this aria she sang with a fine appreciation of the melodic line; with phrases that were now as caressing velvet and now as a steady and consuming flame; with dignity in her sensuous entreaty, for the woman that dwelt in the valley of Sorek was no ordinary wanton.

Seldom if ever has this one great melody of Saint-Saens been sung here with such beauty and wealth of tone, with such compelling charm of diction.

She was less successful in the song of Orpheus, which is largely dependent on the situation and the action for its due effect. Yet in this song there were thrilling moments, and there was the sight of a passionately eloquent singer, not a singing machine.

m EVENING POST,

lress ..... New York City.

te 15 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 20, and on next Saturday afternoon, February 22. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Fritz Kreisler, and he will play Beethoven's concerto for violin for the first time in New York during his present tour. A very important item on the programme will be the first performance in New York of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, op. 100. This is the latest work of large dimensions that has come from Munich's newest musical genius. The other number on the evening programme will be the overture from Bach's suite in D major. The programme Saturday afternoon is of decidedly popular character. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House, and one of his numbers will give the New York public the opportunity to hear Wagner played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck. His first number will be the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling." His second number, which will bring the concert to a close, will be Hans Sachs's address on German art, which closes the last act of "Die Meistersinger." The first number on the programme will be a suite by George W. Chadwick, which is entitled "Symphonic Sketches." It has never been heard in New York. The other number will be Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

FEB 15 1908

* * *

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist at the second concert in aid of the Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund given in Boston last Sunday night. A Wagner programme was given.

m SUN,

ress ..... New York City.

e ..... FEB 16 1908

The next Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night Fritz Kreisler will play Beethoven's violin concerto, and the orchestral novelty will be Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme of Hiller's. Saturday afternoon Anton Van Rooy will sing, and another orchestral novelty, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," will be performed.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

FEB 15 1908

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist Thursday evening and he will play a Beethoven concerto. A very important number on the programme will be Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller. This is Reger's opus 100 and is the latest work of large dimensions from his pen. It was first performed in Cologne last October, Carl Pohlig gave it in Philadelphia in December and Dr. Muck will give it in Boston this week. The overture to Bach's suite in D major will complete the evening programme. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan opera house, who will sing Hans Sachs's address in the last act of "Die Meistersinger" and the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestra will give a suite by George W. Chadwick entitled "Symphonic Sketches," which has never been heard in New York, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks."

EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 15 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth pair of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller will get a first hearing in New York at the evening concert. It is the latest big composition of Munich's musical genius. Fritz Kreisler will play the piano part in the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon Van Rooy will sing Hans Sachs's address on German art from "Die Meistersinger," and George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" suite will be played, also for the first time in New York.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

FEB 16

Kommende Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Der Solist des Donnerstags-Konzerts ist Herr Fritz Kreisler, der Beethoven's Violinkonzert spielen wird. Dr. Muck wird bei dieser Gelegenheit Max Reger's „Variationen und Fuge über ein Thema von J. A. Hiller" Op. 100 zur Aufführung bringen, sowie die Ouvertüre aus Bach's Suite in D-Dur. Das Samstag-Nachmittagskonzert wird Herrn Anton Van Rooy vom Metropolitan Opera House als Solisten haben. Das Orchester bringt zum erstenmal George W. Chadwick's „Symphonic Sketches", sowie Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" zum Vortrag.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

FEB 16 1908

The soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall will be Mr. Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's violin concerto. An interesting orchestral novelty will be the first performance of Max Reger's "Variations and Fugues" on a theme by Hiller. It is said to be one of the most characteristic works of the Munich composer. Bach's suite in D major will complete the programme.

At the Saturday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Van Rooy will sing Hans Sachs' third act monologue from "Die Meistersinger." New to New York audiences will be a suite in four movements by Mr. George W. Chadwick entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The programme includes Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

FEB 17 1908

Aus dem Konzertsaal.

Das vierte aus der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten veranstaltet das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester am nächsten Freitag Abend unter den Auspicien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften im Baptist Temple. Als Solist in dem äußerst interessanten Programm, welches Nummern von MacDowell, Bizet, Lalo und Goldmark enthält, wirkt der bekannte Violinist Fritz Kreisler mit. Das Konzert leitet Dr.

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 15 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SOCIETY CONCERTS

Will Make Brooklyn Musically Notable Next Week—Fine Local Programmes.

DE BUSSY'S OPERA TO BE SUNG

For the First Time in America at the Manhattan on Wednesday.

For his fourth programme in Brooklyn, which will be played in the Baptist Temple, Friday evening, Dr. Muck has chosen works of a popular nature. The first will be MacDowell's "Woodland Suite," op. 42, which the orchestra has played with much success throughout the country this year. The second number will be Bizet's stunning overture, "Patrie," and the other orchestral number will be Goldmark's brilliantly beautiful overture, "In the Spring." The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia University will give the lecture recital on the programme to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. The lecture recital (Brooklyn Institute) is set at Association Hall on Thursday, at 4 P.M.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BRILLIANT PROGRAMME FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Will Play "Woodland" Suite.

INSTITUTE SONG RECITAL.

Other Local Musicales and Important Music Events in Manhattan.

For his fourth programme, which will be played in the Baptist Temple next Friday afternoon, Dr. Muck has chosen works of a popular nature. The first will be MacDowell's "Woodland Suite," Op. 43, which the orchestra has played with much success throughout the country this year. The second number will be Bizet's stunning overture, "Patrie," and the other orchestral number will be Goldmark's brilliantly beautiful overture, "In the Spring."

The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, will give the lecture-recital on the programme to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. The lecture recital (Brooklyn Institute) is set at Association Hall, on Thursday, at 4 p. m.

From NEW YORK HERALD,

BROOKLYN EDIT. New York City.

Address

Date FEB 16 1908

MUSIC events in Brooklyn for the coming week will include the fourth concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, February 21, at the Baptist Temple. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the assisting artist. The programme will open with the "Woodland Suite" of the late Edward MacDowell. The programme in full will be as follows:—MacDowell, suite, op. 42 (often called the "Autumn" suite), five movements; Bizet, overture, "Patrie"; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole, D minor, op. 21, for violin and orchestra, Allegro non troppo, Scherzando, Allegro molto, Andante, Rondo, Allegro; Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring," op. 36.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Friday night a leading feature of the programme will be the late Edward A. MacDowell's "Woodland" suite. This fact may be taken as a tribute to the memory of the American composer by Dr. Muck, who at this concert will make his last appearance but one with the orchestra in Brooklyn. The orchestra will play also two overtures, Bizet's "Patrie" and Goldmark's "In the Spring." Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be soloist at this concert, and is to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole in D minor.

FRITZ KREISLER.
Soloist for Fourth Concert of Boston Orchestra.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 15 1908

At the dinner recently given by the Deutscher Verein, at Harvard University, in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston Transcript:

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe Wohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.'"

Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 16 1908

At the dinner recently given by the Deutscher Verein at Harvard University in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston "Transcript":

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city, and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe wohl' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.'"

Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 15 1908

The fourth Philharmonic concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at the Baptist Temple, next Friday evening.

A lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Baptist Temple next Friday night, will be given at Association Hall, on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, by Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Feb 15, 1908

The introductory lecture on the programme of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursday afternoon by Daniel Gregory Mason.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

PHILADELPHIA

Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the most gifted singer that this country has produced in many a day, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Monday night. Miss Farrar will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a repetition of this important work will be welcomed by music lovers. Reger is one of the most striking figures in modern music, and his works are worthy of much greater familiarity than they have yet received.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra, but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one more appearance in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert, on Monday evening, March 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA

FEB 15 1908

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance on this occasion will unquestionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar sang in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the management of the Orchestra to have her as soloist several times this winter, but, owing to her numerous engagements in the opera it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser," and the second number will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding," "Voi che sapete."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH

PHILADELPHIA, PA

FEB 9 1908

Musical Odds and Ends.

Geraldine Farrar is to be soloist at the Boston Orchestra's concert in the Academy of Music February 17 next—her first appearance here as a concert star. She will sing Elisabeth's aria from "Tannhaeuser" and the page's song, "Voiche Sapete," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 15

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist Thursday evening and he will play a Beethoven concerto. A very important number on the programme will be Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller. This is Reger's opus 100 and is the latest work of large dimensions from his pen. It was first performed in Cologne last October, Carl Pohlig gave it in Philadelphia in December and Dr. Muck gave it in Boston this week. The overture to Bach's suite in D major will complete the evening programme. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Anton Van Rooy, of the Metropolitan opera house, who will sing Hans Sachs's address in the last act of "Die Meistersinger" and the aria "An jenen Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The orchestra will give a suite by George W. Chadwick entitled "Symphonic Sketches," which has never been heard in New York, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks."

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.
FEB 15 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth pair of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller will get a first hearing in New York at the evening concert. It is the latest big composition of Munich's musical genius. Fritz Kreisler will play the piano part in the Beethoven concerto. On Saturday afternoon Van Rooy will sing Hans Sachs's address on German art from "Die Meistersinger," and George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" suite will be played, also for the first time in New York.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Kommende Konzerte.

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden kommenden Donnerstag Abend, resp. Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Der Solist des Donnerstags-Konzerts ist Herr Fritz Kreisler, der Beethoven's Violinkonzert spielen wird. Dr. Muck wird bei dieser Gelegenheit Max Reger's „Variationen und Fuge über ein Thema von J. A. Hiller" Op. 100 zur Aufführung bringen, sowie die Ouvertüre aus Bach's Suite in D-Dur. Das Samstag-Nachmittagskonzert wird Herrn Anton Van Rooy vom Metropolitan Opera House als Solisten haben. Das Orchester bringt zum erstenmal George W. Chadwick's „Symphonic Sketches", sowie Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" zum Vortrag.

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.

The soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall will be Mr. Fritz Kreisler, who will play Beethoven's violin concerto. An interesting orchestral novelty will be the first performance of Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue" on a theme by Hiller. It is said to be one of the most characteristic works of the Munich composer. Bach's suite in D major will complete the programme.

At the Saturday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Van Rooy will sing Hans Sachs' third act monologue from "Die Meistersinger." New to New York audiences will be a suite in four movements by Mr. George W. Chadwick entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The programme includes Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Aus dem Konzertsaal.

Das vierte aus der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten veranstaltet das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester am nächsten Freitag Abend unter den Auspicien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften im Baptist Temple. Als Solist in dem äußerst interessanten Programm, welches Nummern von McDowell, Bizet, Lalo und Goldmark enthält, wirkt der bekannte Violinist Fritz Kreisler mit. Das Konzert leitet Dr. Karl Muck.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 15 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SOCIETY CONCERTS

Will Make Brooklyn Musically Notable Next Week—Fine Local Programmes.

DE BUSSY'S OPERA TO BE SUNG

For the First Time in America at the Manhattan on Wednesday.

For his fourth programme in Brooklyn, which will be played in the Baptist Temple, Friday evening, Dr. Muck has chosen works of a popular nature. The first will be MacDowell's "Woodland Suite," op. 42, which the orchestra has played with much success throughout the country this year. The second number will be Bizet's stunning overture, "Patrie," and the other orchestral number will be Goldmark's brilliantly beautiful overture, "In the Spring." The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia University will give the lecture recital on the programme to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. The lecture recital (Brooklyn Institute) is set at Association Hall on Thursday, at 4 P.M.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BRILLIANT PROGRAMME FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Will Play "Woodland" Suite.

INSTITUTE SONG RECITAL.

Other Local Musicales and Important Music Events in Manhattan.

For his fourth programme, which will be played in the Baptist Temple next Friday afternoon, Dr. Muck has chosen works of a popular nature. The first will be MacDowell's "Woodland Suite," Op. 43, which the orchestra has played with much success throughout the country this year. The second number will be Bizet's stunning overture, "Patrie," and the other orchestral number will be Goldmark's brilliantly beautiful overture, "In the Spring."

The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, will give the lecture-recital on the programme to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. The lecture recital (Brooklyn Institute) is set at Association Hall, on Thursday, at 4 p. m.

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.
BROOKLYN EDIT.
FEB 16 1908

MUSIC events in Brooklyn for the coming week will include the fourth concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, February 21, at the Baptist Temple. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the assisting artist. The programme will open with the "Woodland Suite" of the late Edward MacDowell. The programme in full will be as follows:—MacDowell, suite, op. 42 (often called the "Autumn" suite), five movements; Bizet, overture, "Patrie"; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole, D minor, op. 21, for violin and orchestra, Allegro non troppo, Scherzando, Allegro molto, Andante, Rondo, Allegro; Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring," op. 36.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Friday night a leading feature of the programme will be the late Edward A. MacDowell's "Woodland" suite. This fact may be taken as a tribute to the memory of the American composer by Dr. Muck, who at this concert will make his last appearance but one with the orchestra in Brooklyn. The orchestra will play also two overtures, Bizet's "Patrie" and Goldmark's "In the Spring." Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be soloist at this concert, and is to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole in D minor.

FRITZ KREISLER.
Soloist for Fourth Concert of Boston Orchestra.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 15 1908

At the dinner recently given by the Deutscher Verein, at Harvard University, in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston Transcript:

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe Wohl,' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.'"

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 16 1908

At the dinner recently given by the Deutscher Verein at Harvard University in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston "Transcript":

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city, and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe wohl' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.'"

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The fourth Philharmonic concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, at the Baptist Temple, next Friday evening.

A lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Baptist Temple next Friday night, will be given at Association Hall, on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, by Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The introductory lecture on the programme of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursday afternoon by Daniel Gregory Mason.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the most gifted singer that this country has produced in many a day, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Monday night. Miss Farrar will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a repetition of this important work will be welcomed by music lovers. Reger is one of the most striking figures in modern music, and his works are worthy of much greater familiarity than they have yet received.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra, but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one more appearance in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert, on Monday evening, March 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA

The soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 17, will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Farrar has never sung in concert in Philadelphia, and her appearance on this occasion will unquestionably arouse a great deal of interest. Recently Miss Farrar sang in concert in Boston with great success. It was the purpose of the management of the Orchestra to have her as soloist several times this winter, but, owing to her numerous engagements in the opera it has been able to secure her only for this one appearance in Philadelphia. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. The first will be Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser," and the second number will be "The Page's Song," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding." "Voi che sapete."

* * *

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA PA
FEB 8 1908

Musical Odds and Ends.

Geraldine Farrar is to be soloist at the Boston Orchestra's concert in the Academy of Music February 17 next—her first appearance here as a concert star. She will sing Elisabeth's aria from "Tannhaeuser" and the page's song, "Voiche t' Sapete," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C
FEB 9- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 9- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the New National Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Washington, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Belin.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER.
[illegible], N. Y.
ss
FEB 9- 1908

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, February 3d, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Prof. Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

[illegible], N.Y.
FEB 9- 1908

The second and last concert of the season for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston this evening. Dr. Muck has arranged a program of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas.

[illegible]
[illegible]
FEB 1

FRITZ KREISKER AS SOLOIST.

No Singer At Next Boston Symphony Concert.

It is with regret that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it cannot offer a singer as soloist at its fourth Baltimore concert on Wednesday evening, February 19. Every effort was made to get some one of high standing, but the repertoires at both the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera Houses are so arranged at present that none of the singers there can be secured. However, the management has secured the services of Fritz Kreisker, the violinist, and he will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICA
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 9- 1908

It is with much regret that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it cannot offer a singer as soloist at its fourth Baltimore concert, on Wednesday evening, February 19th. Every effort was made to get some one of high standing, but the repertoires at both the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera houses are so arranged at present that none of the singers there can be secured. However, the management has been fortunate in getting the services of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, and he will be the soloist.

From PRESS
Address PHILADELPHIA, P
Date FEB 16 1908

Mrs. Frederick [illegible] Taylor will give a large musical at her residence in Chestnut Hill to-morrow afternoon in honor of the Theodorowitz Stringed Quartet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From INDIANAPOLIS STAR.
Address [illegible] FEB 9- 1908

Boston Orchestra Loses Dr. Muck

Contrary to hope, and even expectation, the negotiations that were to continue Dr. Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra have failed, and late yesterday afternoon the formal announcement was made that he will leave his post at the end of the current season, early next May, and return to Berlin. The management of the orchestra has pursued these negotiations diligently and skillfully with the intendant of the Royal Opera, but he has been as insistent upon the need of Dr. Muck there as were the spokesmen of the orchestra upon the need of him here. Twice the Emperor, who keeps the last word in the important affairs of the State Theaters, has sanctioned Dr. Muck's leave of absence to conduct in Boston—once when Mr. Higginson first sought to engage him, and again in the arrangements for his return for the present musical year. It was a generous courtesy that testified alike to the Emperor's regard for the art of music in America, and to his pride in the distinguished share that a conductor of the Royal Opera was to have in it, and to his appreciation of the unique position and prestige of the Boston Orchestra. Fairly, after two years of such consideration, he may now weigh the needs of his own opera house. He has found them imperative; but that circumstance will not lessen grateful memory of the good will and interest that made possible Dr. Muck's two years of work in Boston. That Dr. Muck was willing to remain has been an open secret.

That work has long spoken for itself. No conductor that has led the orchestra since its beginnings has devoted himself more diligently, conscientiously and unselfishly to his task. In all Dr. Muck's stay in Boston his work has been the occupation and preoccupation of his life. He has found little time for other interests, though his mind is alert and wide-ranging in many things outside music. He has given as little to diversion. By day and by night he has worked to bring the band and its performances to the standards that he sought. There have been just and reasonable differences of opinion over his choice and arrangement of the music that has made his programs.

The two particularly distinguishing traits of that performance have been its vitality of execution and its fullness of sympathetic understanding of the music in hand. Beyond dispute Dr. Muck has brought an elasticity of tone and rhythm, a clearness and vigor of accent and a communicating ardor into the performances of the orchestra that have been novel and stirring to its audiences. They have raised high the pleasure and the emotion of music that suffices to itself as beautiful or exciting sound. They have carried as high the expression of the poetic and dramatic contents of music that seeks other and more varied ends. Side by side with this vitality that has reanimated many a classic piece and brought many a modern to new life, has stood Dr. Muck's pre-eminent personal trait—his ability to differentiate the music that he chooses, to give to it its peculiar individuality, to grasp its substance, to feel its spirit and to communicate both as clearly, persuasively and distinctively to his hearers.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ZIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK DEMOCRAT
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I
ess
FEB 19 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. The program will comprise Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Grieg's concerto for piano, in A-minor, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody. The concert will also be the last appearance of Dr. Muck in Providence, for when the orchestra returns next year it will have another conductor, as Dr. Muck is to return to Germany at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in that city. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

SUN
BALTIMORE, M
FEB 16 1908

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE

Kreisler With Boston Symphony At Lyric Wednesday.

SOUSA AND BAND TOMORROW

Joseph Hofmann At Peabody Friday — Philadelphia Orchestra Next Week—New Songs.

Fritz Kreisler, who is conceded to be one of the greatest of living violinists and thrilled a Baltimore audience here several weeks ago, when he appeared in connection with the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fourth of the present Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given Wednesday evening at the Lyric. Kreisler will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which will be played in response to many requests that have been sent to Dr. Muck, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

After this concert Dr. Muck will come to [illegible] March 18. As

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R.
Date FEB 13 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience and Final Appearance of Dr. Muck as Conductor.

The largest audience of the series graced Infantry Hall last evening at the final symphony concert, drawn by the exceptionally fine programme and the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston orchestra. He was given a warm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's great "Pathetic" symphony, and his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work brought him a spontaneous and hearty ovation at its close.

It may be that those are at least partly right who accuse us of provincialism in our musical taste and standards, but it would be unkind if Dr. Muck should go home and repeat the charge. For he has received instant acceptance and appreciation here. It is generally agreed that he is the finest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had, and that is saying a great deal. The regret that he must, at the close of the present season, return to Berlin to keep his engagements is widespread and genuine.

Last night's programme was somewhat more extended than usual, owing to the extreme length of the symphony. The order was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, op. 74.....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte, op. 16. Grieg
Allegro molto moderate.
Adagio.
Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.....Chabrier

Probably people will never cease trying to guess "what Tschaikowsky meant" by his Sixth Symphony. That he had a distinct programme in his mind is proved by his letters. He refers to it while in the process of composition as "a programme symphony, with a programme that shall be a riddle to everyone; may they break their heads over it." That is what has been happening ever since. Tschaikowsky's death soon after the first production of the work, which did not at once take hold upon popular favor, must always leave the question of his direct inspiration in doubt.

Every hearer, therefore, is at liberty to solve the problem as he pleases. Perhaps as good a suggestion as any is that suggested by Philip Hale in his programme notes—"a story of life, of man's illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories and end." It is certainly a strenuous life that is here depicted, and with more than a hint of a tragic close. After all, the matter may easily be made of too much importance. It is enough to accept this master-work of the great Russian composer as a superb piece of music, and enjoyment of it is keen indeed when presented in such a sympathetic and masterly manner as characterized Dr. Muck's interpretation of it last night.

The closing number of the programme made a fine contrast with the symphony. The Spanish rhapsody of Chabrier is a fine, brilliant and picturesque composition, abounding in life and gayety and so strong in "color" that its title is almost superfluous. This, too, was played with remarkable spirit and sympathy.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, who played Grieg's well-known concerto in A-minor in a masterly and convincing manner. A clean-cut, virile and capable artist is Mr. Ganz, and the impression he made was not to be mistaken. Several hearty recalls were given him. It would be a pleasure to hear this fine artist in recital. As a whole, the programme was one of the finest in recent years, and its performance was one to be long and pleasantly remembered.

Among those in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hope Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annis S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Corliss, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copeland, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James Field, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Potter, Miss Gyllenberg, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin Kern, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P. Williams, Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Green, Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Miss Blanche Davis, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Dorrance, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Andrew J. Comstock, Miss Clara Comstock, Mr. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Dow, Miss Ida Sawin, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Percy Middleton, the Misses Hall, Mrs. W. Penn Mather, Miss Mather, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Miss May Mason, Miss Helen Mason, Mr. W. B. Chase, Mrs. Charles Sisson, the Misses Sisson, Mrs. Albert W. Smith, Mr. John Day, Mrs. Charles Philbrick, Mrs. Horace N. Williams, Hon. Walter B. Vincent, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert and Mrs. Benjamin G. Botolph.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From PROVIDENCE, R.
Address
PROVIDENCE, R. I
Date FEB 13 1908

Programme Presented by Dr. Muck an Excellent One.

The final concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening was made memorable by one of the best programmes offered by Dr. Muck to the Providence subscribers, certainly the finest concert of the present year, and it was thoroughly appreciated by a large audience. The soloist was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, a pianist new to Providence, who won a fine reception.

The occasion was Dr. Muck's farewell to the large number of admirers that he has in Providence as elsewhere in the American cities visited by Boston's orchestra. The fact that he will not return to its directorship is nowhere more deeply regretted than here, and the splendid concert last night will doubtless be remembered by many as one typical of his regime, in which all his distinguishing qualities in leadership were noted. It might be said that they were summed up in his powerful and inspiring reading of the great sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky, which opened the programme. In addition to the symphony and the Grieg concerto the rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier, called "Espana," rounded a programme of varied interest.

The great merit of Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Tschaikowsky masterpiece is his refusal to let its baffling gamut of moods tempt him into a too individual or personal solution of them. Known as the "great riddle," the work of portentous length and limitless beauties is often considered fit meat for that variety of reading that attempts what never can be done—any exact definite assertion through the broad and indefinite medium of music. Let everybody interpret the swan song of Tschaikowsky as he wishes to each one it will be different, and in applying that rule Dr. Muck avoided the least bit of overassertion, drawing out its beauties with restraint and reverence to all their sensitiveness. His firm hold of the orchestra and his incisive, direct manner were never more noticeable than through the third and fourth movements of the work, where there exist such startling changes in the tempo and the mood.

Chabrier's dashing rhapsody, a brilliant agglomeration of Spanish dance tunes with the bolera rhythm especially prominent, gave the concert its own value of high contrast, and evidently gained its effect perfectly.

Mr. Ganz proved to be a player with power and fire in a marked degree, and also one of the clean-cut type of pianist who goes at the business in hand with authority and intelligence. He was forced to acknowledge several times the long-continued applause after finishing Grieg's colossal concerto.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
From PROVIDENCE, R.
Address
PROVIDENCE, R. I
Date FEB 13 1908

Wednesday was quite the gayest day in many weeks in Providence society. The day was ushered in with the ringing of bells in recognition of Lincoln's Birthday and the perfect weather was an element of success which entered into the various festivities of the day. Chief among the events of the evening was the brilliant military ball in Churchill House, a report of which appears in another column. There was also a dance in the Chapter House of the Psi Upsilon fraternity while, earlier in the evening a large gathering of society people wended their willing way to Infantry Hall, where Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given not only a rousing reception but a genuine "God speed," for it was the final concert in the series and the last in which Dr. Muck will appear, as he is shortly to return to Germany.

In the audience were noted the following: Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Miss Emma Taft, Mrs. Theodore Bogert, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. Harold Waterman, Miss Harriott H. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Miss Etta Fraser, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Harriett Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Miss Caroline Kelly, [146]

STAR.

FEB 1 - 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next to the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto.

POST

FEB 1 - 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last but one concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year will be given in the New National Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the famous violinist, who will probably play the Beethoven concerto. After this concert Dr. Muck will only make one more appearance in Washington, in March, for at the end of this season he returns to Germany to resume his duties as first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss .....

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard Union on Monday evening, February 3d, by the Deutscher Verein of Harvard University. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Prof. Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

The second and last concert of the season for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston this evening. Dr. Muck has arranged a program of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas.

FRITZ KREISKER AS SOLOIST.

No Singer At Next Boston Symphony Concert.

It is with regret that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it cannot offer a singer as soloist at its fourth Baltimore concert on Wednesday evening, February 19. Every effort was made to get some one of high standing, but the repertoires at both the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera Houses are so arranged at present that none of the singers there can be secured. However, the management has secured the services of Fritz Kreisker, the violinist, and he will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ARGUS

It is with much regret that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it cannot offer a singer as soloist at its fourth Baltimore concert, on Wednesday evening, February 19th. Every effort was made to get some one of high standing, but the repertoires at both the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera houses are so arranged at present that none of the singers there can be secured. However, the management has been fortunate in getting the services of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, and he will be the soloist.

From .....

Address .....

Date 1908

Mrs. Frederick W. Taylor will give a large musical at her residence in Chestnut Hill to-morrow afternoon in honor of the Theodorowitz Stringed Quartet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From ..... STAR.

Address .....

Boston Orchestra Loses Dr. Muck

Contrary to hope, and even expectation, the negotiations that were to continue Dr. Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra have failed, and, late yesterday afternoon the formal announcement was made that he will leave his post at the end of the current season, early next May, and return to Berlin. The management of the orchestra has pursued these negotiations diligently and skillfully with the intendant of the Royal Opera, but he has been as insistent upon the need of Dr. Muck there as were the spokesmen of the orchestra upon the need of him here. Twice the Emperor, who keeps the last word in the important affairs of the State Theaters, has sanctioned Dr. Muck's leave of absence to conduct in Boston—once when Mr. Higginson first sought to engage him, and again in the arrangements for his return for the present musical year. It was a generous courtesy that testified alike to the Emperor's regard for the art of music in America, and to his pride in the distinguished share that a conductor of the Royal Opera was to have in it, and to his appreciation of the unique position and prestige of the Boston Orchestra. Fairly, after two years of such consideration, he may now weigh the needs of his own opera house. He has found them imperative; but that circumstance will not lesson grateful memory of the good will and interest that made possible Dr. Muck's two years of work in Boston. That Dr. Muck was willing to remain has been an open secret.

That work has long spoken for itself. No conductor that has led the orchestra since its beginnings has devoted himself more diligently, conscientiously and unselfishly to his task. In all Dr. Muck's stay in Boston his work has been the occupation and preoccupation of his life. He has found little time for other interests, though his mind is alert and wide-ranging in many things outside music. He has given as little to diversion. By day and by night he has worked to bring the band and its performances to the standards that he sought. There have been just and reasonable differences of opinion over his choice and arrangement of the music that has made his programs.

The two particularly distinguishing traits of that performance have been its vitality of execution and its fullness of sympathetic understanding of the music in hand. Beyond dispute Dr. Muck has brought an elasticity of tone and rhythm, a clearness and vigor of accent and a communicating ardor into the performances of the orchestra that have been novel and stirring to its audiences. They have raised high the pleasure and the emotion of music that suffices to itself as beautiful or exciting sound. They have carried as high the expression of the poetic and dramatic contents of music that seeks other and more varied ends. Side by side with this vitality that has reanimated many a classic piece and brought many a modern to new life, has stood Dr. Muck's pre-eminent personal trait—his ability to differentiate the music that he chooses, to give to it its peculiar individuality, to grasp its substance, to feel its spirit and to communicate both as clearly, persuasively and distinctively to his hearers.

CABLE ADDRESS, EIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15. The program will comprise Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Grieg's concerto for piano in A-minor, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody. The concert will also be the last appearance of Dr. Muck in Providence, for when the orchestra returns next year it will have another conductor, as Dr. Muck is to return to Germany at the end of the present season to resume his duties as principal conductor of the Royal Opera House in that city. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

SUN

FEB 16 1908

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE

Kreisler With Boston Symphony At Lyric Wednesday.

SOUSA AND BAND TOMORROW

Joseph Hofmann At Peabody Friday — Philadelphia Orchestra Next Week—New Songs.

Fritz Kreisler, who is conceded to be one of the greatest of living violinists and thrilled a Baltimore audience here several weeks ago, when he appeared in connection with the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fourth of the present Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given Wednesday evening at the Lyric. Kreisler will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which will be played in response to many requests that have been sent to Dr. Muck, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

After this concert Dr. Muck will come to [illegible]—March 18. As

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

[146]

om ..... JOURNAL

dress ..... PROVIDENCE, R.

te ..... FEB 19 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience and Final Appearance of Dr. Muck as Conductor.

The largest audience of the series graced Infantry Hall last evening at the final symphony concert, drawn by the exceptionally fine programme and the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston orchestra. He was given a warm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's great "Pathetic" symphony, and his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work brought him a spontaneous and hearty ovation at its close.

It may be that those are at least partly right who accuse us of provincialism in our musical taste and standards, but it would be unkind if Dr. Muck should go home and repeat the charge. For he has received instant acceptance and appreciation here. It is generally agreed that he is the finest conductor the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had, and that is saying a great deal. The regret that he must, at the close of the present season, return to Berlin to keep his engagements is widespread and genuine.

Last night's programme was somewhat more extended than usual, owing to the extreme length of the symphony. The order was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, op. 74 ..... Tschaikowsky
Adagio; allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte, op. 16..Grieg
Allegro molto moderate.
Adagio.
Allegro moderato molto e marcato.
"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.....Chabrier

Probably people will never cease trying to guess "what Tschaikowsky meant" by his Sixth Symphony. That he had a distinct programme in his mind is proved by his letters. He refers to it while in the process of composition as "a programme symphony, with a programme that shall be a riddle to everyone; may they break their heads over it." That is what has been happening ever since. Tschaikowsky's death soon after the first production of the work, which did not at once take hold upon popular favor, must always leave the question of his direct inspiration in doubt.

Every hearer, therefore, is at liberty to solve the problem as he pleases. Perhaps as good a suggestion as any is that suggested by Philip Hale in his programme notes—"a story of life, of man's illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories and end." It is certainly a strenuous life that is here depicted, and with more than a hint of a tragic close. After all, the matter may easily be made of too much importance. It is enough to accept this master-work of the great Russian composer as a superb piece of music, and enjoyment of it is keen indeed when presented in such a sympathetic and masterly manner as characterized Dr. Muck's interpretation of it last night.

The closing number of the programme made a fine contrast with the symphony. The Spanish rhapsody of Chabrier is a fine, brilliant and picturesque composition, abounding in life and gayety and so strong in "color" that its title is almost superfluous. This, too, was played with remarkable spirit and sympathy.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, who played Grieg's well-known concerto in A-minor in a masterly and convincing manner. A clean-cut, virile and capable artist is Mr. Ganz, and the impression he made was not to be mistaken. Several hearty recalls were given him. It would be a pleasure to hear this fine artist in recital. As a whole, the programme was one of the finest in recent years, and its performance was one to be long and pleasantly remembered.

Among those in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter E. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hope Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tonjoroff, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Corliss, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copeland, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James Field, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Potter, Miss Gyllenberg, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin Kern, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P. Williams, Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Green, Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Miss Blanche Davis, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Dorrance, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Andrew J. Comstock, Miss Clara Comstock, Mr. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Dow, Miss Ida Sawin, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Percy Middleton, the Misses Hall, Mrs. W. Penn Mather, Miss Mather, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Miss May Mason, Miss Helen Mason, Mr. W. B. Chase, Mrs. Charles Sisson, the Misses Sisson, Mrs. Albert W. Smith, Mr. John Day, Mrs. Charles Philbrick, Mrs. Horace N. Williams, Hon. Walter B. Vincent, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert and Mrs. Benjamin G. Botolph.

om .....

dress ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

te .....

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme Presented by Dr. Muck an Excellent One.

The final concert for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last evening was made notable by one of the best programmes offered by Dr. Muck to the Providence subscribers, certainly the finest one of the present year, and it was thoroughly appreciated by a large audience. The soloist was Mr. Rudolph Ganz, a pianist new to Providence, who won a fine reception.

The occasion was Dr. Muck's farewell to the large number of admirers that he has in Providence as elsewhere in the American cities visited by Boston's orchestra. The fact that he will not return to its directorship is nowhere more deeply regretted than here, and the splendid concert last night will doubtless be remembered by many as one typical of his regime, in which all his distinguishing qualities in leadership were noted. It might be said that they were summed up in his powerful and inspiring reading of the great sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky, which opened the programme. In addition to the symphony and the Grieg concerto the rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier, called "Espana," rounded a programme of varied interest.

The great merit of Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Tschaikowsky masterpiece is his refusal to let its baffling gamut of moods tempt him into a too individual or personal solution of them. Known as the "great riddle," the work of portentous length and limitless beauties is often considered fit meat for that variety of reading that attempts what never can be done—any exact definite assertion through the broad and indefinite medium of music. Let everybody interpret the swan song of Tschaikowsky as he wishes, to each one it will be different, and in applying that rule Dr. Muck avoided the least bit of overassertion, drawing out its beauties with restraint and reverence to all their sensitiveness. His firm hold of the orchestra and his incisive, direct manner were never more noticeable than through the third and fourth movements of the work, where there exist such startling changes in the tempo and the mood.

Chabrier's dashing rhapsody, a brilliant agglomeration of Spanish dance tunes with the bolera rhythm especially prominent, gave the concert its own value of high contrast, and evidently gained its effect perfectly.

Mr. Ganz proved to be a player with power and fire in a marked degree, and also one of the clean-cut type of pianist who goes at the business in hand with authority and intelligence. He was forced to acknowledge several times the long-continued applause after finishing Grieg's colossal concerto.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date ..... FEB 19 1908

Wednesday was quite the gayest day in many weeks in Providence society. The day was ushered in with the ringing of bells in recognition of Lincoln's Birthday and the perfect weather was an element of success which entered into the various festivities of the day. Chief among the events of the evening was the brilliant military ball in Churchill House, a report of which appears in another column. There was also a dance in the Chapter House of the Psi Upsilon fraternity while, earlier in the evening a large gathering of society people wended their willing way to Infantry Hall, where Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given not only a rousing reception but a genuine "God speed," for it was the final concert in the series and the last in which Dr. Muck will appear, as he is shortly to return to Germany.

In the audience were noted the following: Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Miss Emma Taft, Mrs. Theodore Bogert, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. Harold Waterman, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Miss Etta Fraser, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Harriett Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Miss Caroline Kelly, Miss Louise Sweetland.

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 16 1908

GERALDINE FARRAR.

GERALDINE FARRAR, among the most gifted singers of this country, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night. Madame Melba was originally scheduled for this concert, but when she decided not to return to America this season the Boston management endeavored to engage the best available artist to replace her. It was only by exceptional good fortune that Miss Farrar could be engaged, so many duties compelling her presence in the Metropolitan Opera House that it was found impossible to have her for as many concerts with the orchestra as the management would have liked. This will be Miss Farrar's only concert appearance with the orchestra this season. The numbers which she will sing have already been announced, Cherubino's song from "The Marriage of Figaro" and Elizabeth's prayer, from "Tannhaeuser."

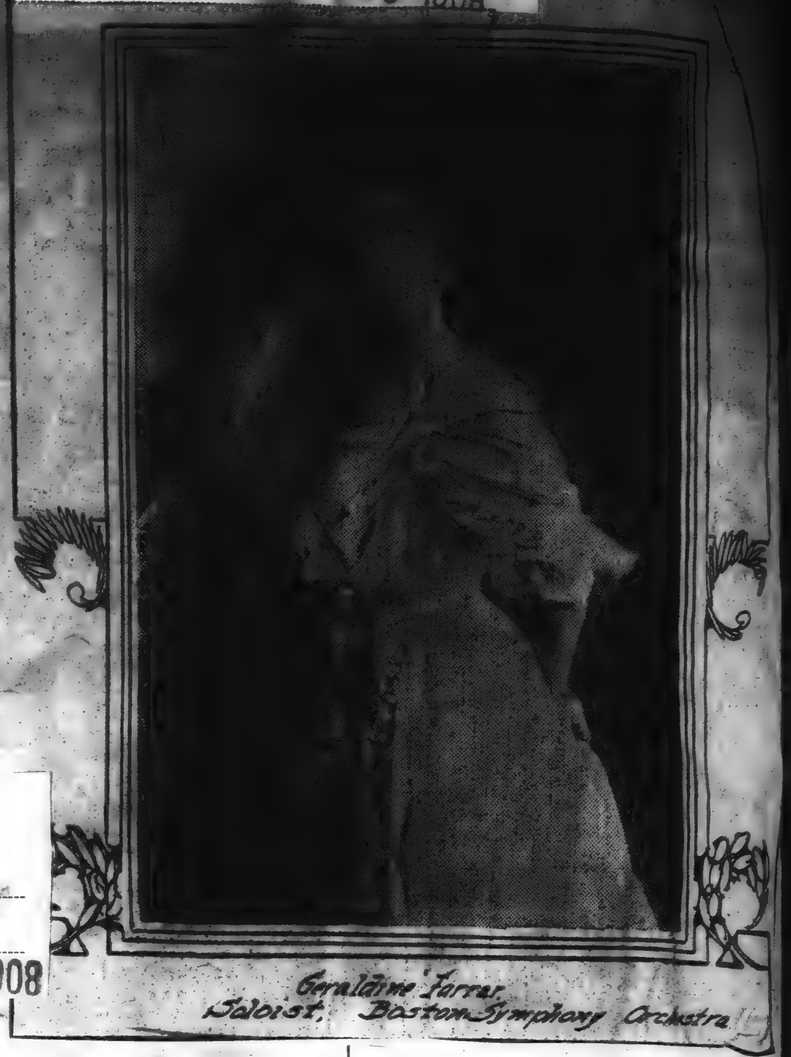
The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue upon a theme by J. A. Hiller and the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America a few weeks ago, played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Reger, as one of the most striking figures in modern music, is always heard with attention. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to audiences here, it having formed a frequent item upon the programmes of both orchestras. Following this concert Doctor Muck will make only one appearance more in Philadelphia, which will be on March 16, at the concluding concert of the season.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
FEB 16 1908

Theodorowicz Quartet Musicale.

The Theodorowicz String Quartet, made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Taylor, Highland Avenue Station, Chestnut Hill, tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The members of the quartet are: Julius Von Theodorowicz, first violin; Alexander Ribarsch, second violin; Alfred Gietzen, viola, and Joseph Keller, 'cello. Mrs. William M. White will be at the piano. There will be about 150 guests.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
POST
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
FEB 16 1908



Geraldine Farrar
Soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 16 1908

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the programme will be an attractive suite for orchestra, entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by the American composer, George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements, which are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895; the "Vagrom Ballad" bears the date of February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" was composed in the summer of 1904.

The other number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's extraordinarily brilliant Spanish "Caprice." In this the composer has taken a number of Spanish tunes and plays with them orchestrally with the skill of a superhumanly clever juggler: Tchaikowsky is quoted as writing to the composer that it is the most wonderful piece of orchestration he knows in the whole literature of music, and Dr. Muck, speaking of it the other day, says that it is simply stupendous. It is of extraordinary difficulty, and yet its general character is popular. The fifth and last concert of the season will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 17.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night, when she will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one more appearance in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert on Monday evening, March 16.

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 16 1908

PHILADELPHIA
FEB 16 1908

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the most gifted singer that this country has produced in many a day, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow night. It was at this concert that Madame Melba would have sung if she had returned to America this season, and it has been the purpose of the management to secure the best available singer to take her place. And it was only by a piece of luck that Miss Farrar could be engaged, so many are her duties in the Metropolitan Opera House, and although the Boston Symphony Orchestra had hoped that she would be its soloist at several of its concerts, this Philadelphia one will mark her only appearance with it during the present season. Miss Farrar will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra, but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

Geraldine Farrar will be heard tomorrow night at the Boston Symphony concert, and on Tuesday evening, in the opera. As soloist for the Boston orchestra to-morrow evening, she will have the place in the program originally intended for Melba. The Australian prima donna, however, has not left Melbourne, and so Miss Farrar, as the next most distinguished available singer, was engaged. She will sing Cherubino's song "Voi Che Sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Miller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a repetition of this important work should be welcomed by all music lovers, for it is impossible in the cause of music of this description to get more than the biggest of impressions from one or even two hearings. Reger is one of the most striking figures in modern music.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one [illegible] in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert on Monday evening, March 16.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 16 1908

Miss Farrar in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar, prettiest of Zerlina's in "Don Giovanni," is to be the soloist in the Boston Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. She will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Cherubino's song, "Voi che sapete," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

By way of instrumental prelude, the orchestra, under Dr. Muck's direction, will play Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, and the concert will close with "Till Eulenspiegel and His Merry Pranks." Both of these numbers are fairly within recollection of local concertgoers, having been recently played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mme. Melba was to have been the soloist at this concert. But she did not return to America this season, as she had anticipated, and the orchestra management fortunately were enabled to secure in her stead the most gifted of living American sopranos.

At his [illegible] recital in the Academy

TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 16 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON TUESDAY

The fourth and last one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the program will be an attractive suite for orchestra, entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by the American composer, George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements, which are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895, the "Vagrom Ballad" bears the date of February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" was composed in the summer of 1904.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 15 1908

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, February 19, at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, who will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which is to be played in response to many requests that have been sent to Dr. Muck, and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." After this concert Dr. Muck will come to Baltimore but once more, on March 18, for, as has already been announced, he will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season.

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D.C.
FEB 16 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and next to the last of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the program will be a suite for orchestra, "Symphonic Sketches" by the American composer George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements. The other number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's extraordinarily brilliant Spanish caprice. Tschaikowsky is quoted as writing to the composer that it is the most wonderful piece of orchestration he knows in the whole literature of music.

[147]

INQUIRER

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....
ess .....
FEB 16 1908

GERALDINE FARRAR.

GERALDINE FARRAR, among the most gifted singers of this country, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night. Madame Melba was originally scheduled for this concert, but when she decided not to return to America this season the Boston management endeavored to engage the best available artist to replace her. It was only by exceptional good fortune that Miss Farrar could be engaged, so many duties compelling her presence in the Metropolitan Opera House that it was found impossible to have her for as many concerts with the orchestra as the management would have liked. This will be Miss Farrar's only concert appearance with the orchestra this season. The numbers which she will sing have already been announced, Cherubino's song from "The Marriage of Figaro" and Elizabeth's prayer, from "Tannhaeuser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue upon a theme by J. A. Hiller and the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America a few weeks ago, played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Reger, as one of the most striking figures in modern music, is always heard with attention. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to audiences here, it having formed a frequent item upon the programmes of both orchestras. Following this concert Doctor Muck will make only one appearance more in Philadelphia, which will be on March 16, at the concluding concert of the season.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....
ddress .....

Theodorowicz Quartet Musicale.

The Theodorowicz String Quartet, made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Taylor, Highland Avenue Station, Chestnut Hill, tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The members of the quartet are: Julius Von Theodorowicz, first violin; Alexander Ribarsch, second violin; Alfred Gietzen, viola, and Joseph Keller, 'cello. Mrs. William M. White will be at the piano. There will be about 150 guests.

Geraldine Farrar,
Soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow night, when she will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one more appearance in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert on Monday evening, March 16.

m .....
ress .....
te .....

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the most gifted singer that this country has produced in many a day, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow night. It was at this concert that Madame Melba would have sung if she had returned to America this season, and it has been the purpose of the management to secure the best available singer to take her place. And it was only by a piece of luck that Miss Farrar could be engaged, so many are her duties in the Metropolitan Opera House, and although the Boston Symphony Orchestra had hoped that she would be its soloist at several of its concerts, this Philadelphia one will mark her only appearance with it during the present season. Miss Farrar will sing Cherubino's song "Voi che sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro" and Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhauser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra, but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

e First Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s .....

Miss Farrar in Concert.

Geraldine Farrar, prettiest of Zerlina's in "Don Giovanni," is to be the soloist in the Boston Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. She will sing Elisabeth's Prayer from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and Cherubino's song, "Voi che sapete," from Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

By way of instrumental prelude, the orchestra, under Dr. Muck's direction, wil play Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, and the concert will close with "Till Eulenspiegel and His Merry Pranks." Both of these numbers are fairly within recollection of local concertgoers, having been recently played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mme. Melba was to have been the soloist at this concert. But she did not return to America this season, as she had anticipated, and the orchestra management fortunately were enabled to secure in her stead the most gifted of living American sopranos.

At his [illegible] recital in the Academy

TIMES.

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the programme will be an attractive suite for orchestra, entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by the American composer, George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements, which are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895; the "Vagrom Ballad" bears the date of February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" was composed in the summer of 1904.

The other number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's extraordinarily brilliant Spanish "Caprice." In this the composer has taken a number of Spanish tunes and plays with them orchestrally with the skill of a superhumanly clever juggler: Tchaikowsky is quoted as writing to the composer that it is the most wonderful piece of orchestration he knows in the whole literature of music, and Dr. Muck, speaking of it the other day, says that it is simply stupendous. It is of extraordinary difficulty, and yet its general character is popular. The fifth and last concert of the season will be given Tuesday afternoon, March 17.

08

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and next to the last of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the program will be a suite for orchestra, "Symphonic Sketches" by the American composer George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements. The other number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's extraordinarily brilliant Spanish caprice. Tschaikowsky is quoted as writing to the composer that it is the most wonderful piece of orchestration he knows in the whole literature of music.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra Mo

Geraldine Farrar will be heard tomorrow night at the Boston Symphony concert, and on Tuesday evening in the opera. As soloist for the Boston orchestra to-morrow evening, she will have the place in the program originally intended for Melba. The Australian prima donna, however, has not left Melbourne, and so Miss Farrar, as the next most distinguished available singer, was engaged. She will sing Cherubino's song "Voi Che Sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser."

The two orchestral numbers will be Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Miller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The Reger Variations had their first performance in America in this city by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago, and a repetition of this important work should be welcomed by all music lovers, for it is impossible in the cause of music of this description to get more than the biggest of impressions from one or even two hearings. Reger is one of the most striking figures in modern music.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" needs no introduction to Philadelphia audiences, as it has been played here not only by the Philadelphia Orchestra, but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well.

After this concert Dr. Karl Muck will make but one more appearance in Philadelphia, which will be at the March concert on Monday evening, March 16.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON TUESDAY

The fourth and last one of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 18, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in E minor. The first number on the program will be an attractive suite for orchestra, entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by the American composer, George W. Chadwick. This suite is in four movements, which are entitled, respectively, "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and a "Vagrom Ballad." "Jubilee" and "Noel" were composed in December, 1895, the "Vagrom Ballad" bears the date of February, 1896, and "Hobgoblin" was composed in the summer of 1904.

ss .....
FEB 15 1908

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, February 19, at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, who will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which is to be played in response to many requests that have been sent to Dr. Muck, and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." After this concert Dr. Muck will come to Baltimore but once more, on March 18, for, as has already been announced, he will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season.

INQUIRER
rom
ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA
ate FEB 18 1908

MISS FARRAR IN CONCERT

She Sings at the Academy of Music With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The feature of the concert given at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the appearance as the assisting artist of Miss Geraldine Farrar, who was then heard for the first time in concert in this city. Her success was very great. In some respects she was seen at even better advantage than in opera, for her extremely attractive personality was more in evidence in the absence of a costume and of the need for sustaining a characterization, and the large audience present was mightily pleased.

Miss Farrar's selections could hardly have been more strongly contrasted. One was the lovely air from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," in which Cherubino, the amorous page, essays to describe the emotions which the sight and proximity of a pretty girl inspire in his breast. This is the well-known "Voi che sapete," and Miss Farrar sang it charmingly, with the utmost beauty of tone and refinement of method and with just the kind of piquancy which its effective expression requires. Her other number was Elizabeth's "Prayer," from "Tannhauser." This called for quite a different kind of treatment. It demanded breadth of method, dignity of feeling and dramatic power and it served in an impressive manner to illustrate Miss Farrar's versatility that she was not less satisfying in this selection than in the sauve, tender gently appealing aria of Mozart. Elizabeth is not a character with which she is commonly associated, but what she did last night is enough to make one wish to hear her in it. Always an admirable artist she is steadily extending the scope of her capacities and enhancing the value of her achievement, and in view of her remarkable progress during the past two seasons there is hardly anything within the range of her art to which she may not properly aspire.

The orchestral numbers were Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme," by Joseph Adam Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," but as both of these compositions have been heard here within the past few weeks it is enough to say now that the Boston Orchestra played them last night in a manner worthy of its reputation.

AMERICAN
ss PHILADELPHIA, PA
FEB 18 1908

MISS FARRAR HOLDS AUDIENCE CAPTIVE

Star Worshipers Hear Diva Sing at Boston Symphony Concert.

INTONATION IS PURE

Her Lyricism is Splendid and Recalls Are Enthusiastic.

FROM all quarters of the city a crowd of faithful music-lovers and ardent star-worshipers gathered at the Academy of Music last evening to hear Geraldine Farrar sing, and likewise, no doubt, to look upon her as she appeared in full evening dress. Her splendid lyricism took the audience captive; her dainty and engaging personality riveted their chains, and after each of the two numbers she sang recalls were multitudinous, spontaneous and enthusiastic.

The diva, who was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, was accompanied from New York by a group of admiring friends, including Signor Scotti, the famous barytone of the Metropolitan Opera.

Miss Farrar sang "Voiche Sapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with all the grace and charm and purity of intonation and elusive dramatic quality required in this most exacting of concert numbers. Her vocal method and dramatic style are all her own, and in a few years will set the fashion for budding geniuses of song. The same flawless vocalism and indefinable dramatic quality were notable in the singer's rendering of the lyrically monotonous prayer of Elisabeth, from "Tannhaeuser."

Before Miss Farrar's appearances the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, played Max Regar's variations of a Hiller theme and afterward Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel"—both familiar to local concertgoers.

PHILADELPHIA, PA
ress
FEB 18 1908
e

MISS FARRAR SINGS

Charming Soprano Wins New Triumph With Boston Orchestra.

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the fourth concert of the season last night, did not produce any orchestral novelties, there was offered a most delightful novelty in the appearance in concert for the first time in this city of Geraldine Farrar, one of the leading singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and one of the most gifted singers America has produced in recent years. Melba was to have been the assisting artiste at the concert, but her failure to return to America this season necessitated the engagement of the best available singer, and Miss Farrar was fortunately able to arrange this one appearance with the orchestra. The two orchestral numbers were Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The Reger ariation had their first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra some weeks ago. Admiration of Reger's variations depend on the amount of enuthusiastic appreciation one has for music of that style. While some of the variations are unquestionably exquisite in delicacy of themal development, others are equally conspicuous for blatant and shrill effects, particularly the last variation, which with the aid of the brasses, developed into a conglomerate turmoil of sound.

After the rush and bang of the last variation, the exquisite aria, "Voi che Lapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" sole over the audience like a benediction. Miss Farrar was in splendid voice, and delighted the audience, not only by her command of tonal art, but also by her girlish beauty. Her second selection, Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhaueser," afforded a better opportunity for vocal display. Miss Farrar's voice is particularly rich and full in the middle and lower registers, while her high notes are clear and entirely devoid of shrillness. That she made a profound impression was evidenced by the repeated recalls and demands for an encore.

The program closed with "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." In selecting Till Eulenspiegel as a subject for a musical setting, Strauss deserted the tragic and mystic muse and descended in to the realms of medieval romance. The mercurial Till is an immensely popular subject with German literary and musical writers. Jan Block has exploited Till in the titular role of an opera, and Reynicek has also made him the subject of operatic writing.

The work is in rondo form, with definite themes to typify the practical jokes. De Muck conducted in his usually effective style, bringing out all the beautiful effects possible from such a large body of artists. The violins were noticeably good in the beautiful singing qualities

PRESS
om
dress PHIA, PA
FEB 18 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Farrar as Soloist a Great Attraction. Muck Interprets Reger.

PROGRAM

Reger—Variations and Fugue on a Theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. First time at these concerts.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
Wagner—Elisabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser."
Soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar.
Richard Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Conductor.....Dr. Karl Muck

What went ye out for to hear? A Reger shaken in the wind Or a Farrar in all the Springtide of youth and vocal opulence? That was the question at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. An audience that crowded the auditorium to "capacity" apparently took the Reger variations good-naturedly and then enjoyed itself hugely with Farrar and her two numbers, Mozart and Wagner. The charming young primadonna had a great and deserved success and proved the feature of the evening.

As for the variations, their interpretation by Dr. Muck and the orchestra quite vindicated Pohlig, who produced them for the "first time in America" at the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts, though their third hearing did not remove the impression that a work that may be good fun for the orchestra, by reason of its complex musicianly character, may not necessarily mean much to the hearer The eleven variations and the conclusion were brilliantly given, but, save as they represent splendid exercises for a virtuoso orchestra, they make small appeal either to the imagination or to the ear as sheer cadences of beautiful sound. However, just as one could not deny that Pohlig and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a good account of themselves in these variations, so Muck and his men, for incisivenes and sprightliness and superb rhythmic and tonal effects, could not be beaten, and the final fugue went so splendidly that the audience was very warm in its applause, so that Muck was called out to receive its appreciation.

The Farrar numbers, however, caused the greatest rejoicing. In Mozart the soprano sang with a beautiful legato flow so expressively and so sweetly, with such delightful concert manners, as to win every one, and she was called out again and again. And then her charming rendering of Elizabeth's prayer was another vocal triumph, suffused with dramatic intent, which again brought down the house. After the vocal bonbons the concert closed with a very hard musical nut, indeed, but played brilliantly, the famous "Merry Pranks" of Richard [illegible] dubbed "Till Eulen-

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC LEDGER
om
PHILADELPHIA, PA
ress
FEB 18 1908
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar Sings Elizabeth's Prayer From "Tannhaeuser."

The modern spirit as it expresses itself in music held sway at the Boston Symphony concert last night. Only Mozart's limpid "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," was representative among the various numbers heard of the older school of musical writing, a school wherein the naive simplicity of thought ruthlessly entraps even the best of our contemporary singers into sharp definition of their scholastic limitations whenever they essay an expression of its ingenuous beauties.

The evening was without a symphony, strictly speaking. Dr. Karl Muck decided to offer Philadelphians an opportunity for that second thought which proverbially brings wisdom by a repetition of Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by J. A. Hiller," introduced to American audiences last December by Carl Pohlig. The intellectual domination of the Reger counterpoint, the occasional exhibition of a more sensuous appeal, as in the fifth variation, were last night found as highly impressive as on the previous occasion. The composer could not have asked for his work a more sympathetic and skilful interpretation. Nevertheless, there were many in the audience who turned with relief to the warmer, more human appeal of Till Eulenspiegel's mockeries, the wealth of invention, richness of poetic thought and surpassing orchestral command evinced by Richard Strauss proving doubly fascinating in juxtaposition to Reger's icy intellectuality.

The triumph of the evening was reserved for the soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose handsome personality was enhanced by a sartorial equipment elaborately recalling the famous portrait of the Countess Potocka. Her singing inspired the audience to an enthusiasm that expressed itself in a series of recalls which it would be futile to number. She sang Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser" with a skill and authority greater than that accorded the Mozart aria, the latter suffering from a hardening of the tonal quality in the effort to achieve the perfect purity and steadiness of intonation required. With youth, beauty, enthusiasm and opportunity at her command, there would seem to be no heights in her art which she may not attain.

rom BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
ddress FEB 18 1908
ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Night's Concert, With Geraldine Farrar as Soloist.

The special attraction at the fourth concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening, was the appearance as soloist of Geraldine Farrar, who was heard for the first time in Philadelphia as a concert singer. The fact that the young prima donna was the object of so much attention was in na sense a detraction from the artistic importance of the orchestra, but was, rather, a feature which added not a little to the interest and pleasure of the occasion.

Miss Farrar's appearance here with the Metropolitan Opera Company have established her as a favorite, and last night she materially increased her hold upon the admiration of many of our music lovers. Her pronounced beauty, of a soft brunette type, enhanced by an engenuous girlishness of manner, aided her in making a complete conquest of the audience. She appeared twice on the program, just before and immediately following the intermission, her numbers being "Voi Che Sopete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser." The Mozart aria was admirably sung, simply, sweetly and with perfect ease. The soft, velvety quality and purity of tone which give Miss Farrar's voice its rare beauty, were pleasingly in evidence. In the "Tannhauser" number she showed some of the qualifications of a dramatic singer, though her voice si as yet scarcely suited to heavy work. She sang with authority and in good style, however, putting much feeling and reverence into the beautiful music of the familiar prayer. Miss Farrar was received with marked enthusiasm, and after each of her selections was recalled several times.

The orchestra opened the program with Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme of J. A. Hiller," and closed it with Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranke," which were its only numbers. In these the spirit of modernism prevailed, and there is noth much doubt that the audience would have been better pleased had the first number given place to a symphony or at any rate to some composition of a more classic nature. The Reger music was first played in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra last December, and while it is no doubt worthy of repetition, it has not the strong appeal which makes one long to hear it again. It furnishes almost unlimited opportunities for an orchestra to display its tech-

[illegible] powers of virtuosity, however, and the Boston players last night seized upon every opportunity, with brilliant results, so that the interpretation was great in a musiciancly way. The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" has been played often enough to become familiar, and it is always welcome, and always will be when given as it was last evening, with wonderful verve, sprightliness and sympathy, and with amazing effects of orchestral coloring and contact. The Boston Symphony's closing concert of the season, which will mark Dr. Muck's last appearance in this country, will occur on Monday evening, March 16.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 16 1908

The [illegible] Orchestra [illegible] Lyric on next [illegible] ruary 19, at 8:15 o'clock. [illegible] Fritz Kreisler, who [illegible] Ysaya the position of foremost [illegible] in the world. Mr. Kreisler will play [illegible] Mendelssohn Concerto.

The orchestral numbers will [illegible] Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony [illegible] to be played in response to [illegible] that have been sent to Dr. [illegible] Richard Straus' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

After this concert Dr. Muck will [illegible] to Baltimore but once more on March [illegible] for, as already announced, he leaves [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra at [illegible] of this season. Tickets for the concert are on sale at Albaugh's, 100 [illegible] Charles street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PRESS
POST COLUMBUS.
e FEB 16 1908

From now on a good part of Dr. Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard union Monday evening, February 3, by the Deutscher verein of Harvard university. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om TOWN dress FEB 16 1908
e

The largest audience of the series filled Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening at the final symphony concert, drawn by the exceptionally fine programme and the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston orchestra. He was given a warm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's great "Pathetic" symphony, and his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work brought him a spontaneous and hearty ovation at its close.

Among those in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hope Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. L. Tou[illegible], Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold P. Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Cortiss, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copeland, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kent, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James [illegible], Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Clap[illegible], Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. [illegible] Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George [illegible] Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. [illegible] B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Foster, Miss Gyllenberg, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin W. Kerr, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P. Williams, Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Green, Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Miss Blanche Davis, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Borrance, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Andrew J. Comstock, Miss Clara Comstock, Mr. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis B. Robinson, Mrs. Dow, Miss Ida Sawin, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Percy Middleton, the Misses Hall, Mrs. W. Penn Mather, Miss Mather, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Miss Mary Mason, Miss Helen Mason, Mr. W. B. Chase, Mrs. Charles Sisson, the Misses Sisson, Mrs. Albert W. Smith, Mr. John Day, Mrs. Charles Philbrick, Mrs. Horace N. Williams, Hon. Walter B. Vincent, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert and Mrs. Benjamin G. Buttolph.

[148]

rom ..... ER.

ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA

ate FEB 1 - 1908

MISS FARRAR IN CONCERT

She Sings at the Academy of Music With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The feature of the concert given at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the appearance as the assisting artist of Miss Geraldine Farrar, who was then heard for the first time in concert in this city. Her success was very great. In some respects she was seen at even better advantage than in opera, for her extremely attractive personality was more in evidence in the absence of a costume and of the need for sustaining a characterization, and the large audience present was mightily pleased.

Miss Farrar's selections could hardly have been more strongly contrasted. One was the lovely air from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," in which Cherubino, the amorous page, essays to describe the emotions which the sight and proximity of a pretty girl inspire in his breast. This is the well-known "Voi che sapete," and Miss Farrar sang it charmingly, with the utmost beauty of tone and refinement of method and with just the kind of piquancy which its effective expression requires. Her other number was Elizabeth's "Prayer," from "Tannhauser." This called for quite a different kind of treatment. It demanded breadth of method, dignity of feeling and dramatic power and it served in an impressive manner to illustrate Miss Farrar's versatility that she was not less satisfying in this selection than in the sauve, tender gently appealing aria of Mozart. Elizabeth is not a character with which she is commonly associated, but what she did last night is enough to make one wish to hear her in it. Always an admirable artist she is steadily extending the scope of her capacities and enhancing the value of her achievement, and in view of her remarkable progress during the past two seasons there is hardly anything within the range of her art to which she may not properly aspire.

The orchestral numbers were Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme," by Joseph Adam Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," but as both of these compositions have been heard here within the past few weeks it is enough to say now that the Boston Orchestra played them last night in a manner worthy of its reputation.

n .....

ress .....

e .....

MISS FARRAR SINGS

Charming Soprano Wins New Triumph With Boston Orchestra.

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the fourth concert of the season last night, did not produce any orchestral novelties, there was offered a most delightful novelty in the appearance in concert for the first time in this city of Geraldine Farrar, one of the leading singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and one of the most gifted singers America has produced in recent years. Melba was to have been the assisting artiste at the concert, but her failure to return to America this season necessitated the engagement of the best available singer, and Miss Farrar was fortunately able to arrange this one appearance with the orchestra. The two orchestral numbers were Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The Reger ariation had their first performance in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra some weeks ago. Admiration of Reger's variations depend on the amount of enuthusiastic appreciation one has for music of that style. While some of the variations are unquestionably exquisite in delicacy of themal development, others are equally conspicuous for blatant and shrill effects, particularly the last variation, which with the aid of the brasses, developed into a conglomerate turmoil of sound.

After the rush and bang of the last variation, the exquisite aria, "Voi che Lapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" sole over the audience like a benediction. Miss Farrar was in splendid voice, and delighted the audience, not only by her command of tonal art, but also by her girlish beauty. Her second selection, Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhaueser," afforded a better opportunity for vocal display. Miss Farrar's voice is particularly rich and full in the middle and lower registers, while her high notes are clear and entirely devoid of shrillness. That she made a profound impression was evidenced by the repeated recalls and demands for an encore.

The program closed with "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." In selecting Till Eulenspiegel as a subject for a musical setting, Strauss deserted the tragic and mystic muse and descended in to the realms of medieval romance. The mercurial Till is an immensely popular subject with German literary and musical writers. Jan Block has exploited Till in the titular role of an opera, and Reynicek has also made him the subject of operatic writing.

The work is in roudo form, with definite themes to typify the practical jokes. De Muck conducted in his usually effective style, bringing out all the beautiful effects possible from such a large body of artists. The violins were noticeably good in the beautiful singiug qualities.

om .....

dress .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Farrar as Soloist a Great Attraction. Muck Interprets Reger.

PROGRAM

Reger—Variations and Fugue on a Theme by J. A. Hiller, Op. 100. First time at these concerts.
Mozart—Aria. "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
Wagner—Elisabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser."
Soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar.
Richard Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Op. 28.
Conductor.....Dr. Karl Muck

What went ye out for to hear? A Reger shaken in the wind Or a Farrar in all the Springtide of youth and vocal opulence? That was the question at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. An audience that crowded the auditorium to "capacity" apparently took the Reger variations good-naturedly and then enjoyed itself hugely with Farrar and her two numbers, Mozart and Wagner. The charming young primadonna had a great and deserved success and proved the feature of the evening.

As for the variations, their interpretation by Dr. Muck and the orchestra quite vindicated Pohlig, who produced them for the "first time in America" at the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts, though their third hearing did not remove the impression that a work that may be good fun for the orchestra, by reason of its complex musicianly character, may not necessarily mean much to the hearer The eleven variations and the conclusion were brilliantly given, but, save as they represent splendid exercises for a virtuoso orchestra, they make small appeal either to the imagination or to the ear as sheer cadences of beautiful sound. However, just as one could not deny that Pohlig and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a good account of themselves in these variations, so Muck and his men, for incisivenes and sprightliness and superb rhythmic and tonal effects, could not be beaten, and the final fugue went so splendidly that the audience was very warm in its applause, so that Muck was called out to receive its appreciation.

The Farrar numbers, however, caused the greatest rejoicing. In Mozart the soprano sang with a beautiful legato flow so expressively and so sweetly, with such delightful concert manners, as to win every one, and she was called out again and again. And then her charming rendering of Elizabeth's prayer was another vocal triumph, suffused with dramatic intent, which again brought down the house. After the vocal bonbons the concert closed with a very hard musical nut, indeed, but played brilliantly, the famous "Merry Pranks" of Richard III, by courtesy dubbed "Till Eulenspiegel's."

To-night Farrar appears as "Zerlina"

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

lress PHILADELPHIA, PA

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar Sings Elizabeth's Prayer From "Tannhaeuser."

The modern spirit as it expresses itself in music held sway at the Boston Symphony concert last night. Only Mozart's limpid "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro," was representative among the various numbers heard of the older school of musical writing, a school wherein the naive simplicity of thought ruthlessly entraps even the best of our contemporary singers into sharp definition of their scholastic limitations whenever they essay an expression of its ingenuous beauties.

The evening was without a symphony, strictly speaking. Dr. Karl Muck decided to offer Philadelphians an opportunity for that second thought which proverbially brings wisdom by a repetition of Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme by J. A. Hiller," introduced to American audiences last December by Carl Pohlig. The intellectual domination of the Reger counterpoint, the occasional exhibition of a more sensuous appeal, as in the fifth variation, were last night found as highly impressive as on the previous occasion. The composer could not have asked for his work a more sympathetic and skilful interpretation. Nevertheless, there were many in the audience who turned with relief to the warmer, more human appeal of Till Eulenspiegel's mockeries, the wealth of invention, richness of poetic thought and surpassing orchestral command evinced by Richard Strauss proving doubly fascinating in juxtaposition to Reger's icy intellectuality.

The triumph of the evening was reserved for the soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar, whose handsome personality was enhanced by a sartorial equipment elaborately recalling the famous portrait of the Countess Potocka. Her singing inspired the audience to an enthusiasm that expressed itself in a series of recalls which it would be futile to number. She sang Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhaeuser" with a skill and authority greater than that accorded the Mozart aria, the latter suffering from a hardening of the tonal quality in the effort to achieve the perfect purity and steadiness of intonation required. With youth, beauty, enthusiasm and opportunity at her command, there would seem to be no heights in her art which she may not attain.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Night's Concert, With Geraldine Farrar as Soloist.

The special attraction at the fourth concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening, was the appearance as soloist of Geraldine Farrar, who was heard for the first time in Philadelphia as a concert singer. The fact that the young prima donna was the object of so much attention was in na sense a detraction from the artistic importance of the orchestra, but was, rather, a feature which added not a little to the interest and pleasure of the occasion.

Miss Farrar's appearance here with the Metropolitan Opera Company have established her as a favorite, and last night she materially increased her hold upon the admiration of many of our music lovers. Her pronounced beauty, of a soft brunette type, enhanced by an engenuous girlishness of manner, aided her in making a complete conquest of the audience. She appeared twice on the program, just before and immediately following the intermission, her numbers being "Voi Che Sopete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhauser." The Mozart aria was admirably sung, simply, sweetly and with perfect ease. The soft, velvety quality and purity of tone which give Miss Farrar's voice its rare beauty, were pleasingly in evidence. In the "Tannhauser" number she showed some of the qualifications of a dramatic singer, though her voice si as yet scarcely suited to heavy work. She sang with authority and in good style, however, putting much feeling and reverence into the beautiful music of the familiar prayer. Miss Farrar was received with marked enthusiasm, and after each of her selections was recalled several times.

The orchestra opened the program with Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Theme of J. A. Hiller," and closed it with Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which were its only numbers. In these the spirit of modernism prevailed, and there is noth much doubt that the audience would have been better pleased had the first number given place to a symphony or at any rate to some composition of a more classic nature. The Reger music was first played in this country by the Philadelphia Orchestra last December, and while it is no doubt worthy of repetition, it has not the strong appeal which makes one long to hear it again. It furnishes almost unlimited opportunities for an orchestra to display its technical powers of virtuosity, however, and the Boston players last night seized upon every opportunity, with brilliant results, so that the interpretation was great in a musicianly way. The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" has been played often enough to become familiar, and it is always welcome, and always will be when given as it was last evening, with wonderful verve, sprightliness and sympathy, and with amazing effects of orchestral coloring and contact. The Boston Symphony's closing concert of the season, which will mark Dr. Muck's last appearance in this country, will occur on Monday evening, March 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

e .....

FEB 16 1908

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, February 19, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who disputes with Ysaya the position of foremost violinist in the world. Mr. Kreisler will play the Mendelssohn Concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which is to be played in response to many requests that have been sent to Dr. Muck, and Richard Straus' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

After this concert Dr. Muck will come to Baltimore but once more on March 10, for, as already announced, he leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season. Tickets for the concert are on sale at Albaugh's, 100 North Charles street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

e .....

1908

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as token of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little. The first of the formal farewells was given to him at the Harvard union Monday evening, February 3, by the Deutscher verein of Harvard university. Among those present were President Eliot, Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, Arthur Foote, Professor Spalding, Owen Wister and many of the leading musicians of Boston.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

lress .....

e .....

The largest audience of the series graced Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening at the final symphony concert, drawn by the exceptionally fine programme and the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston orchestra. He was given a warm reception when he took the stand for the opening number, Tschaikowsky's great "Pathetic" symphony, and his magnificent interpretation of this favorite work brought him a spontaneous and hearty ovation at its close.

Among those in the audience were: Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Charles Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. Edward F. Childs, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Mrs. Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. J. Lippitt Snow, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Fuller, Mr. Zephaniah Brown, Miss Brown, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Smith, Miss Ellen Sharpe, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Theodore P. Bogert, Miss Virginia Shepley, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Miss Hope Earle, Mrs. Charles C. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cady, Mr. Edward C. Bixby, Mr. Edward S. Aldrich, Mrs. William von Gottschalck, Mrs. Charles C. Binney, Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Tomoroff, Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Miss Annie S. Brown, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Mr. Harold P. Waterman, Mrs. Henry T. Brown, Mr. William Goodwin, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. Samuel S. Durfee, Miss Mary Talbot, Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Dr. Ellen M. Stone, Mrs. James A. Nealey, the Misses Vaughn, Mrs. F. F. Lamb, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Amy L. Willson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Miss Cowles, Mr. Arthur Symonds, Mrs. John R. Hess, Miss Clara L. Hess, Miss Louise C. Hoppin, Mrs. Walker, Mr. Howard Hoppin, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Lucian R. Copeland, Miss Mary Granger, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Joseph Day, Mr. Julian B. Herreshoff, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mrs. Brownell, Miss Mary Brownell, Mr. Joshua M. Addeman, Miss Vose, Miss Louise S. Kendall, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. James Field, Mr. S. H. Tingley, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Aldrich, Mrs. George H. Ames, the Misses Brownell, Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer, Mr. R. Austin Robertson, Miss Helen Robertson, Miss Sarah Potter, Miss Gyllenberg, Hon. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret K. Goodwin, Miss Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. George Capron, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Abby A. Tilton, Miss Laura G. Noyes, Mr. Walter H. Kimball, Mr. Martin W. Kern, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Miss Dudley, Dr. P. Williams, Mrs. Albert Greene, Miss Eleanor Green, Miss Amy Vernon, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Miss Blanche Davis, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Borrance, Mr. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Andrew J. Comstock, Miss Clara Comstock, Mr. Arthur L. Kelley, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mrs. Dow, Miss Ida Sawin, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Percy Middleton, the Misses Hall, Mrs. W. Penn Mather, Miss Mather, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Miss Mary Mason, Miss Helen Mason, Mr. W. B. Chase, Mrs. Charles Sisson, the Misses Sisson, Mrs. Albert W. Smith, Mr. John Day, Mrs. Charles Philbrick, Mrs. Horace N. Williams, Hon. Walter B. Vincent, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert and Mrs. Benjamin G. Buttolph.

ss .....

MISS FARRAR HOLDS AUDIENCE CAPTIVE

Star Worshipers Hear Diva Sing at Boston Symphony Concert.

INTONATION IS PURE

Her Lyricism is Splendid and Recalls Are Enthusiastic.

FROM all quarters of the city a crowd of faithful music-lovers and ardent star-worshipers gathered at the Academy of Music last evening to hear Geraldine Farrar sing, and likewise, no doubt, to look upon her as she appeared in full evening dress. Her splendid lyricism took the audience captive; her dainty and engaging personality riveted their chains, and after each of the two numbers she sang recalls were multitudinous, spontaneous and enthusiastic.

The diva, who was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, was accompanied from New York by a group of admiring friends, including Signor Scotti, the famous barytone of the Metropolitan Opera.

Miss Farrar sang "Voiche Sapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with all the grace and charm and purity of intonation and elusive dramatic quality required in this most exacting of concert numbers. Her vocal method and dramatic style are all her own, and in a few years will set the fashion for budding geniuses of song. The same flawless vocalism and indefinable dramatic quality were notable in the singer's rendering of the lyrically monotonous prayer of Elisabeth, from "Tannhaeuser."

Before Miss Farrar's appearances the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, played Max Regar's variations of a Hiller theme and afterward Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel"—both familiar to local concertgoers.

[148]

rom ..... TRIBUNE
ddress ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ate ..... FEB 18 1909

...of society and musi-
...willing way to
...Wednesday evening,
...Karl Muck, the conductor of
...Symphony Orchestra, was ...only a rousing reception but a
...godspeed," for it was the final
...of the series and the last in ...Dr. Muck will appear, as he is ...to return to Germany.
...audience were noted the follow-
...Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert
...ussell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Par-
...ons, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs.
...el W. Smith, Miss Emma Taft,
...Theodore Bogert, Mrs. George H.
...Miss Maria Corliss, Mr. and Mrs.
...B. Potter, Mrs. Samuel Ames,
...ery Bowen, Miss Edith Nichols,
...odore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B.
...Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Her-
...Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster,
...and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Miss
...Campbell, Mrs. Webster Knight,
...Adelaide Knight, Miss Agnes De
...Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Prof. and ...Courtney Langdon, Mrs. William
...Mr. Harold Waterman, Miss
...t E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Wal-
...George A. Freeman, Dr. W.
...Chapman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Dur-
...William von Gottschalk, Miss
...Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr.
...Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. George
...and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr.
...Louis E. Robinson, Miss Har-
...Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt,
...Misses Hunt, Miss Caroline Kelly,
...Louise Sweetland, Mrs. William
...Mather, Miss Mather, Mr. and Mrs.
...ert Steinert, Mrs. Percy Middleton,
...and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr.
...ward K. Hoppin, Mr. and Mrs. Walter
...Comstock, Mr. George A. Freeman,
...Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. Francis W.
...enter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mr.
...ry D. Sharpe, Rev. and Mrs. Augus-
...s M. Lord, Mrs. Edward L. John-
...on, Miss A. Lorraine Johnson, Mrs.
...George H. Ames, Mr. Harold P. Water-
...man, Mr. Theodore F. Bogert, Hon.
...oshua M. Addeman, Mr. and Mrs. Irving
...Irons, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and
...rs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Albert L.
...alder, Miss Amey Vernon, Mr. and Mrs.
...K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Ken-
...Goodwin, Pawtucket; Mrs. Eleaz...
...Homer.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE
...PROVIDENCE, R. I.
...FEB 16 1908

SOCIETY has had a strenuous week and if the old adage be true that "variety is the spice of life" then indeed the week just closed has given full emphasis to the familiar figure of speech. Music and art have had a larger place than in many months past, for often is Providence afforded the pleasure of two concerts of such prominence as the Boston Symphony and Madame Nordica in the space of one week.

Then, too, the shadow of St. Valentine fell across the social horizon and an atmosphere delightfully suggestive of the festal day was everywhere apparent and found fitting expression at many jolly valentine functions.

Other notable events of the week were the brilliant military ball in Churchill House and a reception at the Rhode Island Schol of Design last night to open an exhibition of portraits by Mr. Albert Sterner.

As if these events were not quite sufficient, ambitious hostesses planned at least a score of bridge parties with which to while away long afternoons.

To-day brings relaaxtion and rest alike to the pleasure weary and the toil weary, for which all will be grateful, and as one extreme follows another in social life, as in all things else, so the coming week will give ample opportunity for the cultivation of one's friends and the enlargement of one's thoughts.

Lovers of Ibsen and the classic drama will rejoice in the coming of Madame Nazimova in a brilliant repertoire, which will include "The Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabler" at the Providence Opera House the coming week.

...TRIBUNE
rom .....
ddress ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ate ..... FEB 16 1908

...the dinner recently given by the ...er Verein at Harvard University ...or of Dr. Karl Muck, the retir... ...nductor of the Boston Symphony ...a, Henry Lee Higginson, the ... of the orchestra, paid the follow-

...ndsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as re... ...the Boston Transcript:

...ding a conductor is like finding a ...heaven, only it's harder. The ...Emperor had lent us this gentle... ...r. Last year I again asked ...on and got a kind reply. This ...ashamed to repeat the request. ...tor of Germany has been very ...him and very kind to us. Neither ...r we feel it right to ask for more. ...wants to stay. He wanted to come. ...ss to say that we wish he could ...

...a great tribute to his art that he ...will play music which he dislikes ...as music which delights him. In ...a remarkable man. I wish ...could stay. Dr. Muck has been ...ver part of city and has been wel... ...thusiastically wherever he went. ...has not only satisfied us new ...us. We would like to ... was not 'Lebe wohl' but ...

...ow on a good part of Dr. Karl ...time in Boston will be spent ...ations given in his honor as tokens ...esteem in which the retiring con... ...of the Boston Symphony Orches... ...eld. The orchestra has never had ...uctor who has made so many ...s in so short a time, and this de... ...fact that Dr. Muck has gone ...very little.

From ..... SUN,
New York City.
Address .....
Date ..... FEB 21 1908.

THE ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON

NEW VARIATIONS AND FUGUE BY MAX REGER.

A Theme of Old Johann Adam Hiller Serves as a Fruitful Subject—Fritz Kreisler the Soloist—He Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto in Admirable Manner.

The fourth concert of the twenty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Carnegie Hall last night, was one presenting a programme of three compositions, yet it was not a short entertainment. The first number was a new set of variations by Max Reger, and this alone lasted pretty nearly three-quarters of an hour. It was succeeded by Beethoven's violin concerto, which also is not brief. The concert came to its end with the overture from Bach's suite in D. The audience was one of the largest of the season and it was generous in its applause.

Max Reger's new work is entitled in full "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller." It is Mr. Reger's 100th work and was first performed in Cologne on October 15 last. It had its first performance in this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on December 20. Reger informs us that his merry theme is by Johann Adam Hiller and dates from 1770. But he does not locate it.

However, Philip Hale, the indefatigable annotator of the Boston orchestra's programme books, would not be daunted by so small a matter, so he hunted through the works of Hiller till he found it, and he tells us that it is from the operetta "The Harvest Wreath," published in Leipsic in 1772.

At any rate it is a right good theme and would be pleasant to hear even if it were not done up into extraordinary and scholarly variations by one of the most gifted of living composers. There are eleven of these variations, after which comes the fugue. Descriptions of music of this kind, or perhaps of any kind, are unsatisfying and hence may be left to the programme note.

But it may not be amiss to record that the fugue is only a shadowy suggestion of Hiller's theme. The real connection between it and the substructure of the composition is made by reiterations in the counterpoint of fragments from the preceding variations. The true theme is brought back in some utterances of the trombones near the close.

But it is a magnificent fugue. Such a piece of technic would stamp any man as a musician of the first class. The plasticity of the writing, its spontaneity, its fluency, its melodic curve and its contrapuntal opulence are dazzling. And it takes a deal of playing, for it is a virtuoso outburst of the most brilliant sort. It serves as a fitting climax to variations which are not only ingenious and masterly, but which are for the most part extremely beautiful.

Some of them are rather in the nature of symphonic developments (with the original theme as a background) than true variations, but this method of expansion is often used in works of this kind. Reger has employed it with consummate skill.

His orchestration is uncommonly rich and its range of tonal tints is wide. Most of the devices of modern instrumentation are introduced, but with taste and judgment. The composition, as already noted, is long, but it would be difficult to select any one variation for excision or to point out any page which one would willingly see blotted out.

The performanc of this formidable piece of music was something to remember. Dr. Muck threw himself into its interpretation with glorious enthusiasm and filled it with vitality. The orchestra executed his will with splendor of tone, with immense vigor and with a noble sonority.

The solo player of the evening was Fritz Kreisler, and his reading of Beethoven's violin concerto will not soon depart from the memories of those who heard it. He had some difficulty with his first string and it was not always perfectly in tune, so that there were some passages in which the intonation was open to question. But he more than atoned for these by the great temperament of his interpretation.

There was a time, and it is not so long ago, when Kreisler had chiefly a seething furnace of temperament. He seemed not to be able to direct the flaming current of his emotion along purely artistic lines and the result was that while he played with a communicative fire he often offended taste.

But in recent years he has developed a beautiful affection for the chaste and reposeful classics of the early composers for the violin. Saturated with the pure music of Bach, Corelli, Vivaldi, Locatelli and other old masters, Kreisler now comes to the interpretation of modern writers with a style refined in the sweetest and most elevating atmosphere of his art. He reads Beethoven in the light of the golden age of violin composition and he is thereby led into the loftiest regions of musical interpretation.

His reading of the work last night was great in its breadth, its depth, its tenderness, its profound insight. Especially in the wonderful first movement did he rise to unwonted heights. He used his own cadenza and it proved to be a most musi-

...ween the second and last movements had ...permitted it there would have been ...demonstration after the slow movement. ...for that, too, was played with wonderful ...feeling and exquisitely beautiful tone.

Mr. Kreisler came to this country years ago as a juvenile prodigy. At that time he displayed a remarkable technic and little else. But he was one of the few prodigies who were not spoiled. He has more than fulfilled his promise. He seemed likely at that time to develop into a mere virtuoso, but while he has cultivated the technic to the top of its limit he has expanded into a sincere, noble and educating artist. In honoring him the public proves its own good judgment.

m ..... STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
ress .....
e .....

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Max Reger, der vielbesprochene, vieldiskutirte Leipziger Kontrapunktist, hat, als 34jähriger, sein op. 100 erreicht, ehe er in einem New Yorker Symphonie-Concert zum Wort gekommen ist. Der gestern Abend im Bostoner Symphonie-Concert errungene begeisterte Erfolg seines neuesten Werks wird ihn hoffentlich für New York entdecken. Er nennt sein op. 100 „Variationen und Fuge über ein lustiges Thema von Joh. Ad. Hiller", welcher bescheidene Singspielkomponist bekanntlich am Beginn der deutschen komischen Oper steht. Aus diesem harmlos liebenswürdigen Thema hat der große Kontrapunktist eine imposante symphonische Phantasie entwickelt, die sich wie eine geniale Improvisation mit unerhörten kontrapunktischen Wendungen und Einfällen ausnimmt. Es ist ein geistreiches Werk, ungeachtet der grandiosen Schlußfuge vorwiegend lyrischen Charakters, in den schnelleren Nummern durch heiteren Grundton, in den langsameren durch Grazie und Einfachheit wirkend. Blendende Technik und Raffinement sind darin allerdings ausgesprochener als Herz und Gemüth.

Die formale Erfindungskraft Regers zeigt sich in diesem Werk als eine einfach verblüffende, wie man sie seit Bach wohl nicht bewundern konnte. Er ist ein wahres kontrapunktisches Genie von unerhörter Vielseitigkeit und Feinheit, Gründlichkeit und Sorgfalt. Dafür spricht vor allem die chromatische, breit angelegte Meisterfuge am Schluß, als fünfstimmige Streichfuge beginnend, die sich in ihrem Lauf verdoppelt, um durch Heranziehung der Bläser über einen langen Orgelpunkt thurmhoch aufzuschießen. Max Reger hat als Orgelvirtuose begonnen, die Fuge macht den Eindruck, als ob er das Orchester als eine Riesenorgel behandle und deren Registerkombinationen genial verwandt.

Von den sonstigen Variationen möchten wir die pastoral-friedliche Nummer 11, die leidenschaftliche Nummer 10, den festlich bewegten Tarantell-Rythmus von Nummer 7, die kunstvolle Nummer 9 (mit dem deutlichen Anklang an Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel") und die überaus stimmungsvolle Nummer 6 hervorheben.

Dr. Karl Muck und sein Orchester haben uns mit der rastlosen Bewältigung dieser Riesenpartitur wohl die virtuoseste Leistung seit dem Antritt des genialen Dirigenten geschenkt. Muck schuf uns kongenial die unnachahmliche Plastik des Werks nach und setzte die kontrapunktistischen, rythmischen und harmonischen Feinheiten in das hellste Licht. Straffe Rythmik, virtuose Präcision, sinnliche Klangschönheit zeichneten die ganze Wiedergabe aus. Der Erfolg war ein überaus warmer, und der Dirigent mußte ein halbdutzendmal erscheinen und danken.

Der Solist des Konzertes, Herr Fritz Kreisler, hat uns durch die klassische Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Violin-Konzert einen seltenen Genuß bereitet und sich als der berufenste Bewerber um Joachim's Meistertitel erwiesen. Er spielte das Monumentalwerk mit schlichter Größe, mit weihevoller Bewegtheit und äußerst glücklicher Betonung des Sonnigen und Freudvollen. Die zarte, man möchte sagen, keusche Reinheit seiner melodischen Linienführung wirkten unvergleichlich. Seine stupende Technik, die namentlich in drei eigenen Kadenzen zu Tag trat, erschien wie unbeabsichtigt und selbstverständlich. Der große Künstler wurde enthusiastisch gefeiert und unzähligemale gerufen.

Den Schluß des Concerts bildete die Ouverture aus Bach's D-dur-Suite (gemeiniglich „Sutte No. 3" genannt). Mendelssohn hat dieses Werk 1838 im Leipziger Gewandhaus aufgeführt und dadurch den ganz in Vergessenheit gerathenen Leipziger Koloß sozusagen neu entdeckt. Unter dem ersten Eindruck der Aufführung dieser Suite schrieb Schumann damals folgende Worte: „Er wiegt uns sammt und sonder auf dem kleinen Finger". Wir möchten dasselbe von der Wiedergabe durch das Virtuosenorchester unter Dr. Muck sagen. H.

[149]

e New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
FEB 21 1908

Muck's Mastery Is Shown Again.

With every reappearance in New York at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Muck has grown in the estimation of local lovers of music. Again last night in Carnegie Hall he augmented the admiration in which he is held by a reading of Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller that must rank as one of the most remarkably brilliant orchestral performances ever heard in New York. That assertion is made with a full realization of what fine things have been achieved in Manhattan's realm of music within the last ten years and of how many great leaders have conducted here, with and without baton.

Reger's fiendishly clever composition, which had its first performance in New York, presents exceptional difficulties. They are not on the surface alone; they lie within the intricate contrapuntal meshes of the score. To expose clearly the woof of such an extremely complicated work requires the most searching insight, combined with a knowledge of orchestral technics and a command of the modern instrumental body such as great pianists have over the keyboard. Never before was Muck's orchestral virtuosoship proclaimed more eloquently than last night, and never was the sympathetic suppleness of the human instrument under his baton revealed more extraordinarily. With marvelous acuity the conductor penetrated into Reger's score and unraveled the musical tangle; with unerring clearness he threw the composer's amazing tonal tapestries upon the screen of the ear. Yet with all the attention he gave to beauty of tone, to dynamical balance, to rhythmical incisiveness and force, there was no rigidity, no monotony of tempo. The flow of nuance was as constant, as baffling, as exciting as the shifting tonalities of Reger's music. Not an opportunity for expressive phrasing escaped Muck's searching mind, and at the close of the fugue he worked up one of the most overpowering climaxes of sound ever heard in Carnegie Hall.

As to Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, by J. A. Hiller, the composer's opus 100, it is decidedly worth hearing again. Indeed, it is one of the most remarkable, one of the most interesting and absorbing works in absolute music found in modern orchestral literature. Highly modern music this, in that it is the outgrowth of the modern orchestra and the dynamic possibilities which that gigantic instrument allows. It is not modern however, in that the composer, instead of traveling along the road of Wagner, goes the way of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

Above all, Reger has absorbed the wonderful technique of Bach, has made himself master of it. His spirit, however, is of a different sort. There is not the religious exaltation of Bach in Reger's music, but the fever and intensity of the twentieth century. His astonishingly clever and constantly shifting modulations reflect an impish joy in surprises. Reger likes to puzzle his listeners and to joke with them. But with all his fondness for tricks and turns of tonal idiom he never grows inarticulate, never loses his sense of structure and outline.

Complaint may be made that Hiller's theme from the operetta "Der Aerndtekrantz," which Reger has woven into his eleven variations and fugue, now in its complete form, now in fragments, is trivial and unimportant. Yet it is a graceful, merry and piquant tune, and above all it is well adapted to the kind of treatment in which Reger is an expert. The composer makes use of other melodies of his own invention. At times the effect is that of extempore improvisation on the organ. There are strong contrasts not only in harmonies, in instrumentation, in rhythm, but in suggestion of mood.

Among the most impressive of the variations were No. 4, poco vivace in F major; No. 8, andante con moto in F sharp major, and No. 10, allegro appassionata in B minor. Variation No. 5 has a unique effect of instrumentation in that the string instruments are divided into two groups, one of which plays with sordine, the other without. The fugue is a tremendous piece of orchestral writing, in which finally a dumfounding climax of sound is worked up upon an organ point after an exceedingly eloquent preparatory ritardando. The effect is that of an organ bigger than any organ ever built, roaring its full-throated message to heaven in almost terrifying harmonies.

The rest of the programme comprised Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and Bach's suite in D major, No. 3. Reger's work hardly made an appropriate introduction to Beethoven's peacefully beautiful concerto. The effect would have been more satisfactory had the order been reversed. Yet Kreisler's exquisite art did not fail of appreciation. He was recalled many times by his enthusiastic auditors. The violinist gave a performance of the concerto distinguished by refinement of execution, beauty of tone and tenderness of feeling. Especially moving was his interpretation of the Larghetto. Muck and his orchestra gave a well-nigh perfect accompaniment.

NEW YORK HERALD,
n .....
New York City.
ress .....
FEB 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler, by playing of rare quality, made the Beethoven violin concerto the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. An audience that crowded the hall to the doors applauded the violinist with enthusiasm, especially after the cadenza of the first movement, which he made a wonder of brilliancy and yet thoroughly musical.

An orchestral novelty of the evening was Mr. Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, by J. A. Hiller," a work of tremendous length and ingenuity and not much else. Some persons regard Reger as one of the first of living composers. Others find him intolerably prolix and uninspired.

The new "Variations," which were first heard in Cologne last year, certainly offer nothing that at a first hearing, at all events, impresses one as notable, either in ideas of beauty or orchestral color. The original theme, said to be a melody by Johann Adam Hiller, who flourished at the close of the eighteenth century, is trivial to begin with, and nothing that the composer does with it in the course of these twelve mortally long variations makes it interesting.

Under Dr. Muck the orchestra did some wonderfully fine playing in the Reger "Variations" and strove hard to make something out of precious little. In the final movement, which is heavily scored for the brass and has a certain grandiose effect, it almost succeeded.

...Bach's overture from the D major suite ...to a ...

rom ..... TRIBUNE

ddress .....

ate .....

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A great gathering of society and musical people wended their willing way to Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening, where Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given not only a rousing reception but a genuine "Godspeed," for it was the final concert in the series and the last in which Dr. Muck will appear, as he is shortly to return to Germany.

In the audience were noted the following: Miss Louise Hoppin, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Miss Emma Taft, Mrs. Theodore Bogert, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mrs. Henry Bowen, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Herreshoff, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Miss Agnes De Wolf, Mrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Prof. and Mrs. Courtney Langdon, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. Harold Waterman, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Mr. Robert L. Walker, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mrs. Samuel Slater Dur-fee, Mrs. William von Gottschalk, Miss Etta Fraser, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Miss Harriett Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Miss Caroline Kelly, Miss Louise Sweetland, Mrs. William Penn Mather, Miss Mather, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Percy Middleton, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mr. Howard K. Hoppin, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mr. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Walter S. Ballou, Mrs. Francis W. Carpenter, Miss Mary Carpenter, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss A. Lorraine Johnson, Mrs. George H. Ames, Mr. Harold P. Waterman, Mr. Theodore F. Bogert, Hon. Joshua M. Addeman, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Miss Louise Claflin, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Miss Amey Vernon, Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Pawtucket; Mrs. Eleazer B. Homer.

...k, 18

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

...s .....

...

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

SOCIETY has had a strenuous week and if the old adage be true that "variety is the spice of life" then indeed the week just closed has given full emphasis to the familiar figure of speech. Music and art have had a larger place than in many months past, for not often is Providence afforded the pleasure of two concerts of such prominence as the Boston Symphony and Madame Nordica in the space of one week.

Then, too, the shadow of St. Valentine fell across the social horizon and an atmosphere delightfully suggestive of the festal day was everywhere apparent and found fitting expression at many jolly valentine functions.

Other notable events of the week were the brilliant military ball in Churchill House and a reception at the Rhode Island Schol of Design last night to open an exhibition of portraits by Mr. Albert Sterner.

As if these events were not quite sufficient, ambitious hostesses planned at least a score of bridge parties with which to while away long afternoons.

To-day brings relaaxtion and rest alike to the pleasure weary and the toil weary, for which all will be grateful, and as one extreme follows another in social life, as in all things else, so the coming week will give ample opportunity for the cultivation of one's friends and the enlargement of one's thoughts.

Lovers of Ibsen and the classic drama will rejoice in the coming of Madame Nazimova in a brilliant repertoire, which will include "The Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabler" at the Providence Opera House the coming week.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate ..... FEB 16 1902

WELL-DESERVED TRIBUTE.

At the dinner recently given by the Deutscher Verein at Harvard University in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston Transcript:

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe wohl' but 'Auf widersehn.'"

From now on a good part of Dr. Karl Muck's spare time in Boston will be spent at functions given in his honor as tokens of the esteem in which the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held. The orchestra has never had a conductor who has made so many friends in so short a time, and this despite the fact that Dr. Muck has gone into society very little.

From SUN,

New York City.

Address .....

Date .....

THE ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON

NEW VARIATIONS AND FUGUE BY MAX REGER.

A Theme of Old Johann Adam Hiller Serves as a Fruitful Subject—Fritz Kreisler the Soloist—He Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto in Admirable Manner.

The fourth concert of the twenty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Carnegie Hall last night, was one presenting a programme of three compositions, yet it was not a short entertainment. The first number was a new set of variations by Max Reger, and this alone lasted pretty nearly three-quarters of an hour. It was succeeded by Beethoven's violin concerto, which also is not brief. The concert came to its end with the overture from Bach's suite in D. The audience was one of the largest of the season and it was genérous in its applause.

Max Reger's new work is entitled in full "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller." It is Mr. Reger's 100th work and was first performed in Cologne on October 15 last. It had its first performance in this country at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on December 20. Reger informs us that his merry theme is by Johann Adam Hiller and dates from 1770. But he does not locate it.

However, Philip Hale, the indefatigable annotator of the Boston orchestra's programme books, would not be daunted by so small a matter, so he hunted through the works of Hiller till he found it, and he tells us that it is from the operetta "The Harvest Wreath," published in Leipsic in 1772.

At any rate it is a right good theme and would be pleasant to hear even if it were not done up into extraordinary and scholarly variations by one of the most gifted of living composers. There are eleven of these variations, after which comes the fugue. Descriptions of music of this kind, or perhaps of any kind, are unsatisfying and hence may be left to the programme note.

But it may not be amiss to record that the fugue is only a shadowy suggestion of Hiller's theme. The real connection between it and the substructure of the composition is made by reiterations in the counterpoint of fragments from the preceding variations. The true theme is brought back in some utterances of the trombones near the close.

But it is a magnificent fugue. Such a piece of technic would stamp any man as a musician of the first class. The plasticity of the writing, its spontaneity, its fluency, its melodic curve and its contrapuntal opulence are dazzling. And it takes a deal of playing, for it is a virtuoso outburst of the most brilliant sort. It serves as a fitting climax to variations which are not only ingenious and masterly, but which are for the most part extremely beautiful.

Some of them are rather in the nature of symphonic developments (with the original theme as a background) than true variations, but this method of expansion is often used in works of this kind. Reger has employed it with consummate skill.

His orchestration is uncommonly rich and its range of tonal tints is wide. Most of the devices of modern instrumentation are introduced, but with taste and judgment. The composition, as already noted, is long, but it would be difficult to select any one variation for excision or to point out any page which one would willingly see blotted out.

The performanc of this formidable piece of music was something to remember. Dr. Muck threw himself into its interpretation with glorious enthusiasm and filled it with vitality. The orchestra executed his will with splendor of tone, with immense vigor and with a noble sonority.

The solo player of the evening was Fritz Kreisler, and his reading of Beethoven's violin concerto will not soon depart from the memories of those who heard it. He had some difficulty with his first string and it was not always perfectly in tune, so that there were some passages in which the intonation was open to question. But he more than atoned for these by the great temperament of his interpretation.

There was a time, and it is not so long ago, when Kreisler had chiefly a seething furnace of temperament. He seemed not to be able to direct the flaming current of his emotion along purely artistic lines and the result was that while he played with a communicative fire he often offended taste.

But in recent years he has developed a beautiful affection for the chaste and reposeful classics of the early composers for the violin. Saturated with the pure music of Bach, Corelli, Vivaldi, Locatelli and other old masters, Kreisler now comes to the interpretation of modern writers with a style refined in the sweetest and most elevating atmosphere of his art. He reads Beethoven in the light of the golden age of violin composition and he is thereby led into the loftiest regions of musical interpretation.

His reading of the work last night was great in its breadth, its depth, its tenderness, its profound insight. Especially in the wonderful first movement did he rise to unwonted heights. He used his own cadenza and it proved to be a most musicianly piece of writing with a singularly appropriate treatment of the cantabile

...the atmosphere of the big bravura ... Beethoven. It was played superbly. The enthusiasm of the audience was spontaneous and prolonged. It was thoroughly deserved. Doubtless if the connection between the second and last movements had permitted it there would have been another demonstration after the slow movement, for that, too, was played with wonderful feeling and exquisitely beautiful tone.

Mr. Kreisler came to this country years ago as a juvenile prodigy. At that time he displayed a remarkable technic and little else. But he was one of the few prodigies who were not spoiled. He has more than fulfilled his promise. He seemed likely at that time to develop into a mere virtuoso, but while he has cultivated the technic to the top of its limit he has expanded into a sincere, noble and educating artist. In honoring him the public proves its own good judgment.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

m .....

New York City.

ress .....

e .....

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Max Reger, der vielbesprochene, vieldiskutirte Leipziger Kontrapunktist, hat, als 34jähriger, sein op. 100 erreicht, ehe er in einem New Yorker Symphonie-Concert zum Wort gekommen ist. Der gestern Abend im Bostoner Symphonie-Concert errungene begeisterte Erfolg seines neuesten Werks wird ihn hoffentlich für New York entdecken. Er nennt sein op. 100 „Variationen und Fuge über ein lustiges Thema von Joh. Ad. Hiller", welcher bescheidene Singspielkomponist bekanntlich am Beginn der deutschen komischen Oper steht. Aus diesem harmlos liebenswürdigen Thema hat der große Kontrapunktist eine imposante symphonische Phantasie entwickelt, die sich wie eine geniale Improvisation mit unerhörten kontrapunktischen Wendungen und Einfällen ausnimmt. Es ist ein geistreiches Werk, ungeachtet der grandiosen Schlußfuge vorwiegend lyrischen Charakters, in den schnelleren Nummern durch heiteren Grundton, in den langsameren durch Grazie und Einfachheit wirkend. Blendende Technik und Raffinement sind darin allerdings ausgesprochener als Herz und Gemüth.

Die formale Erfindungskraft Regers zeigt sich in diesem Werk als eine einfach verblüffende, wie man sie seit Bach wohl nicht bewundern konnte. Er ist ein wahres kontrapunktisches Genie von unerhörter Vielseitigkeit und Feinheit, Gründlichkeit und Sorgfalt. Dafür spricht vor allem die chromatische, breit angelegte Meisterfuge am Schluß, als fünfstimmige Streichfuge beginnend, die sich in ihrem Lauf verdoppelt, um durch Heranziehung der Bläser über einen langen Orgelpunkt thurmhoch aufzuschießen. Max Reger hat als Orgelvirtuose begonnen; die Fuge macht den Eindruck, als ob er das Orchester als eine Riesenorgel behandle und deren Registerkombinationen genial verwerthe.

Von den sonstigen Variationen möchten wir die pastoral-friedliche Nummer 11, die leidenschaftliche Nummer 10, den festlich bewegten Tarantell-Rythmus von Nummer 7, die kunstvolle Nummer 9 (mit dem deutlichen Anklang an Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel") und die überaus stimmungsvolle Nummer 6 hervorheben.

Dr. Karl Muck und sein Orchester haben uns mit der rastlosen Bewältigung dieser Riesenpartitur wohl die virtuoseste Leistung seit dem Antritt des genialen Dirigenten geschenkt. Muck schuf uns kongenial die unnachahmliche Plastik des Werks nach und setzte die kontrapunktistischen, rythmischen und harmonischen Feinheiten in das hellste Licht. Straffe Rythmik, virtuose Präcision, sinnliche Klangschönheit zeichneten die ganze Wiedergabe aus. Der Erfolg war ein überaus warmer, und der Dirigent mußte ein halbdutzendmal erscheinen und danken.

Der Solist des Konzertes, Herr Fritz Kreisler, hat uns durch die klassische Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Violin-Konzert einen seltenen Genuß bereitet und sich als der berufenste Bewerber um Joachim's Meistertitel erwiesen. Er spielte das Monumentalwerk mit schlichter Größe, mit weihevoller Bewegtheit und äußerst glücklicher Betonung des Sonnigen und Freudvollen. Die zarte, man möchte sagen, keusche Reinheit seiner melodischen Linienführung wirkten unvergleichlich. Seine stupende Technik, die namentlich in drei eigenen Kadenzen zu Tag trat, erschien wie unbeabsichtigt und selbstverständlich. Der große Künstler wurde enthusiastisch gefeiert und unzähligemale gerufen.

Den Schluß des Concerts bildete die Ouverture aus Bach's D-dur-Suite (gemeiniglich „Suite No. 3" genannt). Mendelssohn hat dieses Werk 1838 im Leipziger Gewandhaus aufgeführt und dadurch den ganz in Vergessenheit gerathenen Leipziger Koloß sozusagen neu entdeckt. Unter dem ersten Eindruck der Aufführung dieser Suite schrieb Schumann damals folgende Worte: „Er wiegt uns sammt und sonder auf dem kleinen Finger". Wir möchten dasselbe von der Wiedergabe durch das Virtuosenorchester unter Dr. Muck sagen.

H.

[149]

e New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

FEB 81 1902

Muck's Mastery Is Shown Again.

With every reappearance in New York at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Muck has grown in the estimation of local lovers of music. Again last night in Carnegie Hall he augmented the admiration in which he is held by a reading of Roger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by Hiller that must rank as one of the most remarkably brilliant orchestral performances ever heard in New York. That assertion is made with a full realization of what fine things have been achieved in Manhattan's realm of music within the last ten years and of how many great leaders have conducted here, with and without baton.

Reger's fiendishly clever composition, which had its first performance in New York, presents exceptional difficulties. They are not on the surface alone; they lie within the intricate contrapuntal meshes of the score. To expose clearly the woof of such an extremely complicated work requires the most searching insight, combined with a knowledge of orchestral technics and a command of the modern instrumental body such as great pianists have over the keyboard. Never before was Muck's orchestral virtuosoship proclaimed more eloquently than last night, and never was the sympathetic suppleness of the human instrument under his baton revealed more extraordinarily. With marvelous acuity the conductor penetrated into Reger's score and unraveled the musical tangle; with unerring clearness he threw the composer's amazing tonal tapestries upon the screen of the ear. Yet with all the attention he gave to beauty of tone, to dynamical balance, to rhythmical incisiveness and force, there was no rigidity, no monotony of tempo. The flow of nuance was as constant, as baffling, as exciting as the shifting tonalities of Reger's music. Not an opportunity for expressive phrasing escaped Muck's searching mind, and at the close of the fugue he worked up one of the most overpowering climaxes of sound ever heard in Carnegie Hall.

As to Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, by J. A. Hiller, the composer's opus 100, it is decidedly worth hearing again. Indeed, it is one of the most remarkable, one of the most interesting and absorbing works in absolute music found in modern orchestral literature. Highly modern music this, in that it is the outgrowth of the modern orchestra and the dynamic possibilities which that gigantic instrument allows. It is not modern however, in that the composer, instead of traveling along the road of Wagner, goes the way of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

Above all, Reger has absorbed the wonderful technique of Bach, has made himself master of it. His spirit, however, is of a different sort. There is not the religious exaltation of Bach in Reger's music, but the fever and intensity of the twentieth century. His astonishingly clever and constantly shifting modulations reflect an impish joy in surprises. Reger likes to puzzle his listeners and to joke with them. But with all his fondness for tricks and turns of tonal idiom he never grows inarticulate, never loses his sense of structure and outline.

Complaint may be made that Hiller's theme from the operetta "Der Aerndtekrantz," which Reger has woven into his eleven variations and fugue, now in its complete form, now in fragments, is trivial and unimportant. Yet it is a graceful, merry and piquant tune, and above all it is well adapted to the kind of treatment in which Reger is an expert. The composer makes use of other melodies of his own invention. At times the effect is that of extempore improvisation on the organ. There are strong contrasts not only in harmonies, in instrumentation, in rhythm, but in suggestion of mood.

Among the most impressive of the variations were No. 4, poco vivace in F major; No. 8, andante con moto in F sharp major, and No. 10, allegro appassionata in B minor. Variation No. 5 has a unique effect of instrumentation in that the string instruments are divided into two groups, one of which plays with sordine, the other without. The fugue is a tremendous piece of orchestral writing, in which finally a dumfounding climax of sound is worked up upon an organ point after an exceedingly eloquent preparatory ritardando. The effect is that of an organ bigger than any organ ever built, roaring its full-throated message to heaven in almost terrifying harmonies.

The rest of the programme comprised Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and Bach's suite in D major, No. 3. Reger's work hardly made an appropriate introduction to Beethoven's peacefully beautiful concerto. The effect would have been more satisfactory had the order been reversed. Yet Kreisler's exquisite art did not fail of appreciation. He was recalled many times by his enthusiastic auditors. The violinist gave a performance of the concerto distinguished by refinement of execution, beauty of tone and tenderness of feeling. Especially moving was his interpretation of the Larghetto. Muck and his orchestra gave a well-nigh perfect accompaniment.

n NEW YORK HERALD.

New York City.

ress .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler, by playing of rare quality, made the Beethoven violin concerto the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. An audience that crowded the hall to the doors applauded the violinist with enthusiasm, especially after the cadenza of the first movement, which he made a wonder of brilliancy and yet thoroughly musical.

An orchestral novelty of the evening was Mr. Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme, by J. A. Hiller," a work of tremendous length and ingenuity and not much else. Some persons regard Reger as one of the first of living composers. Others find him intolerably prolix and uninspired.

The new "Variations," which were first heard in Cologne last year, certainly offer nothing that at a first hearing, at all events, impresses one as notable, either in ideas of beauty or orchestral color. The original theme, said to be a melody by Johann Adam Hiller, who flourished at the close of the eighteenth century, is trivial to begin with, and nothing that the composer does with it in the course of these twelve mortally long variations makes it interesting.

Under Dr. Muck the orchestra did some wonderfully fine playing in the Reger "Variations" and strove hard to make something out of precious little. In the final movement, which is heavily scored for the brass and has a certain grandiose effect, it almost succeeded.

Bach's overture from the D major suite brought the concert to a close.

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 21 1908

ed:

BOSTON ORCHESTRA RETURNS.

A Splendid Set of Variations and Fugue by Max Reger Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck again returned to the exploitation of new music, and this time he has found something that compelled recognition as a production of extraordinary originality and strength. It is Max Reger's variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller; it is his latest important published work, and is numbered Op. 100. The rest of the programme was made up of Beethoven's violin concerto, played magnificently by Mr. Fritz Kreisler, and the overture from Bach's orchestral suite in D major.

Reger's variations are his only important orchestral composition that has been heard in New York. He has, indeed, written but one other, the Serenade for orchestra that occasioned some excitement in Germany about two or three years ago when it was first made known there. This new composition has been but four months before the public. Reger has devoted himself to chamber compositions, to sonatas, and other pieces for violin and piano, to songs, to choral works, and especially to pieces for the organ. Of these, some of the violin sonatas, a serenade for flute, violin, and viola, quartet movements, a few of the songs, and a choral cantata have been heard here, and they have met with general approbation.

Some of his music has aroused much dissent because of its extravagance, its complication. The orchestral serenade is one of these, and its scoring has been accused of thickness, muddiness, lack of balance and of all tonal beauty. If this accusation be true, this new set of variations must mark a considerable advance on the part of the composer in his treatment of the orchestra, for they are by no means the qualities that belong to it.

Reger is one of the youngest of the German composers. He is only 35 years old, but he has taken a path of his own that leads him—almost solitary—in a direction apart, on the one hand, from Strauss and his followers in Germany and Debussy and his in France on the other. He is a contrapuntist of great learning and power; he has been called the Bach of Bavaria, and the ardor of his advocates has caused the query to be propounded whether J. S. Bach should not be called the Reger of Saxony.

His latest composition, however, is calculated to still the voice of sarcasm. Reger is for putting new wine into old bottles. He has undertaken to vivify the old contrapuntal forms with ideas of the most modern provenance; to fill them with melody, fresh and vital, of to-day; with the adventurous harmonies that composers have won in new fields; with the instrumental and tonal effects of the modern orchestra. These variations are a most striking product of this aim and method.

They are, on the whole, too long; and in that, likewise, they are modern. There are eleven of them, besides the fugue, and there is something that is superfluous, something that has his recklessness and exaggeration, and that is not exempt from the reproach of dryness, that seems to have been manufactured by industry. But when these are taken from the account there remains some of the most interesting, delightful, ingratiating music that has been produced for a long time, music of true beauty, of fine and original inspiration, guided and governed by a remarkable technical skill.

The theme is from one of old Johann Adam Hiller's long-forgotten operettas, which Mr. Philip Hale, alone of all the annotators, has taken the trouble to identify. It is not differentiated from countless others of its time, square-cut yet melodiously pleasing. It serves Reger's purpose admirably. His imagination has run riot with it. The second, the eighth, and especially the eleventh variations, are pages of truly beautiful and eloquent music; and there are many passages through the others that are of seizing charm. The orchestration has not the sensuous richness that is expected in these days. It is often restrained and sober; but there is little in which a definite purpose and a clear understanding of the end to be attained are not evident.

The real crown and climax of this work is the final fugue, which is truly a colossal achievement in its way. There is unquestionably not another man now living who could have written it. There is little to be gained by describing the composer's methods, which include, it may be said, innumerable of the most recondite of the contrapuntist's devices. It need only be said that he has put an immense vitality into the form that he has adopted, that his instrumental treatment is of remarkable skill, and that the closing climax is one of the most impressive passages heard here from a new composer in years—the effect being of the two fugal themes carried forward together, while above them is the original theme of Hiller's tune imposingly blown by the trombones, and beneath them a sonorous and persistent organ point.

The performance of this composition was one of extraordinary finesse, richness and sonority and of the most careful and well-proportioned elaboration of detail. And the music is exceedingly difficult and needs perfection at every point to produce its effect. Dr. Muck conducted it with much ardor and with evidently full conviction of its value, and the orchestra seconded him at every point. There was very real enthusiasm on the part of the audience.

Mr. Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto with magnificent breadth and Olympian repose, and with pulsing warmth and eloquence of expression. It marked, perhaps, the highest point he has yet reached as an artist in his New York appearances. In the first and last movements he played cadenzas of his own, the first being one of uncommon originality, musically admirably in keeping, and disclosing some striking effects of imitation in double stepping which Mr. Kreisler made very telling. The audience gave full appreciation to this remarkable performance by recalling the player many times to the platform.

The noble overture to Bach's suite that closed the concert was played with sonority and buoyant vigor.

From ...

Address ... New York City.

Date ... FEB 21 1908

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The German music of an elder day could hardly have been contrasted more sharply with what is now issuing from the creative writers of that country than by the programme chosen by Dr. Karl Muck for last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. Bach and Beethoven were evoked to mark the limits of the art of music as practised in their respective periods, while Max Reger, now looked upon in Munich and elsewhere as the exponent of the newest German thought, was represented by his latest large work. It is not difficult to trace the development of Beethoven from Bach, but it would have been no easy matter to place one's finger upon any part of Reger's Variations and fugue as derived from either of them, except the fugue itself, which in clarity and ingenuity fairly took its place as a link in the chain whose older parts were forged by the masters. Reger has been conspicuous among latter day German composers for less than half a decade, and it now appears that his reputation, as gained by his earlier writings, no longer covers accurately his present scope and purpose. The Reger first talked of by the astonished commentators of his own city was a composer of extraordinary resource and dexterity in the weaving of orchestral voices—he is still that—but he was also called a devotee of dissonances so sinister and crushing as to be all but impossible for ears attuned to accepted ideals of harmonic beauty. Except for the fugue's massive and somewhat opaque finale, last night's novelty from Reger's pen was singularly free from what may be termed musical cruelties. There were bold and unwonted progressions, but there was no effort to stun and baffle by superposed chords that bore no perceptible relation to each other.

It was a pretty piece of irony for Herr Reger to select as the main theme for his variations a dainty but trite fragment from one of Hiller's forgotten operettas. Mr. Philip Hale has identified the air as belonging to "Der Aerndtekrans" (The Harvest Wreath), published in 1771. That this innocent theme could in itself have contained the germ of all that Reger seemed to draw from it can scarcely be admitted. There are, in fact, several other themes introduced in these brilliant and masterly variations, and the composer wandered far afield, more than once, from the rustic simplicity of his starting point. Through all this score, there is beauty, but it is oftener of a decorative than of an emotional sort. The Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave this new score a marvellously fine interpretation, and to this its cordial reception was doubtless in good part due.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto in the broad, sane way to which he has accustomed New York audiences, and he, too, won a rich reward of enthusiastic applause from the fine assemblage.

WORLD,

New York City.

FEB 21 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS SUPERBLY.

Kreisler, the Soloist, and Max Reger, the Feature of Delightful Concert.

From the revolutionary Debussy to the revolutionary and much-discussed Max Regar, whose new variations and theme on "a merry theme" from a "singspiel" of G. A. Hiller (1770), made the feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, was like a step from the indefinite to the definite, from mystic obscurity to daylight, from calculated eccentricity to spontaneous originality, from a perverted malarious fungoid atmosphere to one of health and artistic serenity.

Critical opinion halts between calling Max Regar the greatest living composer and one dowered with a fatal facility and little else. Though classed with Richard Strauss as a musical iconoclast, he appears to me to stand for the most legitimate development so far in modern music. He has more to say and says it with equal mastery of technique. If Strauss derives from Wagner since he forgot his Beethoven, Reger is the logical development of Bach and Beethoven without the intervention of Wagner at all.

The Hiller theme was a thread, woven with amazing ingenuity, on which to hang a series of thirteen tone pictures called variations, each instinct with life, melody, varied color, intense vitality, and consummate art in conception and expression. The final fugue, a marvellous example of musical skill, was Bach modernized and rounded out by every modern device in orchestral and thematic treatment, with a magnificent climax, which fairly thundered in power and intensity.

The playing of a work which I must consider the greatest of modern compositions was a bit of remarkable orchestral virtuosity, conducted with rare skill by Dr. Muck.

N. Y. EVG WORLD

FEB 21 1908

ed:

Only Three Numbers Make Up Boston Symphony's Programme

Yet Their Variety and Perfection of Performance Make Concert Enjoyable.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought the usual large audience to Carnegie Hall last evening to hear a programme consisting of only three numbers, which, however, possessed sufficient variety to make the concert most interesting. The novelty of the evening was Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by the eighteenth century Hiller—a simple little theme taken from one of the latter's operettas, and which Reger utilized frequently in its original form.

But around these phrases he weaves a most complicated harmonic structure, utilizing all the modern orchestral resources, of which he proved himself a master, and evolving a series of varied and charming episodes, whose character, nevertheless, was not entirely free from a certain sameness before the last of the eleven variations was reached.

With the fugue, starting with a theme quite different from the original one and of considerable length, the hearers figuratively "sat up" and listened in wonder to this magnificently complicated movement, which was played with a clarity and technical finish that one expects only from this superb orchestra.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler aroused deserved enthusiasm by his consummately skilful and poetic performance of the noble Beethoven Concerto, to which he brought great perfection of tone and a finished and confident technic. The tremendous difficulties of the cadenza in the first movement (which would have made the violinist to whom the concerto was dedicated by Beethoven open his eyes in wonder) were surmounted by Mr. Kreisler with delightful ease.

The concert closed with a movement from Bach's D major suite for orchestra, given a clear and inspired performance by the men from Boston.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

FEB 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GLORIOUS FORM

Kreisler Gives a Beethoven Concerto and New Reger Variations.

Under the inspiring and electrifying leadership of Dr. Muck, the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra excelled itself last night at Carnegie Hall.

The eminent conductor makes few concessions to the frivolous. His programme was, as usual, dignified and impressive. It opened with a series of new Variations by Max Reger, on a theme by J. A. Hiller, who flourished about a hundred and forty years ago.

According to the alert compiler of the analytical programme, this theme was taken from an air sung by a rustic maid in an operetta of Hiller's, entitled "The Harvest Wreath." The eleven Variations of Max Reger are always musicianly, ingenious and fanciful. The orchestration is masterly, and the interpretation of the whole work by the Bostonian artists was in every way remarkable.

The composer, who is comparatively young, has many admirers and an equally large number of adversaries in Germany. By some he is regarded as one of the most gifted of living musicians.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening, played Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major (op. 61) with all his accustomed refinement, brilliancy of tone and elegance. He reminds one often, in his style, of Sarasate.

The Overture from Bach's Suite in D major brought the concert to a close.

A large audience applauded the famous orchestra, the distinguished soloist and the conductor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ... INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Date ... FEB 1[illegible]

Harvard Pays Tribute to Director Muck

At the dinner recently given by the Leutscher Verein at Harvard University in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston Transcript:

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not Lebe Wohl

---

EVENING POST,

New York City.

FEB 19 1908

Fritz Kreisler in Brooklyn.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the concert to be given by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, on Friday evening. He will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." The orchestral numbers are MacDowell's Autumn Suite, Bizet's overture "Patrie" and Goldmark's overture "In the Spring."

STAR

WASHINGTON D. C.

FEB 19 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kreisler the Soloist, and Chadwick's Suite the Chief Number.

Fritz Kreisler was the soloist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at the New National, before the largest audience that has attended any of the performances except that at which Paderewski played. This was Mr. Kreisler's second appearance in Washington this year, and he repeated the triumph of his former visit, his playing of the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, opus 64, being marked by a brilliance and magnetic appeal that won him great applause. It was necessary for Mr. Kreisler to return twice to the stage at the conclusion of the concerto to bow his recognition of the audience's appreciation.

The excellence of his work was especially marked in the brilliant solo cadenza of the first movement, culminating in a series of arpeggios, and in the heavily accented melody in the middle of the andante.

In many ways the most important number of the program was the suite of symphonic sketches, in four movements, by George Whitfield Chadwick, who shares with Whistler the honor of being the whole artistic output of utilitarian Lowell, Mass. With the profound mastery of the composer's art found in the work, there is yet a lightness of touch, even a spirit of badinage, a rollicking carelessness, apparent, which lends to the suite an unusual charm, though in no way impairing its position among the American masterpieces of music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's capriccio on Spanish airs, in five movements, closed the program. This included two serenades with variations, a languorous gipsy song and an intoxicating fandango, which grew more and more furious until it was suddenly changed into the serenade of the first movement.

The next and last concert of the orchestra will be given March 17.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS

BALTIMORE, MD

FEB 19 1908

At his New York concert on February 22 Dr. Muck is to produce an orchestral suite by George W. Chadwick, the director of the New England Conservatory of Music. The composition is entitled "Symphonic Sketches" [illegible] "Folly," "Hobgoblin" and "Vagabond Ballad." The scheme certainly presents broad contrasts, which should be fruitful.

[150]

TIMES,

New York City.

FEB 01 1909

ed:

BOSTON ORCHESTRA RETURNS.

A Splendid Set of Variations and Fugue by Max Reger Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck again returned to the exploitation of new music, and this time he has found something that compelled recognition as a production of extraordinary originality and strength. It is Max Reger's variations and Fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller; it is his latest important published work, and is numbered Op. 100. The rest of the programme was made up of Beethoven's violin concerto, played magnificently by Mr. Fritz Kreisler, and the overture from Bach's orchestral suite in D major.

Reger's variations are his only important orchestral composition that has been heard in New York. He has, indeed, written but one other, the Serenade for orchestra that occasioned some excitement in Germany about two or three years ago when it was first made known there. This new composition has been but four months before the public. Reger has devoted himself to chamber compositions, to sonatas, and other pieces for violin and piano, to songs, to choral works, and especially to pieces for the organ. Of these, some of the violin sonatas, a serenade for flute, violin, and viola, quartet movements, a few of the songs, and a choral cantata have been heard here, and they have met with general approbation.

Some of his music has aroused much dissent because of its extravagance, its complication. The orchestral serenade is one of these, and its scoring has been accused of thickness, muddiness, lack of balance and of all tonal beauty. If this accusation be true, this new set of variations must mark a considerable advance on the part of the composer in his treatment of the orchestra, for they are by no means the qualities that belong to it.

Reger is one of the youngest of the German composers. He is only 35 years old, but he has taken a path of his own that leads him—almost solitary—in a direction apart, on the one hand, from Strauss and his followers in Germany and Debussy and his in France on the other. He is a contrapuntist of great learning and power; he has been called the Bach of Bavaria, and the ardor of his advocates has caused the query to be propounded whether J. S. Bach should not be called the Reger of Saxony.

His latest composition, however, is calculated to still the voice of sarcasm. Reger is for putting new wine into old bottles. He has undertaken to vivify the old contrapuntal forms with ideas of the most modern provenance; to fill them with melody, fresh and vital, of to-day; with the adventurous harmonies that composers have won in new fields; with the instrumental and tonal effects of the modern orchestra. These variations are a most striking product of this aim and method.

They are, on the whole, too long; and in that, likewise, they are modern. There are eleven of them, besides the fugue, and there is something that is superfluous, something that has his recklessness and exaggeration, and that is not exempt from the reproach of dryness, that seems to have been manufactured by industry. But when these are taken from the account there remains some of the most interesting, delightful, ingratiating music that has been produced for a long time, music of true beauty, of fine and original inspiration, guided and governed by a remarkable technical skill.

The theme is from one of old Johann Adam Hiller's long-forgotten operettas, which Mr. Philip Hale, alone of all the annotators, has taken the trouble to identify. It is not differentiated from countless others of its time, square-cut yet melodiously pleasing. It serves Reger's purpose admirably. His imagination has run riot with it. The second, the eighth, and especially the eleventh variations, are pages of truly beautiful and eloquent music; and there are many passages through the others that are of seizing charm. The orchestration has not the sensuous richness that is expected in these days. It is often restrained and sober; but there is little in which a definite purpose and a clear understanding of the end to be attained are not evident.

The real crown and climax of this work is the final fugue, which is truly a colossal achievement in its way. There is unquestionably not another man now living who could have written it. There is little to be gained by describing the composer's methods, which include, it may be said, innumerable of the most recondite of the contrapuntist's devices. It need only be said that he has put an immense vitality into the form that he has adopted, that his instrumental treatment is of remarkable skill, and that the closing climax is one of the most impressive passages heard here from a new composer in years—the effect being of the two fugal themes carried forward together, while above them is the original theme of Hiller's tune imposingly blown by the trombones, and beneath them a sonorous and persistent organ point.

The performance of this composition was one of extraordinary finesse, richness and sonority and of the most careful and well-proportioned elaboration of detail. And the music is exceedingly difficult and needs perfection at every point to produce its effect. Dr. Muck conducted it with much ardor and with evidently full conviction of its value, and the orchestra seconded him at every point. There was very real enthusiasm on the part of the audience.

Mr. Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto with magnificent breadth and Olympian repose, and with pulsing warmth and eloquence of expression. It marked, perhaps, the highest point he has yet reached as an artist in his New York appearances. In the first and last movements he played cadenzas of his own, the first being one of uncommon originality, musically admirably in keeping, and disclosing some striking effects of imitation in double stepping which Mr. Kreisler made very telling. The audience gave full appreciation to this remarkable performance by recalling the player many times to the platform.

The noble overture to Bach's suite that closed the concert was played with sonority and buoyant vigor.

From ... New York City.

Address ...

Date DEC 21 1908

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The German music of an elder day could hardly have been contrasted more sharply with what is now issuing from the creative writers of that country than by the programme chosen by Dr. Karl Muck for last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall. Bach and Beethoven were evoked to mark the limits of the art of music as practised in their respective periods, while Max Reger, now looked upon in Munich and elsewhere as the exponent of the newest German thought, was represented by his latest large work. It is not difficult to trace the development of Beethoven from Bach, but it would have been no easy matter to place one's finger upon any part of Reger's Variations and fugue as derived from either of them, except the fugue itself, which in clarity and ingenuity fairly took its place as a link in the chain whose older parts were forged by the masters. Reger has been conspicuous among latter day German composers for less than half a decade, and it now appears that his reputation, as gained by his earlier writings, no longer covers accurately his present scope and purpose. The Reger first talked of by the astonished commentators of his own city was a composer of extraordinary resource and dexterity in the weaving of orchestral voices—he is still that—but he was also called a devotee of dissonances so sinister and crushing as to be all but impossible for ears attuned to accepted ideals of harmonic beauty. Except for the fugue's massive and somewhat opaque finale, last night's novelty from Reger's pen was singularly free from what may be termed musical cruelties. There were bold and unwonted progressions, but there was no effort to stun and baffle by superposed chords that bore no perceptible relation to each other.

It was a pretty piece of irony for Herr Reger to select as the main theme for his variations a dainty but trite fragment from one of Hiller's forgotten operettas. Mr. Philip Hale has identified the air as belonging to "Der Aerndtekranz" (The Harvest Wreath), published in 1771. That this innocent theme could in itself have contained the germ of all that Reger seemed to draw from it can scarcely be admitted. There are, in fact, several other themes introduced in these brilliant and masterly variations, and the composer wandered far afield, more than once, from the rustic simplicity of his starting point. Through all this score, there is beauty, but it is oftener of a decorative than of an emotional sort. The Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave this new score a marvellously fine interpretation, and to this its cordial reception was doubtless in good part due.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto in the broad, sane way to which he has accustomed New York audiences, and he, too, won a rich reward of enthusiastic applause from the fine assemblage.

WORLD,

ss New York City.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS SUPERBLY.

Kreisler, the Soloist, and Max Reger, the Feature of Delightful Concert.

From the revolutionary Debussy to the revolutionary and much-discussed Max Regar, whose new variations and theme on "a merry theme" from a "singspiel" of G. A. Hiller (1770), made the feature of last night's Boston Symphony concert, at Carnegie Hall, was like a step from the indefinite to the definite, from mystic obscurity to daylight, from calculated eccentricity to spontaneous originality, from a perverted malarious fungoid atmosphere to one of health and artistic serenity.

Critical opinion halts between calling Max Regar the greatest living composer and one dowered with a fatal facility and little else. Though classed with Richard Strauss as a musical iconoclast, he appears to me to stand for the most legitimate development so far in modern music. He has more to say and says it with equal mastery of technique. If Strauss derives from Wagner since he forgot his Beethoven, Reger is the logical development of Bach and Beethoven without the intervention of Wagner at all.

The Hiller theme was a thread, woven with amazing ingenuity, on which to hang a series of thirteen tone pictures called variations, each instinct with life, melody, varied color, intense vitality, and consummate art in conception and expression. The final fugue, a marvellous example of musical skill, was Bach modernized and rounded out by every modern device in orchestral and thematic treatment, with a magnificent climax, which fairly thundered in power and intensity.

The playing of a work which I must consider the greatest of modern compositions was a bit of remarkable orchestral virtuosity, conducted with rare skill by Dr. Muck.

ed:

Only Three Numbers Make Up Boston Symphony's Programme

Yet Their Variety and Perfection of Performance Make Concert Enjoyable.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought the usual large audience to Carnegie Hall last evening to hear a programme consisting of only three numbers, which, however, possessed sufficient variety to make the concert most interesting. The novelty of the evening was Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by the eighteenth century Hiller—a simple little theme taken from one of the latter's operettas, and which Reger utilized frequently in its original form.

But around these phrases he weaves a most complicated harmonic structure, utilizing all the modern orchestral resources, of which he proved himself a master, and evolving a series of varied and charming episodes, whose character, nevertheless, was not entirely free from a certain sameness before the last of the eleven variations was reached. With the fugue, starting with a theme quite different from the original one and of considerable length, the hearers figuratively "sat up" and listened in wonder to this magnificently complicated movement, which was played with a clarity and technical finish that one expects only from this superb orchestra.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler aroused deserved enthusiasm by his consummately skilful and poetic performance of the noble Beethoven Concerto, to which he brought great perfection of tone and a finished and confident technic. The tremendous difficulties of the cadenza in the first movement (which would have made the violinist to whom the concerto was dedicated by Beethoven open his eyes in wonder) were surmounted by Mr. Kreisler with delightful ease.

The concert closed with a movement from Bach's D major suite for orchestra, given a clear and inspired performance by the men from Boston.

m EVENING POST,

ress New York City.

e ...

Fritz Kreisler in Brooklyn.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the concert to be given by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, on Friday evening. He will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." The orchestral numbers are MacDowell's Autumn Suite, Bizet's overture "Patrie," and Goldmark's overture "In the Spring."

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ss New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GLORIOUS FORM

Kreisler Gives a Beethoven Concerto and New Reger Variations.

Under the inspiring and electrifying leadership of Dr. Muck, the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra excelled itself last night at Carnegie Hall.

The eminent conductor makes few concessions to the frivolous. His programme was, as usual, dignified and impressive. It opened with a series of new Variations by Max Reger, on a theme by J. A. Hiller, who flourished about a hundred and forty years ago.

According to the alert compiler of the analytical programme, this theme was taken from an air sung by a rustic maid in an operetta of Hiller's, entitled "The Harvest Wreath." The eleven Variations of Max Reger are always musicianly, ingenious and fanciful. The orchestration is masterly, and the interpretation of the whole work by the Bostonian artists was in every way remarkable.

The composer, who is comparatively young, has many admirers and an equally large number of adversaries in Germany. By some he is regarded as one of the most gifted of living musicians.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening, played Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major (op. 61) with all his accustomed refinement, brilliancy of tone and elegance. He reminds one often, in his style, of Sarasate.

The Overture from Bach's Suite in D major brought the concert to a close.

A large audience applauded the famous orchestra, the distinguished soloist and the conductor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Kreisler the Soloist, and Chadwick's Suite the Chief Number.

Fritz Kreisler was the soloist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at the New National, before the largest audience that has attended any of the performances except that at which Paderewski played. This was Mr. Kreisler's second appearance in Washington this year, and he repeated the triumph of his former visit, his playing of the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, opus 64, being marked by a brilliance and magnetic appeal that won him great applause. It was necessary for Mr. Kreisler to return twice to the stage at the conclusion of the concerto to bow his recognition of the audience's appreciation.

The excellence of his work was especially marked in the brilliant solo cadenza of the first movement, culminating in a series of arpeggios, and in the heavily accented melody in the middle of the andante.

In many ways the most important number of the program was the suite of symphonic sketches, in four movements, by George Whitfield Chadwick, who shares with Whistler the honor of being the whole artistic output of utilitarian Lowell, Mass. With the profound mastery of the composer's art found in the work, there is yet a lightness of touch, even a spirit of badinage, a rollicking carelessness, apparent, which lends to the suite an unusual charm, though in no way impairing its position among the American masterpieces of music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's capriccio on Spanish airs, in five movements, closed the program. This included two serenades, with variations, a languorous gipsy song and an intoxicating fandango, which grew more and more furious until it was suddenly changed into the serenade of the first movement.

The next and last concert of the orchestra will be given March 17.

Harvard Pays Tribute to Director Muck

At the dinner recently given by the Leutscher Verein at Harvard University in honor of Dr. Karl Muck, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, paid the following handsome tribute to Dr. Muck, as reported in the Boston Transcript:

"Finding a conductor is like finding a road to heaven, only it's harder. The German Emperor had lent us this gentleman for a year. Last year I again asked for this favor and got a kind reply. This year I am ashamed to repeat the request. The Emperor of Germany has been very kind to him and very kind to us. Neither he nor we feel it right to ask for more. He wants to stay. He wanted to come. Needless to say that we wish he could stay.

"It is a great tribute to his art that he can and will play music which he dislikes as well as music which delights him. In this he is a remarkable man. I wish that he could stay. Dr. Muck has been in every sort of city and has been welcomed enthusiastically wherever he went. Dr. Muck has not only satisfied us here, but has educated us. We would like to be sure that this was not 'Lebe Wohl' but 'Auf Wiedersehn.'

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...rk,

...s ...

At his New York concert on February 22 Dr. Muck is to produce an orchestral suite by George W. Chadwick, the director of the New England Conservatory of Music. The composition is entitled "Symphonic Sketches"—"Noel," "Jubilee," "Hobgoblin" and "Vagrom Ballad." The scheme certainly presents broad contrasts, which should be fruitful.

[150]

...ress ...
...te ...
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 20 1908

Music.

The Fourth Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Herr Kreisler As Soloist.

Dr. Muck presented the following programme:

Beethoven—
Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d'allegro.
Thunder-storm; Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherds' song; gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—
Concerto in E minor for violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo. Allegro molto vivace.

Richard Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

The great conductor offered us no new material, but he endowed the old and familiar with such volumes of new significance, and such varieties of hitherto latent beauty, that one felt that even the "Pastoral" symphony was virtually a new acquaintance. This symphony has probably never been as well played as it was last evening, and for good and sufficient reasons—viz., the Boston orchestral personnel is unique, Dr. Muck is an ideal conductor and our Lyric responds and inspires as does no other music hall in the country. Add to these favorable conditions the influence of a large and sympathetic audience, and we have adequate reasons for keen attitude and high accomplishments. From the beginning of the "Pastoral" to the end of "Till Eulenspiegel" we had the highest possible grade of virtuosity, but it was always subject to musical sense. There were no illogical exhibitions of facility.

Herr Kreisler is a great artist, the Mendelssohn concerto is beautiful, and Dr. Muck's accompaniment was a marvel of discretion and sympathetic impulse; but for some reason the result was not entirely satisfying. We are not instituting a comparison between Mr. Kreisler and any contemporaneous fiddler, but rather between Mr. Kreisler's performance of last evening and his presentation of the Beethoven concerto three years ago, also with the Boston Orchestra. His tone is less sensuous (may be attributable to the inroads of wear and tear on the responsiveness of his instrument), and his attitude less reverential than we we had fancied it.

Dr. Muck infused unwonted life pulsations into Beethoven's "Pastoral," accompanied the Mendelssohn concerto marvelously, and then out-juggled the master necromancer himself. Strauss doubtless selected those "Merry Pranks" for musical illustration, because this subject would give him absolutely free hand in the use of themes and instruments. He has used them in bewilderingly ingenious ways, but Dr. Muck last evening developed a transparency of which the composer has had no practical experience, for he has no Boston Orchestra and is no Dr. Muck.

O. B. B.

...ress ...
...te ...
BALTIMORE, MD
FEB 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave a concert in Columbus, Ohio, and it is little strange that Dr. Muck's programme failed to satisfy those people who so seldom hear great orchestras, for he gave them Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, Edward MacDowell's "Suite in A Minor" and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

BILLY

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.
TROY, N. Y. THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 5, 1908. 12 CENTS PER WEEK.
VOL. LII—NO. 214

CITY PENSIONS.
Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities.
IN CIVIL SERVICE.
Proposes a Retirement Fund of Three Per Cent. of Revenue of First and Second Class Cities.

BURDICK MURDER
Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day.
FOLLOWING CLEWS.
The Buffalo Police are Searching For the Mysterious Woman Seen on the Night of the Murder

THE POPE ILL.
Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear.
DEFERS AUDIENCES.
Pope Leo Passed a Restless Night—On the Advice of His Physicians He Decides to Rest.

EXTRA SESSION.
Senate Meets on President's Call.
MANY NEW MEMBERS
The Special Session of the United States Senate Convened at Noon—The President's Proclamation.

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1908

—The big audience that will assemble in Music Hall Monday evening to enjoy the concert of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra will read the following with interest: It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown into a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the Boston papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well known Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The announcement was made that a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as might be found in all large European cities, or even in the smaller centres of Germany, would be established. The organization was called the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first public rehearsal was given Friday afternoon, October 21, 1881, and the first concert on the following evening. The soloist was Annie Louise Cary, the famous contralto, who now as Mrs. Raymond is a resident of New York. Up to that time orchestral music had been limited to the work of "occasional" bands in one or two of the larger cities, and of all the organizations then existing but one remains, the venerable Philharmonic Society of New York, which, however, has never been a "permanent" orchestra in the present sense, being a co-operative institution and giving a very limited number of concerts each season. Twenty-six years have passed, and while it has been found impossible owing to the enormous increase in operating expenses to maintain the original low level of prices, the Boston Symphony Orchestra still fulfills the function assigned to it in the beginning. It has been built up to its present high standard without thought of expense. The best artists of Europe have been brought to it, such men as Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Hess, Wendling, Hekking, Schroeder, Ferir, Pourtau, Mole, Longy, Grisez, Maquarre, Reiter and other men almost as famous. As conductors it brought to America Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and now Muck. It has never been a money-making institution, and the likelihood is that it will never be such. Unquestionably its greatest service to the country is the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music. To the artistic success of the Boston Symphony may be traced directly the organization of such splendid institutions as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and the Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Cincinnati Orchestras. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that really broke the way for the others in its early tours through the West in the eighties, tours that cost great sums of money, but were so rich in other results that it was money well spent.

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.
TROY, N. Y. THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 5, 1908. 12 CENTS PER WEEK.
VOL. LII—NO. 214

CITY PENSIONS.
Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities.
IN CIVIL SERVICE.
Proposes a Retirement Fund of Three Per Cent. of Revenue of First and Second Class Cities.

BURDICK MURDER
Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day.
FOLLOWING CLEWS.
The Buffalo Police are Searching For the Mysterious Woman Seen on the Night of the Murder

THE POPE ILL.
Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear.
DEFERS AUDIENCES.
Pope Leo Passed a Restless Night—On the Advice of His Physicians He Decides to Rest.

EXTRA SESSION.
Senate Meets on President's Call.
MANY NEW MEMBERS
The Special Session of the United States Senate Convened at Noon—The President's Proclamation.

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 25, 1908.

Enterpe in Her Best Gown.

The musical divinity wore her best gown last night, and it was "made in Germany" but fitted in Boston. When it comes to orchestras, the Boston Symphony is the hub about which the music of the spheres rotates. And the knowing said at Music Hall last night that when it came to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Karl Muck had his predecessors (to translate into the classics a phrase of Saxon simplicity) divested of their epidermis in two score styles. When one remembers the correct Gericke and the inspired Nikisch it is hard to name their better; nevertheless the connoisseurs of well-strung temperament agreed as they came from Music Hall that, to use the language of one of the most expert of them, "Dr. Muck is the best man that ever held a stick over an orchestra."

There were about seventy performers on the stage. It would be inaccurate to say that they played like one man. They played like seventy men led by one man. It was precise; it was elegant; it was more than that—it was sweet. The case, the perfection of the coalescence, were wonderful, but it was the sweetness, the "linked sweetness," of the result that held the audience captive and left room for only one complaint—that the program was "too short." Would that some other concerts were equally delinquent.

The methods of the conductor were very well attuned to the character of the music. Goldmark's lovely overture "In the Spring" and Beethoven's tender, joyful Fourth Symphony came right to the hand of Dr. Muck. This "music of nature" lost none of its charm when conveyed through the conductor's art, and allegro and adagio chorused themselves with many voices but one heart. Nikisch might have given more vehemence and Gericke more crispness, but the gentle gliding of tone into tone, the appropriate contribution of each to all, a musical merger which no law could forbid—that went to the credit side of the Muck account.

The orchestra gave its concert master, Carl Wendling, for a delightful performance of the solo part in Mozart's violin concerto in A major. It was a marvelously proficient display of technical excellence, in bowing, stopping and intonation. The accompaniment was held by the conductor to just the proper subordination. Mr. Wendling was recalled again and again to hear the applause of an audience which was moved by musical art alone, for there were no tricky accessories.

The hall was filled last night with people from Troy, Albany, Schenectady and the regions beyond, and Ben Franklin, the local manager, held a little reception of his own after the concert and heard expressions of gratitude for a musical feast daintily prepared and delicately served.

...rom ...
...ddress ...
...ate ...
FEB 22 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme of Romantic Music, Played at the Baptist Temple.

It was an ideal romantic programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced for its concert last night, and the Baptist Temple was crowded with an audience prepared to enjoy an evening of picturesque and charming music; music which, while it scaled no lofty heights, yet abundantly rewarded attention and gave delight by its sheer sensuous beauty.

A change came over the prospect, however, when in the programmes was fonud a slip announcing that Fritz Kriesler, the soloist of the evening, would play, instead of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which had been announced, the violin concerto by Brahms. Now Brahms is seldom picturesque and he offers far less reward to the lover of sensuous beauty than to the student of harmony. His appeal is primarily to the intellect and his violin concerto did not fit happily into the scheme which had been devised.

Nevertheless the concert was attractive and there were lovers of Brahms in the audience who would welcome him in any company. The first number was MacDowell's Suite in A Minor, which might well be called the "Woodland Suite," although the composer has contented himself with attaching descriptive titles to the various movements of which it is composed. The selection was not formally marked as an in memoriam, but no such designation was needed to impress afresh upon hearers the loss to music by the tragedy of the too early breaking of this gentle and gifted soul. The suite is full of the spirit which marks MacDowell's smaller pieces for the piano. It has the same delicately poetic quality of suggestion and, as in his shorter work, the composer refrains from the iteration which used to be thought essential to musical form.

In literature the artist is the man who can suggest in a word what a lesser workman must take a sentence to make clear, or who can put in a sentence an idea for which the hack must have a page. Something the same thought comes in listening to the exquisite brevity in which MacDowell clothed his delicate fancies. In so far as he defied form by making his musical appeal in half the customary space, may he prove a prophet as well as a poet. That he is able to appeal without all the formal machinery of development and repetition was proved by the eager interest with which the large audience listened to this subtle and suggestive music, with its power of conjuring up pictures of the forest under the varying moods of summer luxuriance and autumn ripeness. A contrast was afforded by the dramatic overture, "Patrie," by Bizet. Here form had its due homage and spirited and rhythmic as the themes were and skillful as was the use of the large orchestral forces in working them out, they were driven to the verge of the commonplace before the composer was content to let them go.

Then came the Brahms concerto, of which the first movement, whatever else it may be, is not good violin music. It has strength and power, but its attractiveness lies in the harmonies given to the orchestra rather than in the themes, and as for the solo violinist, except in the case of a great artist like Kreisler, he might as well be at the first desk of the orchestra. The movement was dry to the point of dullness. The slow movement which followed was juicier. It had melody and fair share of it fell to the solo violin. The last movement made a spirited and vigorous use of dance forms and its stirring rhythms held attention. Far more of the interest, however, was due to the playing of Kreisler, the greatest violinist heard here since Ysaye at least. The difficulties of the work are titanic, yet Kreisler surmounted them, if not exactly with ease, yet with marvelous certainty. He was recalled again and again. Much of the enthusiasm was due no doubt to the complete mastery of technical difficulties which the playing showed, but some of it at least came from hungry lovers of the violin who hoped to secure the addition of a brief bit, like the Dvorak "Humoresque" or a Chopin nocturne which would give that instrument a chance to sing as it sometimes does under Kreisler's potent fingers. But the no encore rule was not broken. The concert closed with a sunny and fluent overture, "In the Spring," by Goldmark. It was attractive, but not at all revolutionary music.

...
Baltimore, MD
FEB 21 1908

OVATION FOR DR. MUCK

Boston Orchestra At Its Best At The Lyric Concert.

Following was the program given last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth of the present series of Baltimore concerts at the Lyric, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck:

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Pastoral, Op. 68, Beethoven

Concerto in E minor, for violin, Op. 64, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Op. 28, Richard Strauss

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who appeared here with the Philadelphia Orchestra several weeks ago, was the soloist.

Three numbers, such as those given last evening, are almost a surfeit of musical good things for one evening. The orchestra never played better; Kreisler's triumph was even greater than that which marked his former Baltimore appearance, and Dr. Muck, whose coming departure for Germany is sincerely regretted in Baltimore, was given an ovation of which he might well be proud.

The beauty of Beethoven's melodies never palls and his themes are pregnant with possibilities which are never fully realized until the work is over. This great master has given to the world the greatest symphonies that have been or possibly ever will be written. And not the least of these magnificent gems is the "Pastoral" symphony. Such tone painting, such lofty and consummate thematic treatment and brilliancy of thought can only be the work of the master of masters.

Strauss' "Eulenspiegel" music is at once happy and serious, his devices are fraught with interesting and highly colored orchestral effectiveness, and these are interwoven in themes of artistic beauty, animation and occasional somberness. The pranks of the old rogue, Eulenspiegel, are without number." Astride his horse, he clashes into the gathering of market women; then he continues merrily on in his work of destruction in the garb of a priest, creating havoc ever and anon in this guise and that, until finally he is strung from the gibbet. The composer has portrayed the merry old fellow's doings in a thoroughly admirable and unmistakable manner.

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.
TROY, N. Y. THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 5, 1908. 12 CENTS PER WEEK.
VOL. LII—NO. 214

CITY PENSIONS.
Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities.
IN CIVIL SERVICE.
Proposes a Retirement Fund of Three Per Cent. of Revenue of First and Second Class Cities.

BURDICK MURDER
Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day.
FOLLOWING CLEWS.
The Buffalo Police are Searching For the Mysterious Woman Seen on the Night of the Murder

THE POPE ILL.
Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear.
DEFERS AUDIENCES.
Pope Leo Passed a Restless Night—On the Advice of His Physicians He Decides to Rest.

EXTRA SESSION.
Senate Meets on President's Call.
MANY NEW MEMBERS
The Special Session of the United States Senate Convened at Noon—The President's Proclamation.

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 1908.

—An apt prelude to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of Monday evening was the analytical introduction given yesterday afternoon at Cluett Hall by James McLaughlin, jr. Mr. McLaughlin took up the program for next Monday evening, and by his competent and discriminating comment interested a large attendance of music-lovers. The Goldmark overture and Mozart concerto were referred to briefly, but Mr. McLaughlin devoted his chief attention to the Beethoven symphony (No. 4, in B flat major, Op. 60). He spoke in general terms of the conventional form used in symphony composition, and then took up the themes of the four movements of the fourth symphony, which is classed in grandeur with the third, fifth and ninth of the same composer. The contrasting motives in the first movement were presented, and the audience was put on the qui vive to watch for the recurrence. The second or longest movement was described, and then the third which, to use Mr. McLaughlin's term, is "jolly" with its sprightly menuet and trio. The finale was shown to be an impressive ending of the great orchestral work. The four movements were played on the piano by Mr. McLaughlin and Miss Anna Wilbur, and the spirit and technical capacity of these two players gave the production such good effect that it was enjoyable for itself alone as well as a preamble to the grand aggregation of instruments which will present the imposing harmonies at the concert of the great Boston band.

From NEW YORK HERALD,
Address BROOKLYN EDIT
Date FEB 2 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler was the assisting soloist for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn last evening at the Baptist Temple. There was a crowded auditorium. Brahms' concerto for violin was given. Another feature was the opening selection. As a tribute to the late Edward MacDowell his "Autumn Suite" was played by the orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting. Bizet's overture, "In [illegible] and Goldmark's overture, "In

...rom ...
...ddress ...
...ate ...
FEB 22 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme of Romantic Music, Played at the Baptist Temple.

It was an ideal romantic programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced for its concert last night, and the Baptist Temple was crowded with an audience prepared to enjoy an evening of picturesque and charming music; music which, while it scaled no lofty heights, yet abundantly rewarded attention and gave delight by its sheer sensuous beauty.

A change came over the prospect, however, when in the programmes was fonud a slip announcing that Fritz Kriesler, the soloist of the evening, would play, instead of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which had been announced, the violin concerto by Brahms. Now Brahms is seldom picturesque and he offers far less reward to the lover of sensuous beauty than to the student of harmony. His appeal is primarily to the intellect and his violin concerto did not fit happily into the scheme which had been devised.

Nevertheless the concert was attractive and there were lovers of Brahms in the audience who would welcome him in any company. The first number was MacDowell's Suite in A Minor, which might well be called the "Woodland Suite," although the composer has contented himself with attaching descriptive titles to the various movements of which it is composed. The selection was not formally marked as an in memoriam, but no such designation was needed to impress afresh upon hearers the loss to music by the tragedy of the too early breaking of this gentle and gifted soul. The suite is full of the spirit which marks MacDowell's smaller pieces for the piano. It has the same delicately poetic quality of suggestion and, as in his shorter work, the composer refrains from the iteration which used to be thought essential to musical form.

In literature the artist is the man who can suggest in a word what a lesser workman must take a sentence to make clear, or who can put in a sentence an idea for which the hack must have a page. Something the same thought comes in listening to the exquisite brevity in which MacDowell clothed his delicate fancies. In so far as he defied form by making his musical appeal in half the customary space, may he prove a prophet as well as a poet. That he is able to appeal without all the formal machinery of development and repetition was proved by the eager interest with which the large audience listened to this subtle and suggestive music, with its power of conjuring up pictures of the forest under the varying moods of summer luxuriance and autumn ripeness. A contrast was afforded by the dramatic overture, "Patrie," by Bizet. Here form had its due homage and spirited and rhythmic as the themes were and skillful as was the use of the large orchestral forces in working them out, they were driven to the verge of the commonplace before the composer was content to let them go.

Then came the Brahms concerto, of which the first movement, whatever else it may be, is not good violin music. It has strength and power, but its attractiveness lies in the harmonies given to the orchestra rather than in the themes, and as for the solo violinist, except in the case of a great artist like Kreisler, he might as well be at the first desk of the orchestra. The movement was dry to the point of dullness. The slow movement which followed was juicier. It had melody and fair share of it fell to the solo violin. The last movement made a spirited and vigorous use of dance forms and its stirring rhythms held attention. Far more of the interest, however, was due to the playing of Kreisler, the greatest violinist heard here since Ysaye at least. The difficulties of the work are titanic, yet Kreisler surmounted them, if not exactly with ease, yet with marvelous certainty. He was recalled again and again. Much of the enthusiasm was due no doubt to the complete mastery of technical difficulties which the playing showed, but some of it at least came from hungry lovers of the violin who hoped to secure the addition of a brief bit, like the Dvorak "Humoresque" or a Chopin nocturne which would give that instrument a chance to sing as it sometimes does under Kreisler's potent fingers. But the no encore rule was not broken. The concert closed with a sunny and fluent overture, "In the Spring," by Goldmark. It was attractive, but not at all revolutionary music.

...tion,
...N. Y.
FEB 2 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, was given last evening at the Baptist Temple under the combined auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society, and as at the previous concerts the music lovers of the borough completely filled the large auditorium. The soloist of the concert was Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who instead of the Spanish Symphony substituted the Brahams Concerto for violin in three movements. The programme:

MacDowell.....Suite in A Minor, Op. [illegible]
I. In a Haunted Forest. II. Summer Night. III. In October. IV. The Sea. V. Forest Spirits.
Bizet...Dramatic Overture, "Patrie"
[illegible]
[illegible]

[151]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

te

MUSIC

The Fourth Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Herr Kreisler As Soloist.

Dr. Muck presented the following programme:

Beethoven—
Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro, ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d'allegro.
Thunder-storm; Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherds' song; gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—
Concerto in E minor for violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Richard Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

The great conductor offered us no new material, but he endowed the old and familiar with such volumes of new significance, and such varieties of hitherto latent beauty, that one felt that even the "Pastoral" symphony was virtually a new acquaintance. This symphony has probably never been as well played as it was last evening, and for good and sufficient reasons—viz., the Boston orchestral personnel is unique, Dr. Muck is an ideal conductor and our Lyric responds and inspires as does no other music hall in the country. Add to these favorable conditions the influence of a large and sympathetic audience, and we have adequate reasons for keen attitude and high accomplishments. From the beginning of the "Pastoral" to the end of "Till Eulenspiegel" we had the highest possible grade of virtuosity, but it was always subject to musical sense. There were no illogical exhibitions of facility.

Herr Kreisler is a great artist, the Mendelssohn concerto is beautiful, and Dr. Muck's accompaniment was a marvel of discretion and sympathetic impulse; but for some reason the result was not entirely satisfying. We are not instituting a comparison between Mr. Kreisler and any contemporaneous fiddler, but rather between Mr. Kreisler's performance of last evening and his presentation of the Beethoven concerto three years ago, also with the Boston Orchestra. His tone is less sensuous (may be attributable to the inroads of wear and tear on the responsiveness of his instrument), and his attitude less reverential than we we had fancied it.

Dr. Muck infused unwonted life pulsations into Beethoven's "Pastoral," accompanied the Mendelssohn concerto marvelously, and then out-juggled the master necromancer himself. Strauss doubtless selected those "Merry Pranks" for musical illustration, because this subject would give him absolutely free hand in the use of themes and instruments. He has used them in bewilderingly ingenious ways, but Dr. Muck last evening developed a transparency of which the composer has had no practical experience, for he has no Boston orchestra and is no Dr. Muck.

O. B. B.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave a concert in Columbus, Ohio and it is little strange that Dr. Muck's programme failed to satisfy those people who so seldom hear great orchestras, for he gave them Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, Edward MacDowell's "Suite in A Minor" and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.

CITY PENSIONS. Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities. IN CIVIL SERVICE.
BURDICK MURDER Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day. FOLLOWING CLEWS.
THE POPE ILL. Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear. DEFERS AUDIENCES.
EXTRA SESSION. Senate Meets on President's Call. MANY NEW MEMBERS

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1908

—The big audience that will assemble in Music Hall Monday evening to enjoy the concert of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra will read the following with interest: It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown into a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the Boston papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well known Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The announcement was made that a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as might be found in all large European cities, or even in the smaller centres of Germany, would be established. The organization was called the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the first public rehearsal was given Friday afternoon, October 21, 1881, and the first concert on the following evening. The soloist was Annie Louise Cary, the famous contralto, who now as Mrs. Raymond is a resident of New York. Up to that time orchestral music had been limited to the work of "occasional" bands in one or two of the larger cities, and of all the organizations then existing but one remains, the venerable Philharmonic Society of New York, which, however, has never been a "permanent" orchestra in the present sense, being a co-operative institution and giving a very limited number of concerts each season. Twenty-six years have passed, and while it has been found impossible owing to the enormous increase in operating expenses to maintain the original low level of prices, the Boston Symphony Orchestra still fulfills the function assigned to it in the beginning. It has been built up to its present high standard without thought of expense. The best artists of Europe have been brought to it, such men as Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Hess, Wendling, Hekking, Schroeder, Ferir, Pourtau, Mole, Longy, Grisez, Maquarre, Reiter and other men almost as famous. As conductors it brought to America Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and now Muck. It has never been a money-making institution, and the likelihood is that it will never be such. Unquestionably its greatest service to the country is the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music. To the artistic success of the Boston Symphony may be traced directly the organization of such splendid institutions as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and the Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Cincinnati Orchestras. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that really broke the way for the others in its early tours through the West in the eighties, tours that cost great sums of money, but were so rich in other results that it was money well spent.

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.

CITY PENSIONS. Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities. IN CIVIL SERVICE.
BURDICK MURDER Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day. FOLLOWING CLEWS.
THE POPE ILL. Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear. DEFERS AUDIENCES.
EXTRA SESSION. Senate Meets on President's Call. MANY NEW MEMBERS

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 25, 1908.

Euterpe in Her Best Gown.

The musical divinity wore her best gown last night, and it was "made in Germany" but fitted in Boston. When it comes to orchestras, the Boston Symphony is the hub about which the music of the spheres rotates. And the knowing said at Music Hall last night that when it came to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dr. Karl Muck had his predecessors (to translate into the classics a phrase of Saxon simplicity) divested of their epidermis in two score styles. When one remembers the correct Gericke and the inspired Nikisch it is hard to name their better; nevertheless the connoisseurs of well-strung temperament agreed as they came from Music Hall that, to use the language of one of the most expert of them, "Dr. Muck is the best man that ever held a stick over an orchestra."

There were about seventy performers on the stage. It would be inaccurate to say that they played like one man. They played like seventy men led by one man. It was precise; it was elegant; it was more than that—it was sweet. The case, the perfection of the coalescence, were wonderful, but it was the sweetness, the "linked sweetness," of the result that held the audience captive and left room for only one complaint—that the program was "too short." Would that some other concerts were equally delinquent.

The methods of the conductor were very well attuned to the character of the music. Goldmark's lovely overture "In the Spring" and Beethoven's tender, joyful Fourth Symphony came right to the hand of Dr. Muck. This "music of nature" lost none of its charm when conveyed through the conductor's art, and allegro and adagio chorused themselves with many voices but one heart. Nikisch might have given more vehemence and Gericke more crispness, but the gentle gliding of tone into tone, the appropriate contribution of each to all, a musical merger which no law could forbid—that went to the credit side of the Muck account.

The orchestra gave its concert master, Carl Wendling, for a delightful performance of the solo part in Mozart's violin concerto in A major. It was a marvelously proficient display of technical excellence, in bowing, stopping and intonation. The accompaniment was held by the conductor to just the proper subordination. Mr. Wendling was recalled again and again to hear the applause of an audience which was moved by musical art alone, for there were no tricky accessories.

The hall was filled last night with people from Troy, Albany, Schenectady and the regions beyond, and Ben Franklin, the local manager, held a little reception of his own after the concert and heard expressions of gratitude for a musical feast daintily prepared and delicately served.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1908

MAC DOWELL'S SUITE.

Discussed by D. G. Mason in Lecture on Programme of Symphony Concert.

Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, gave the lecture recital preceding the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple to-night, at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute), devoting most of the time to a study of the MacDowell Suite in A minor, Op. 42. He played several of the movements, the second and fourth lending themselves very agreeably to piano interpretation, although Mr. Mason pointed out the many places where the orchestra is needed for fullness in tone. Mr. Mason brought together the opinions of many critics on MacDowell's composition, then spoke of the "supernaturalism which is ineradicable in Germany romanticism, with which MacDowell became imbued while in Germany." It shows in this suite whose first and fifth movements bear names, "The Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." He also commented on "MacDowell's aloofness and rather careful preservation of his own personality," saying that he had heard it said that the composer never read a score by any of the old masters for fear of its unconsciously influencing him. Mr. Mason thought that MacDowell's tendency was the mistaking of idiosyncrasy for personality, and that he was too apt to use altered chords, that is, chords affected by accidentals, "which, like spice in cookery, add great zest if used in moderation."

From NEW YORK HERALD,
Address BROOKLYN BUR. New York City.
Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fritz Kreisler was the assisting soloist for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn last evening at the Baptist Temple. There was a crowded auditorium. Brahms' concerto for violin was given. Another feature was the opening selection. As a tribute to the late Edward MacDowell his "Autumn Suite" was played by the orchestra with Dr. Karl Muck conducting. Bizet's overture, "Patrie," and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," were also played.

LATEST EDITION. The Troy Times. LATEST EDITION.

CITY PENSIONS. Bill to Create a Fund in State Cities. IN CIVIL SERVICE.
BURDICK MURDER Arrest Will Probably be Made To-day. FOLLOWING CLEWS.
THE POPE ILL. Symptoms of Bronchitis Appear. DEFERS AUDIENCES.
EXTRA SESSION. Senate Meets on President's Call. MANY NEW MEMBERS

Troy, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1908.

—An apt prelude to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of Monday evening was the analytical introduction given yesterday afternoon at Chueit Hall by James McLaughlin, jr. Mr. McLaughlin took up the program for next Monday evening, and by his competent and discriminating comment interested a large attendance of music-lovers. The Goldmark overture and Mozart concerto were referred to briefly, but Mr. McLaughlin devoted his chief attention to the Beethoven symphony (No. 4, in B flat major, Op. 60). He spoke in general terms of the conventional form used in symphony composition, and then took up the themes of the four movements of the fourth symphony, which is classed in grandeur with the third, fifth and ninth of the same composer. The contrasting motives in the first movement were presented, and the audience was put on the qui vive to watch for the recurrence. The second or longest movement was described, and then the third which, to use Mr. McLaughlin's term, is "jolly" with its sprightly menuet and trio. The finale was shown to be an impressive ending of the great orchestral work. The four movements were played on the piano by Mr. McLaughlin and Miss Anna Wilbur, and the spirit and technical capacity of these two players gave the production such good effect that it was enjoyable for itself alone as well as a preamble to the grand aggregation of instruments which will present the imposing harmonies at the concert of the great Boston band.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom

ddress

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme of Romantic Music, Plus Brahms, Played at the Baptist Temple.

It was an ideal romantic programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced for its concert last night, and the Baptist Temple was crowded with an audience prepared to enjoy an evening of picturesque and charming music; music which, while it scaled no lofty heights, yet abundantly rewarded attention and gave delight by its sheer sensuous beauty.

A change came over the prospect, however, when in the programmes was fonud a slip announcing that Frita Kriesler, the soloist of the evening, would play, instead of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which had been announced, the violin concerto by Brahms. Now Brahms is seldom picturesque and he offers far less reward to the lover of sensuous beauty than to the student of harmony. His appeal is primarily to the intellect and his violin concerto did not fit happily into the scheme which had been devised.

Nevertheless the concert was attractive and there were lovers of Brahms in the audience who would welcome him in any company. The first number was MacDowell's Suite in A Minor, which might well be called the "Woodland Suite," although the composer has contented himself with attaching descriptive titles to the various movements of which it is composed. The selection was not formally marked as an in memoriam, but no such designation was needed to impress afresh upon hearers the loss to music by the tragedy of the too early breaking of this gentle and gifted soul. The suite is full of the spirit which marks MacDowell's smaller pieces for the piano. It has the same delicately poetic quality of suggestion and, as in his shorter work, the composer refrains from the iteration which used to be thought essential to musical form.

In literature the artist is the man who can suggest in a word what a lesser workman must take a sentence to make clear, or who can put in a sentence an idea for which the hack must have a page. Something the same thought comes in listening to the exquisite brevity in which MacDowell clothed his delicate fancies. In so far as he defied form by making his musical appeal in half the customary space, may he prove a prophet as well as a poet. That he is able to appeal without all the formal machinery of development and repetition was proved by the eager interest with which the large audience listened to this subtle and suggestive music, with its power of conjuring up pictures of the forest under the varying moods of summer luxuriance and autumn ripeness. A contrast was afforded by the dramatic overture, "Patrie," by Bizet. Here form had its due homage and spirited and rhythmic as the themes were and skillful as was the use of the large orchestral forces in working them out, they were driven to the verge of the commonplace before the composer was content to let them go.

Then came the Brahms concerto, of which the first movement, whatever else it may be, is not good violin music. It has strength and power, but its attractiveness lies in the harmonies given to the orchestra rather than in the themes, and as for the solo violinist, except in the case of a great artist like Kreisler, he might as well be at the first desk of the orchestra. The movement was dry to the point of dullness. The slow movement which followed was juicier. It had melody and fair share of it fell to the solo violin. The last movement made a spirited and vigorous use of dance forms and its stirring rhythms held attention. Far more of the interest, however, was due to the playing of Kreisler, the greatest violinist heard here since Ysaye at least. The difficulties of the work are titanic, yet Kreisler surmounted them, if not exactly with ease, yet with marvelous certainty. He was recalled again and again. Much of the enthusiasm was due no doubt to the complete mastery of technical difficulties which the playing showed, but some of it at least came from hungry lovers of the violin who hoped to secure the addition of a brief bit, like the Dvorak "Humoresque" or a Chopin nocturne which would give that instrument a chance to sing as it sometimes does under Kreisler's potent fingers. But the no encore rule was not broken. The concert closed with a sunny and fluent overture, "In the Spring," by Goldmark. It was attractive, but not at all revolutionary music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, was given last evening at the Baptist Temple under the combined auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society, and as at the previous concerts, the music lovers of the borough completely filled the large auditorium. The soloist of the concert was Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who instead of the Spanish Symphony substituted the Brahams Concerto for violin in three movements. The programme:

MacDowell.....Suite in A Minor, Op. 42
I. In a Haunted Forest. II. Summer Idyl. III. In October. IV. The Shepherds' Song. V. Forest Spirits.
Bizet..Dramatic Overture, "Patrie," C Minor, Op. 19.
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra....Brahms
Overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36....Goldmark

OVATION FOR DR. MUCK

Boston Orchestra At Its Best At The Lyric Concert.

Following was the program given last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fourth of the present series of Baltimore concerts at the Lyric, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck:

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Pastoral, Op. 68, Beethoven

Concerto in E minor, for violin, Op. 64, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Op. 28, Richard Strauss

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who appeared here with the Philadelphia Orchestra several weeks ago, was the soloist.

Three numbers, such as those given last evening, are almost a surfeit of musical good things for one evening. The orchestra never played better; Kreisler's triumph was even greater than that which marked his former Baltimore appearance, and Dr. Muck, whose coming departure for Germany is sincerely regretted in Baltimore, was given an ovation of which he might well be proud.

The beauty of Beethoven's melodies never palls and his themes are pregnant with possibilities which are never fully realized until the work is over. This great master has given to the world the greatest symphonies that have been or possibly ever will be written. And not the least of these magnificent gems is the "Pastoral" symphony. Such tone painting, such lofty and consummate thematic treatment and brilliancy of thought can only be the work of the master of masters.

Strauss' "Eulenspiegel" music is at once happy and serious, his devices are fraught with interesting and highly colored orchestral effectiveness, and these are interwoven in themes of artistic beauty, animation and occasional somberness. The pranks of the old rogue, Eulenspiegel, are without number. Astride his horse, he clashes into the gathering of market women; then he continues merrily on in his work of destruction in the garb of a priest, creating havoc ever and anon in this guise and that, until finally he is strung from the gibbet. The composer has portrayed the merry old fellow's doings in a thoroughly admirable and unmistakable manner.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSICAL.

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist.

The Baptist Temple was crowded last night by attentive listeners, who found much to enjoy in the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was no full symphony on the programme, as usual, its place being occupied by MacDowell's Suite in A minor. Other orchestral numbers were two overtures, Bizet's "Patrie," in C minor, and Goldmark's "In the Spring." Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, and was billed for Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra. A printed slip inserted in the house programme announced that he would play a concerto by Brahms instead. No reason was given for the change, and it may be presumed that the violinist felt in better form for the Brahms work than for the one for which he was programmed. It is the privilege of artists to change their plans in such instances, although it is considered less pardonable than formerly. So far as indicating Mr. Kreisler's technical mastery the substitution was perhaps more convincing as the Brahams work is so constructed as to be especially an embodiment of technical difficulties, and as such its performance becomes essentially a feat of virtuosity. In this respect it is really prodigious and there could be no question that Mr. Kreisler distinguished himself. It seemed a pity however, that so much labor should be challenged by a composition with so comparatively little of the graciousness and joy of musical life.

The MacDowell is light in substance yet fuller in orchestral voicing than many other works of its class. It is a series of tone-pictures written to express the titles of the five movements, "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song," and "Forest Spirits." It was composed when Mr. MacDowell was about 25, hen he resided during his early married life near the big Wiesbaden forest. It is highly imaginative, and gives exuberant play to the young man's fancy turned by the joy in life and love to the contemplation of the mysterious voices of the forest.

The composer does what many young writers do, attempts a comprehensive use of orchestral resources, as if he could not resist making use of the possibilities of the several instruments as if glorying in a conscious knowledge of them. In the matter of what are generally termed orchestral effects out of the ordinary this suite is a very interesting composition and suggests the sensitive, high-strung nature of the composer.

Bizet's overture is a dramatic and telling work in this form and Goldmark's music expresses a strong sympathy with the subject without touching the high mark this composer has reached in other compositions. Dr. Karl Muck's conducting was noteworthy for its command of the situation.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

13

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way, by placing many of their works on his programme in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffler and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far there have appeared on his programmes in Boston: Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc;" MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which by the way he had on his programmes a year ago; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Daniel Gregory Mason Gives the Preceding Lecture Recital.

Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia University gave the lecture recital preceding the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple to-night, at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, devoting most of the time to a study of the MacDowell Suite in A minor, Op. 42, the opening number. He played several of the movements, the second and fourth lending themselves very agreeable to piano interpretation, although Mr. Mason pointed out the many places where the orchestra is needed for fullness in tone. The difficult passage in the fourth movement, where the flutes have a sort of obligato with many runs, was most ably given, although it was claimed that far more than two hands are required to present it properly. Mr. Mason brought together the opinions of many critics on MacDowell's composition, then spoke of the "supernaturalism which is ineradicable in German romanticism, with which MacDowell became imbued while in Germany." It shows in this suite whose first and fifth movements bear names, "The Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." He also commented on "MacDowell's aloofness and rather careful preservation of his own personality," saying that he had heard it said that the composer never read a score by any of the old masters for fear of its unconsciously influencing him. Mr. Mason though that MacDowell's tendency was the mistaking of idiosyncrasy for personality, and that he was too apt to use altered chords, that is, chords affected by accidentals, "which, like spice in cookery, add great zest if used in moderation." Other numbers on the programme studied are Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," C minor, Op. 19; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra, Op. 21, in which Fritz Kreisler will be heard to-night, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36.

, 18

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 23 1908

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way by placing many of their works on his programmes in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffler and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far there have appeared on his programmes in Boston Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite" and second pianoforte concerto, and Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which by the way he had on his programme last year; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

, 1884

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.

FEB 23 1908

TRAMP'S DITTY PART OF ORCHESTRAL SUITE

American Composition by Mr. G. W. Chadwick Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a composition by an American on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but no one would be credulous enough to believe Dr. Muck had placed it there to help celebrate Washington's Birthday. It was played because it was an interesting work, well worth playing.

It was an orchestral suite by Mr. George Whitfield Chadwick, and its movements bear the titles of "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." Some of these bear mottoes, the final one dealing with "a tale of tramps and railway ties." It was in the last one that the composer voiced his most emective moods. He has let some of the orchestral instruments sing a tramp's ditty, which has a frank swing, and in the development of this he flings conventionality to the winds by introducing a quotation from a Bach organ fugue. This, if taken seriously, is a fine musical joke. The first movement is also admirable in its ideas and treatment.

Richard Strauss' huge orchestral scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel," a work that has come to be well known here, was the other number. It was superbly played, the orchestra meeting the tests of its virtuosity unfailingly. Dr. Muck conducted both numbers with quiet, effective mastery.

Mr. Van Rooy, from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist. He was especially good in the aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

The audience was large, and it was so enthusiastic in its applause after the Strauss number that Dr. Muck motioned to the members of the orchestra to rise and bow their thanks.

[illegible] ZEITUNG,
New York City.

FEB 2[illegible] 1908

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Der herrschenden Faschings-Stimmung hat Dr. Karl Muck bei der Zusammenstellung des Programms für das gestrige Matinee-Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters gebührende Rechnung getragen, indem er nicht nur „Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche" von Richard Strauß, sondern auch des Bostoner Komponisten George Whitfield Chadwick Orchester-Suite „Symphonische Skizzen" zur Aufführung bestimmte. Chadwick's Werk ist nicht aus einem Guß. Seine vier Abtheilungen stehen in keinem logischen Zusammenhang unter einander und können in beliebiger Reihenfolge gegeben werden, weil jede Einzelne ein in sich abgeschlossenes Ganze bildet. Das erste Stück „Jubilee" ist unseres Erachtens das beste von allen. Glänzend instrumentirt, wirkt es mit seinen anmuthigen Thematen wie ein Ausschnitt aus einer Beethoven'schen Symphonie. Das zweite, „Noël" benannt, vermag die Ideen-Association mit der heiligen Nacht kaum herzustellen, wenn es auch seiner ganzen Anlage nach ein Nocturno ist. Nummer drei heißt „Hobgoblin" nach dem Kobold, der in Shakespeare's „Mittsommernachts-Traum" spielt, und das letzte Stück nennt sich „A Vagrom Ballad — „Vagantenlied würden wir Deutsche sagen. Auf diese beiden letzten Abtheilungen trifft zu, was wir oben vom carnevalistischen Charakter des Programm gesagt haben. Chadwick liebt es, den Holzbläsern ein erhebliches Quantum Spezial-Arbeit aufzubürden. Englisch-Horn, Baß-Klarinette u. s. w. spielen eine große Rolle und werden zur Erzielung von Effekten verwendet, die humoristisch wirken sollen. Das thun sie denn auch in so reichlichem Maße, daß sie dem Werke den Stempel einer musikalischen Spielerei aufdrücken. Dem Publikum gefiel die Suite nicht übel, zumal sie stellenweise glänzend herausgebracht wurde. Stellenweise, denn manchmal schien es, als wenn das Orchester etwas ermüdet sei. Kein Wunder, wenn man am Ende einer so anstrengenden Konzert-Tournee steht, wie sie die Bostoner gegenwärtig absolviren. Bedeutund frischer kamen Eulenspiegels Schelmenstreiche heraus. Man kennt ja das Werk von seiner Aufführung unter des Komponisten persönlicher Leitung her zur Genüge und weiß, daß Richard Strauß sich hier selbst als ein Eulenspiegel entpuppt, der die Leute zum Narren hält. Es braucht wohl nicht gesagt zu werden, daß Dr. Muck aus dem Scherz mehr gemacht hat, als sein Berliner Kollege zu machen fertig brachte. Womit wieder einmal bewiesen ist, daß der Komponist nicht immer der beste Interpret seiner eigenen Werke ist. Herr Muck ist ein abgesagter Feind der Vokalsolisten in Symphonie-Konzerten. Trotzdem ließ er gestern Herrn Anton Van [illegible] achtet mir die Meister nicht" aus „Die Meistersinger" singen. Der Sänger vermochte uns nicht zu überzeugen, daß er auf dem Konzert-Podium ebenso heimathsberechtigt ist, wie auf der Bühne. Im Kostüm des Hans Sachs macht es sich viel besser, wenn er dem Walther von Stolzing die klassische Ermahnung giebt. Van Rooy's Stimme scheint viel von ihrem früheren Glanze eingebüßt zu haben. Liegt es vielleicht an der Athemtechnik? Oder rächt sich jetzt das Forciren, dessen der Künstler so oft sich schuldig gemacht hat?

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.

FEB 24 1908

* * *

Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck presented for the first time in New York George W. Chadwick's suite for orchestra entitled "Symphonic Sketches" with subheadings "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." The work is delightfully interesting and appeared to a good advantage even by the side of such illustrious companions as Wagner and Richard Strauss, who were represented by a vocal excerpt from "Die Meistersinger," sung by Anton Van Rooy, and "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks." Van Rooy also sang an aria from "Hans Heiling" by Marschner.

The very large audience gave a hearty welcome to the orchestra and to the offerings provided by Dr. Muck. Friday evening in Brooklyn Dr. Muck gave MacDowell's Indian suite, and it is a noteworthy fact that on his programmes have already appeared works by J. K. Payne, Howard Brockway, Converse and others. He will give an entirely American programme at one of his March concerts in New York when we shall probably hear Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc" and a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley. It is evident that American composers will be losers when Dr. Muck leaves.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.

FEB 21 1908

KREISLER AND BOSTON BAND IN CONCERT

Violinist Plays the Beethoven Concerto with Superb Effect—New Variations and Fugue by Reger.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played the first of its fourth pair of concerts last night at Carnegie hall, before a very large audience. Dr. Muck, who will only be heard three times more in New York, has brought himself very close to the hearts of true music lovers by his superb control of this organization.

It has been a great privilege to know Dr. Muck and his methods, his aims and his achievements. We may rejoice in what we have had of his presence, and the greatest compliment that can be paid him is the fact that he has raised new standards in many directions.

Those who know the career of Dr. Muck in Europe must understand that he has frequently lent himself to conditions, even when they were distasteful to him, as in the case of soloists, to whom he objects seriously as disturbing the contour of a highly musical programme. He is not alone in this; the feeling has existed so strongly in Paris that it became almost dangerous for soloists to appear. Dr. Muck's programmes in America have probably not represented what he would have done had he planned to live in this country and to build for himself. The manner in which he has provided novelties proves that he believes there is a feverish demand in this direction.

But Dr. Muck will not go back without having gained his point in America. He has been studying, trying experiments upon and analyzing the audiences of this country as types, and his conclusions will probably not become known to us until he returns to Berlin. Then we shall watch his programmes. We may be able to read between the lines.

The offering last night was unusually interesting, and, while not open to severe criticism from any point, it would have been a better arrangement had the Bach suite been the first number instead of the last. As it was, Dr. Muck gave Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme of J. A. Hiller, followed by the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and the overture from Bach's orchestral suite in D major.

The Reger work was heard for the first time in New York, and made a deep impression, especially upon the musicians in the audience, who appreciated that it was of more than passing interest and worth. It revealed the young German as a writer of power and of significance, who, while clearly one of the younger school, shows less eccentricity and not less originality than some others who live by means of cacophony.

The title page contains the information that the theme of J. Adam Hiller is dated 1770, but Philip Hale, through the Boston public library, has definitely located it in an operetta called "The Harvest Wreath." In itself it has great charm, and lends itself to the most fantistic treatment, which Reger has done in eleven variations and a fugue. Attractive as they are, the work is too long, and can only be absorbing from first to last by those able to follow the intimate details of such a work.

The fugue especially shows the hand of genius, and there are not only outward effects, but it is built from within.

Kreisler has played in New York several times this season, each time with great success, but never has he arisen to the splendid heights that he did in the Beethoven concerto, a work well fitted for the nobility of his classical playing. The cadenzas were of more than ordinary beauty and never extended beyond the spirit of the work, while involving intense technical difficulty.

These were distinctly characteristic of Kreisler, who was responsible for them, and to whose credit they may well stand. Dr. Muck gave the Beethoven number a wonderfully beautiful accompaniment, so subdued at times that one forgot the presence of the support.

[152]

MUSICAL.

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist.

The Baptist Temple was crowded last night by attentive listeners, who found much to enjoy in the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was no full symphony on the programme, as usual, its place being occupied by MacDowell's Suite in A minor. Other orchestral numbers were two overtures, Bizet's "Patrie," in C minor, and Goldmark's "In the Spring." Fritz Kreisler was the soloist, and was billed for Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra. A printed slip inserted in the house programme announced that he would play a concerto by Brahms instead. No reason was given for the change, and it may be presumed that the violinist felt in better form for the Brahms work than for the one for which he was programmed. It is the privilege of artists to change their plans in such instances, although it is considered less pardonable than formerly. So far as indicating Mr. Kreisler's technical mastery the substitution was perhaps more convincing as the Brahams work is so constructed as to be especially an embodiment of technical difficulties, and as such its performance becomes essentially a feat of virtuosity. In this respect it is really prodigious and there could be no question that Mr. Kreisler distinguished himself. It seemed a pity however, that so much labor should be challenged by a composition with so comparatively little of the graciousness and joy of musical life.

The MacDowell is light in substance yet fuller in orchestral voicing than many other works of its class. It is a series of tone-pictures written to express the titles of the five movements, "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess' Song," and "Forest Spirits." It was composed when Mr. MacDowell was about 25, hen he resided during his early married life near the big Wiesbaden forest. It is highly imaginative, and gives exuberant play to the young man's fancy turned by the joy in life and love to the contemplation of the mysterious voices of the forest.

The composer does what many young writers do, attempts a comprehensive use of orchestral resources, as if he could not resist making use of the possibilities of the several instruments as if glorying in a conscious knowledge of them. In the matter of what are generally termed orchestral effects out of the ordinary this suite is a very interesting composition and suggests the sensitive, high-strung nature of the composer.

Bizet's overture is a dramatic and telling work in this form and Goldmark's music expresses a strong sympathy with the subject without touching the high mark this composer has reached in other compositions. Dr. Karl Muck's conducting was noteworthy for its command of the situation.

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way, by placing many of their works on his programme in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick Loeffler and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far there have appeared on his programmes in Boston: Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc;" MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which by the way he had on his programmes a year ago; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Daniel Gregory Mason Gives the Preceding Lecture Recital.

Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia University gave the lecture recital preceding the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple to-night, at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, devoting most of the time to a study of the MacDowell Suite in A minor, Op. 42, the opening number. He played several of the movements, the second and fourth lending themselves very agreeable to piano interpretation, although Mr. Mason pointed out the many places where the orchestra is needed for fullness in tone. The difficult passage in the fourth movement, where the flutes have a sort of obligato with many runs, was most ably given, although it was claimed that far more than two hands are required to present it properly. Mr. Mason brought together the opinions of many critics on MacDowell's composition, then spoke of the "supernaturalism which is ineradicable in German romanticism, with which MacDowell became imbued while in Germany." It shows in this suite whose first and fifth movements bear names, "The Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." He also commented on "MacDowell's aloofness and rather careful preservation of his own personality," saying that he had heard it said that the composer never read a score by any of the old masters for fear of its unconsciously influencing him. Mr. Mason though that MacDowell's tendency was the mistaking of idiosyncrasy for personality, and that he was too apt to use altered chords, that is, chords affected by accidentals, "which, like spice in cookery, add great zest if used in moderation." Other numbers on the programme studied are Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," C minor, Op. 19; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra, Op. 21, in which Fritz Kreisler will be heard tonight, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Op. 36.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 23 1908

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way by placing many of their works on his programmes in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffler and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far there have appeared on his programmes in Boston Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite" and second pianoforte concerto, and Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc," MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which by the way he had on his programme last year; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.

TRAMP'S DITTY PART OF ORCHESTRAL SUITE

American Composition by Mr. G. W. Chadwick Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a composition by an American on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but no one would be credulous enough to believe Dr. Muck had placed it there to help celebrate Washington's Birthday. It was played because it was an interesting work, well worth playing.

It was an orchestral suite by Mr. George Whitfield Chadwick, and its movements bear the titles of "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." Some of these bear mottoes, the final one dealing with "a tale of tramps and railway ties." It was in the last one that the composer voiced his most effective moods. He has let some of the orchestral instruments sing a tramp's ditty, which has a frank swing, and in the development of this he flings conventionality to the winds by introducing a quotation from a Bach organ fugue. This, if taken seriously, is a fine musical joke. The first movement is also admirable in its ideas and treatment.

Richard Strauss' huge orchestral scherzo, "Till Eulenspiegel," a work that has come to be well known here, was the other number. It was superbly played, the orchestra meeting the tests of its virtuosity unfailingly. Dr. Muck conducted both numbers with quiet, effective mastery.

Mr. Van Rooy, from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist. He was especially good in the aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling."

The audience was large, and it was so enthusiastic in its applause after the Strauss number that Dr. Muck motioned to the members of the orchestra to rise and bow their thanks.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Boston Symphonie Orchester.

Der herrschenden Faschings-Stimmung hat Dr. Karl Muck bei der Zusammenstellung des Programms für das gestrige Matinee-Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters gebührende Rechnung getragen, indem er nicht nur „Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche" von Richard Strauß, sondern auch des Bostoner Komponisten George Whitfield Chadwick Orchester-Suite „Symphonische Skizzen" zur Aufführung bestimmte. Chadwick's Werk ist nicht aus einem Guß. Seine vier Abtheilungen stehen in keinem logischen Zusammenhang unter einander und können in beliebiger Reihenfolge gegeben werden, weil jede Einzelne ein in sich abgeschlossenes Ganze bildet. Das erste Stück „Jubilee" ist unseres Erachtens das beste von allen. Glänzend instrumentirt, wirkt es mit seinen anmuthigen Thematen wie ein Ausschnitt aus einer Beethoven'schen Symphonie. Das zweite, „Noël" benannt, vermag die Ideen-Association mit der heiligen Nacht kaum herzustellen, wenn es auch seiner ganzen Anlage nach ein Nocturno ist. Nummer drei heißt „Hobgoblin" nach dem Kobold, der in Shakespeare's „Mittsommernachts-Traum" spielt, und das letzte Stück nennt sich „A Vagrom Ballad — „Vagantenlied würden wir Deutsche sagen. Auf diese beiden letzten Abtheilungen trifft zu, was wir oben vom carnevalistischen Charakter des Programm gesagt haben. Chadwick liebt es, den Holzbläsern ein erhebliches Quantum Spezial-Arbeit aufzubürden. Englisch-Horn, Baß-Klarinette u. s. w. spielen eine große Rolle und werden zur Erzielung von Effekten verwendet, die humoristisch wirken sollen. Das thun sie denn auch in so reichlichem Maße, daß sie dem Werke den Stempel einer musikalischen Spielerei aufdrücken. Dem Publikum gefiel die Suite nicht übel, zumal sie stellenweise glänzend herausgebracht wurde. Stellenweise, denn manchmal schien es, als wenn das Orchester etwas ermüdet sei. Kein Wunder, wenn man am Ende einer so anstrengenden Konzert-Tournee steht, wie sie die Bostoner gegenwärtig absolviren. Bedeutund frischer kamen Eulenspiegels Schelmenstreiche heraus. Man kennt ja das Werk von seiner Aufführung unter des Komponisten persönlicher Leitung her zur Genüge und weiß, daß Richard Strauß sich hier selbst als ein Eulenspiegel entpuppt, der die Leute zum Narren hält. Es braucht wohl nicht gesagt zu werden, daß Dr. Muck aus dem Scherz mehr gemacht hat, als sein Berliner Kollege zu machen fertig brachte. Womit wieder einmal bewiesen ist, daß der Komponist nicht immer der beste Interpret seiner eigenen Werke ist. Herr Muck ist ein abgesagter Feind der Vokalsolisten in Symphonie-Konzerten. Trotzdem ließ er gestern Herrn Anton Van [illegible] achtet mir die Meister nicht" aus „Die Meistersinger" singen. Der Sänger vermochte uns nicht zu überzeugen, daß er auf dem Konzert-Podium ebenso heimathsberechtigt ist, wie auf der Bühne. Im Kostüm des Hans Sachs macht es sich viel besser, wenn er dem Walther von Stolzing die klassische Ermahnung giebt. Van Rooy's Stimme scheint viel von ihrem früheren Glanze eingebüßt zu haben. Liegt es vielleicht an der Athemtechnik? Oder rächt sich jetzt das Forciren, dessen der Künstler so oft sich schuldig gemacht hat?

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 24 1908

* * *

Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck presented for the first time in New York George W. Chadwick's suite for orchestra entitled "Symphonic Sketches" with subheadings "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." The work is delightfully interesting and appeared to a good advantage even by the side of such illustrious companions as Wagner and Richard Strauss, who were represented by a vocal excerpt from "Die Meistersinger," sung by Anton Van Rooy, and "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks." Van Rooy also sang an aria from "Hans Heiling" by Marschner.

The very large audience gave a hearty welcome to the orchestra and to the offerings provided by Dr. Muck. Friday evening in Brooklyn Dr. Muck gave MacDowell's Indian suite, and it is a noteworthy fact that on his programmes have already appeared works by J. K. Payne, Howard Brockway, Converse and others. He will give an entirely American programme at one of his March concerts in New York when we shall probably hear Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," Converse's "Jeanne D'Arc" and a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley. It is evident that American composers will be losers when Dr. Muck leaves.

* * *

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
FEB 21 1908

KREISLER AND BOSTON BAND IN CONCERT

Violinist Plays the Beethoven Concerto with Superb Effect—New Variations and Fugue by Reger.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played the first of its fourth pair of concerts last night at Carnegie hall, before a very large audience. Dr. Muck, who will only be heard three times more in New York, has brought himself very close to the hearts of true music lovers by his superb control of this organization.

It has been a great privilege to know Dr. Muck and his methods, his aims and his achievements. We may rejoice in what we have had of his presence, and the greatest compliment that can be paid him is the fact that he has raised new standards in many directions.

Those who know the career of Dr. Muck in Europe must understand that he has frequently lent himself to conditions, even when they were distasteful to him, as in the case of soloists, to whom he objects seriously as disturbing the contour of a highly musical programme. He is not alone in this; the feeling has existed so strongly in Paris that it became almost dangerous for soloists to appear. Dr. Muck's programmes in America have probably not represented what he would have done had he planned to live in this country and to build for himself. The manner in which he has provided novelties proves that he believes there is a feverish demand in this direction.

But Dr. Muck will not go back without having gained his point in America. He has been studying, trying experiments upon and analyzing the audiences of this country as types, and his conclusions will probably not become known to us until he returns to Berlin. Then we shall watch his programmes. We may be able to read between the lines.

The offering last night was unusually interesting, and, while not open to severe criticism from any point, it would have been a better arrangement had the Bach suite been the first number instead of the last. As it was, Dr. Muck gave Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme of J. A. Hiller, followed by the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and the overture from Bach's orchestral suite in D major.

The Reger work was heard for the first time in New York, and made a deep impression, especially upon the musicians in the audience, who appreciated that it was of more than passing interest and worth. It revealed the young German as a writer of power and of significance, who, while clearly one of the younger school, shows less eccentricity and not less originality than some others who live by means of cacophony.

The title page contains the information that the theme of J. Adam Hiller is dated 1770, but Philip Hale, through the Boston public library, has definitely located it in an operetta called "The Harvest Wreath." In itself it has great charm, and lends itself to the most fantistic treatment, which Reger has done in eleven variations and a fugue. Attractive as they are, the work is too long, and can only be absorbing from first to last by those able to follow the intimate details of such a work.

The fugue especially shows the hand of genius, and there are not only outward effects, but it is built from within.

Kreisler has played in New York several times this season, each time with great success, but never has he arisen to the splendid heights that he did in the Beethoven concerto, a work well fitted for the nobility of his classical playing. The cadenzas were of more than ordinary beauty and never extended beyond the spirit of the work, while involving intense technical difficulty.

These were distinctly characteristic of Kreisler, who was responsible for them, and to whose credit they may well stand. Dr. Muck gave the Beethoven number a wonderfully beautiful accompaniment, so subdued at times that one forgot the presence of the support.

* * *

[152]

TIMES,
New York City.
FEB 23 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Suite, by Chadwick Played—Mr. Van Rooy Sings Twice.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. A new suite of orchestral pieces by George W. Chadwick of Boston was played for the first time here. "Symphonic Sketches," they are called, and they are four in number, with no apparent connection between them. They have titles "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," "A Vagram Ballad," and in all but the second the composer's mood is chiefly one of good humor and reckless joviality, approaching even to boisterousness. He has had the purpose frankly to entertain and to present no problems whatever.

The suite is good music, full of wit and invention; sometimes, indeed, not without its suggestion of other men's music, but always showing plenty of the composer's own self and written with a sure hand and a sure command of orchestral effect. To each of them in the score is prefixed a motto in verse, not a programme to be delineated in the music, but a suggestion of its character. "Give me the warmest red and green, a cornet and a tambourine, to paint my jubilee," he says; and the "Jubilee" has its suggestion of these things in the outburst of ringing gaiety with which it opens and which fills much of the music after the development of a section based on more sentimental thematic matter, strongly suggestive of Scottish song in its character. The "Noel" has, of course, Christmas verse; and the music is gentle, suave, with a suggestion, though not a dominating one, of the Virgin Mother's lullaby. The "Hobgoblin" that was in Mr. Chadwick's mind is Shakespeare's Robin Goodfellow, mischievously peering through lively music. The strongest and most original movement is the last, the "Vagrom Ballad"—"a tale of tramps and railway ties." It is picturesque and unconventional writing; its humor is of strong, and sometimes bitter, flavor. It has its touch of burlesque, as in the mock heroism of the opening cadenza on the deep-toned bass clarinet, and the mystifying quotation of the theme of Bach's G-minor organ fugue on the xylophone. There is a brief contrasting bit of the close, a sudden soberness—does it foreshadow the "thirty days to come"? Whatever it is, it is highly effective; the ideas are of substance, the orchestration masterly.

The other orchestral number was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the performance of this fascinating piece was of such dazzling brilliancy, sonority, flexibility, and spirit as have been seldom heard even from this orchestra. It bristles with difficulties for many of the individual instruments as well as for the ensemble, but these were mastered with an apparent ease that made it seem the most natural thing in the world to play Strauss's humoresque in this manner. The audience was quick to appreciate the remarkable quality of the performance, and called Dr. Muck back several times. He passed the compliment on to his men, whom he called upon to rise in recognition of it, and who deserved it, if applause was ever deserved.

Mr. Van Rooy was the soloist and sang the well-thumbed air "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and the closing speech of Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger." Both are familiar in his delivery of them. He sang with more beauty of tone in Marschner's air. In Wagner's he sometimes forced his tone beyond the musical border line, but his interpretation had the nobility and dignity that have so often won him admiration in it on the stage.

EVENING POST,
New York City.
FEB 24 1908

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was much interest in Marschner and Wagner numbers sung by Mr. Van Rooy, who was in fine voice. Richard Strauss's "Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel," was played with such stunning virtuosity that the whole orchestra had to rise and bow. The opening number was an interesting novelty by one of our leading American composers, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." It is a suite including four numbers, composed at different times since 1895, and entitled "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad." The "Jubilee" opens with a wild presto outburst very suggestive of a Slavonic dance by Dvorák. In the rest of the number as well as in the "Noel," one noted with particular interest and delight how frankly and unashamedly melodious this American composer is, as compared with most of his foreign colleagues. There is also a quaint folktune atmosphere about this music, with a peculiar perfume that suggests America almost as unmistakably as our flag does. The "Hobgoblin" is a scherzo capriccioso, the thematic material of which is slight. Much more interesting is the "Vagrom Ballad," a fascinating specimen of musical humor, with sentimental episodes on the bass clarinet. One of the jokes is the sudden apparition of the theme of Bach's G minor fugue, played on the xylophone. It suggests all sorts of possibilities in the use of musical quotations for comic or serious purposes. Altogether, Mr. Chadwick's piece was well worth hearing, and one feels like expressing thanks once more to Dr. Muck for paying so much attention to American composers. It is to be hoped he will do something for them in Berlin, too, on his return; for he is, alas, to give only one more set of concerts in New York.

Yesterday afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra was largely devoted to excerpts from [illegible] such as never fail to

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.
FEB 24 1908

DR. MUCK introduced [illegible] at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon—a suite of four orchestral pieces by George W. Chadwick, entitled respectively "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad," and grouped under the general title of "Symphonic Sketches." After it Anton Van Rooy sang the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." Then the orchestra played Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and finally Mr. Van Rooy declaimed Hans Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger."

This programme was so admirable in its brevity that it is ungracious to find fault with it in other ways. Nevertheless the choice of music did not seem altogether happy. Mr. Chadwick is an estimable composer, resident in Boston. In promotion of a home industry the Boston Symphony Orchestra properly plays his compositions at its home concerts. Here in New York there is less excuse for performing them, especially just now, when Dr. Muck is to leave us so soon. There is music by Mozart, by Beethoven, by Schubert, by Mendelssohn (to go no further) that Dr. Muck has not led here and that one would like to hear played under his direction by the remarkable band from Boston. The Chadwick suite is, to be sure, sufficiently agreeable music, well orchestrated. Of the four movements "A Vagrom Ballad" is the most original, "Noël" the most pleasing (in a conventional way). "Hobgoblin" is a rather laborious scherzo.

A soloist, especially a singer, often embarrasses the maker of a programme. The Marschner aria, which Mr. Van Rooy elected to sing, is as dead as the man that wrote it. Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger" belongs in the opera, not in a concert. As it happened, Mr. Van Rooy sang the Marschner aria in particularly good voice. Seldom in recent years have his tones been so pure, so resonant, so truly musical. In the "Meistersinger" excerpt he was his more familiar self, forcing the vitality out of his big voice.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was the number that was chosen rightly and played gloriously (though, of course, the performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was admirable). The doctors may disagree about Strauss's other tone poems (even the "Tod und Verklärung," and the "Don Juan"), but hardly about "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Here is music genuinely humorous, splendidly delineative, of absorbing interest, programme music that tells its story so clearly that the casual listener can follow it without burdensome attention to a long-winded programme. The performance was marvellous alike in vigorous buoyancy and in exquisite finish of detail. Dr. Muck outdid himself as a conductor, and the orchestra has never played with a virtuosity more dazzling. No wonder the conductor signalled his men to rise and take the applause that greeted the masterly performance.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date

THE CONCERTS OF ONE DAY

BOSTON AND NEW YORK SYMPHONY PLAYERS.

Novelties by George Chadwick and Richard Wagner Presented. The Latter's "Christopher Columbus" Overture Heard for the First Time in This City.

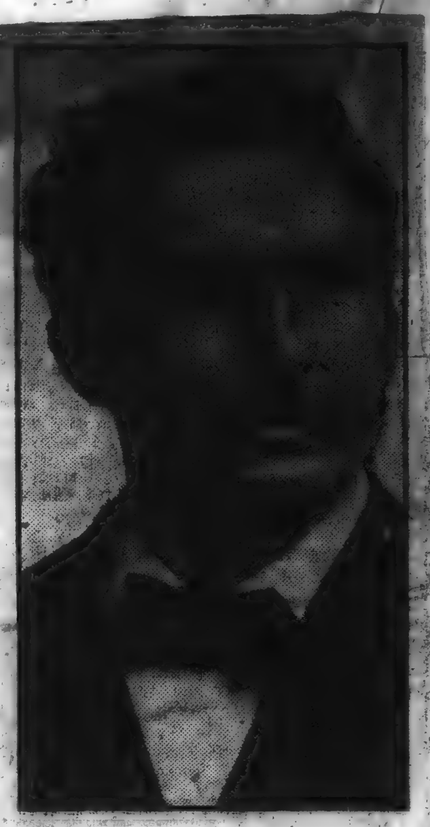
The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon provided the downtrodden American composer with an opportunity for interpretation by Dr. Karl Muck. The first number on the programme was a symphonic suite entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by George W. Chadwick, and a very pleasing composition it proved to be. There are four movements called "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." They were written at different times, from 1895 to 1903, but they assemble well under an elastic title and provide the variety of manner and mood necessary for four movements.

The first movement is built up in a way not far from that of a symphony, but with a rather larger leaning upon the cantabile theme. The melodic material is suave, vocal and altogether charming, especially that of the second theme, which has the simplicity and sweetness of an old song. The admirable orchestration intensifies the interest of the music.

The second movement has still more of the character of folk music, and it is indeed a captivating piece of composition. The third movement is in the scherzo manner and it is refreshing in its brightness and piquancy, while the fourth is so full of humor and happy fancy that it leaves the hearer with the feeling of having been a merry wayfarer along sunny roads and in the sprightliest of company. The musicianship of the composition is none the less excellent for being unobtrusive. Some day perhaps some one will explain just what jest the composer had in his mind when he threw in a fragment of Bach's G minor fugue rattled off by a xylophone.

The middle number was Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which was played with such clarity, such brilliancy, such splendid treatment of the development and the climaxes as to leave one in a state of perfect satisfaction. The soloist of the entertainment was Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House. He sang "An jenen Tag" from Marschner's "Hans Helling" and the last remarks of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Die

New York City.
FEB 21 1908



Copyright by A. Dupont.

ANTON VAN ROOY.

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

DR. MUCK opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night with Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller. This work was performed for the first time anywhere at Cologne, the 15th of last October. Philadelphia heard it the 20th of December, thanks to Carl Pohlig and the Philadelphia Orchestra. It was played last week in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It bears the hundredth opus number of its author, who is not yet thirty-five years old.

Though still a young man, Reger has already to his credit an imposing array of compositions. A year or two ago he was reported as about to rewrite Bach's more important organ pieces. Some slight paralytic strokes are said to have interfered with this modest proposal for the betterment of music. But perhaps Dr. Muck had it in mind when he chose to end the concert last night the overture from Bach's D major suite. Between the pieces by Reger and Bach the greatest of violin concertos—Beethoven's—was played to the delight of the audience by one of the greatest of violinists—Fritz Kreisler.

The learned Reger has taken an innocent tune from an eighteenth century operetta, led it through the mazes of eleven intricate variations, and dismissed it in a fugue which is a veritable orgy of counterpoint. The process lasts forty minutes. At the close of the number last night the enthusiasm was of a spontaneity that seldom greets new orchestral music by anyone. In spite of the length of the variations, in spite of the lack of sensuous beauty in the orchestration, in spite of the frequent exhibition of learning for learning's sake, the work made a profound impression. Opinions no doubt differ as to the relative merits of the eleven variations. The second, allegretto con grazia in A major, is of indisputable charm. Exceedingly interesting are the seventh, with its tarantella rhythm, and the eighth in the nature of an intermezzo. The eleventh is also likely to excite admiration. As for the fugue, it is of irresistible sweep and fire, and the final climax is one of the most exciting in orchestral music. Even if one refuses to admire the work in its entirety at a first hearing, it is unquestionably the most important novelty that Dr. Muck has introduced this year, and it makes for the higher fame of Max Reger.

After the variations and fugue Mr. Kreisler gave an absorbing performance of Beethoven's violin concerto. Seldom, if ever, has Mr. Kreisler played here so well as last night. His tone was of wonderful beauty and his playing was remarkable alike in technique, in musicianship, in appreciation of the emotional content of Beethoven's music. It was a great performance of a great concerto, and it was rewarded by the rapt attention of the audience and tumultuous applause.

The concert closed with a fine performance of the noble overture to Bach's concerto in D major.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 23 1908

Chadwick's suite for orchestra, "Symphonic Sketches," opened yesterday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. The programme announced that this was the first performance of the work "at these concerts," and it is probable the suite never had been heard in its entirety here.

On the whole these symphonic sketches made an unexpectedly good impression, though the movements are of uneven merit. When Chadwick indulges in the sentimental, as he does in the second movement, "Noel," named after his son, who was born on Christmas Day, he is not as satisfying as in his humorous outbursts. There is a sort of rough-and-ready Americanism in the opening movement, "Jubilee," though here the composer indulges also in whining. There is wit and cleverness in the third movement, "Hobgoblin." But in the finale, "A Vagrom Ballad," Chadwick has composed something that has real worth and originality.

Here we find true humor, a rare thing in music, expressed with irresistible joviality and bonhomie. One of the most delightful episodes in this musical delineation of tramp life is that which depicts the advent of Colonel R. E. Morse, when the music suggests with laughably mournful effect the wail of woe at the "thirty days" to come. Excellent music this, and musicianly.

The soloist of the concert, Anton Van Rooy, was heard in Marschner's aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger." We have heard the great baritone in better voice; the Marschner aria is an extremely exacting one vocally. But seldom has Van Rooy sung with greater dramatic force and vigor, with a finer grasp of the poetic meaning and emotional substance. It was an unusual pleasure to hear the whole closing speech of Hans Sachs from Van Rooy. In the operatic version used in the Metropolitan it always is curtailed.

Muck, who is reputed to be no great admirer of Strauss, showed his musical liberality by giving an admirable performance of that composer's "Till Eulenspiegel." It was not the most vivacious, reckless and piquant interpretation of this work we have heard, but the conductor worked up toward the close one of those overpowering climaxes of which he appears to be a past master. That was enough to compensate for any loss of Mephistophelian humor.

paper Cutting Bureau in the New MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 23 1908

FOUR OPERAS AND TWO GOOD CONCERTS

Big Audiences at Metropolitan and Manhattan — Boston and N. Y. Symphony Players Applauded.

Yesterday's music was varied and multifarious. At the Manhattan Opera House "Siberia" was repeated in the evening, with M. Bassi and Mme. Agostinelli in the cast.

In the afternoon "Pelleas et Melisande" drew a ten thousand dollar house and the work left the profoundest impression on the big audience. M. Campanini conducted.

At the Metropolitan there was a holiday audience in the afternoon for "The Flying Dutchman," with M. Goritz, M. Burgstaller and Mlle. Bella Alten in the cast. M. Hertz conducted.

In the evening "La Boheme," with Mlle. Lina Cavalieri as Mimi, Mlle. Felia Dereyne as Musette and M. Bonci as Rodolfo, was given, with M. Ferrari in the conductor's chair.

In the evening, in Carnegie Hall, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society gave their annual Wagner concert and produced the novelty "Christopher Columbus," an overture by Wagner.

In the afternoon at the same place the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, played a bright symphony of Chadwick's and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks."

From EVENING POST,
New York City.
Address
Date

Dr. Muck and American Composers.

Mr. W. E. Walter writes from Boston regarding Dr. Muck that since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way, by placing many of their works on his programmes in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Paine, and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffler, and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far, there have appeared on his programmes in Boston Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite" and second pianoforte concerto, and Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc"; MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which, by the way, he had on his programmes a year ago; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston [illegible] Orchestra.

[153]

TIMES.

New York City.

ess FEB 23 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A New Suite, by Chadwick Played—Mr. Van Rooy Sings Twice.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. A new suite of orchestral pieces by George W. Chadwick of Boston was played for the first time here. "Symphonic Sketches," they are called and they are four in number, with no apparent connection between them. They have titles "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," "A Vagram Ballad," and in all but the second the composer's mood is chiefly one of good humor and reckless joviality, approaching even to boisterousness. He has had the purpose frankly to entertain and to present no problems whatever.

The suite is good music, full of wit and invention; sometimes, indeed, not without its suggestion of other men's music, but always showing plenty of the composer's own self and written with a sure hand and a sure command of orchestral effect. To each of them in the score is prefixed a motto in verse, not a programme to be delineated in the music, but a suggestion of its character. "Give me the warmest red and green, a cornet and a tambourine, to paint my jubilee," he says; and the "Jubilee" has its suggestion of these things in the outburst of ringing gaiety with which it opens and which fills much of the music after the development of a section based on more sentimental thematic matter, strongly suggestive of Scottish song in its character. The "Noel" has, of course, a Christmas verse; and the music is gentle, suave, with a suggestion, though not a dominating one, of the Virgin Mother's lullaby. The "Hobgoblin" that was in Mr. Chadwick's mind is Shakespeare's Robin Goodfellow, mischievously peering through lively music. The strongest and most original movement is the last, the "Vagrom Ballad"—"a tale of tramps and railway ties." It is picturesque and unconventional writing; its humor is of strong, and sometimes bitter, flavor. It has its touch of burlesque, as in the mock heroism of the opening cadenza on the deep-toned bass clarinet, and the mystifying quotation of the theme of Bach's G-minor organ fugue on the xylophone. There is a brief contrasting bit at the close, a sudden soberness—does it foreshadow the "thirty days to come"? Whatever it is, it is highly effective; the ideas are of substance, the orchestration masterly.

The other orchestral number was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and the performance of this fascinating piece was of such dazzling brilliancy, sonority, flexibility, and spirit as have been seldom heard even from this orchestra. It bristles with difficulties for many of the individual instruments as well as for the ensemble, but these were mastered with an apparent ease that made it seem the most natural thing in the world to play Strauss's humoresque in this manner. The audience was quick to appreciate the remarkable quality of the performance, and called Dr. Muck back several times. He passed the compliment on to his men, whom he called upon to rise in recognition of it, and who deserved it, if applause was ever deserved.

Mr. Van Rooy was the soloist and sang the well-thumbed air "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and the closing speech of Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger." Both are familiar in his delivery of them. He sang with more beauty of tone in Marschner's air. In Wagner's he sometimes forced his tone beyond the musical border line, but his interpretation had the nobility and dignity that have so often won him admiration in it on the stage.

n EVENING POST,

ress New York City.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there was much interest in Marschner and Wagner numbers sung by Mr. Van Rooy, who was in fine voice. Richard Strauss's "Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel," was played with such stunning virtuosity that the whole orchestra had to rise and bow. The opening number was an interesting novelty by one of our leading American composers, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches." It is a suite including four numbers, composed at different times since 1895, and entitled "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad." The "Jubilee" opens with a wild presto outburst very suggestive of a Slavonic dance by Dvorák. In the rest of the number as well as in the "Noel," one noted with particular interest and delight how frankly and unashamedly melodious this American composer is, as compared with most of his foreign colleagues. There is also a quaint folktune atmosphere about this music, with a peculiar perfume that suggests America almost as unmistakably as our flag does. The "Hobgoblin" is a scherzo capriccioso, the thematic material of which is slight. Much more interesting is the "Vagrom Ballad," a fascinating specimen of musical humor, with sentimental episodes on the bass clarinet. One of the jokes is the sudden apparition of the theme of Bach's G minor fugue, played on the xylophone. It suggests all sorts of possibilities in the use of musical quotations for comic or serious purposes. Altogether, Mr. Chadwick's piece was well worth hearing, and one feels like expressing thanks once more to Dr. Muck for paying so much attention to American composers. It is to be hoped he will do something for them in Berlin, too, on his return; for he is, alas, to give only one more set of concerts in New York.

Yesterday afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra was entirely devoted to excerpts from operas, such as never fail to

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERT

ess New York City.

FEB 2 1908

DR. MUCK introduced another novelty at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon—a suite of four orchestral pieces by George W. Chadwick, entitled respectively "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin," and "A Vagrom Ballad," and grouped under the general title of "Symphonic Sketches." After it Anton Van Rooy sang the aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." Then the orchestra played Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and finally Mr. Van Rooy declaimed Hans Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger."

This programme was so admirable in its brevity that it is ungracious to find fault with it in other ways. Nevertheless the choice of music did not seem altogether happy. Mr. Chadwick is an estimable composer, resident in Boston. In promotion of a home industry the Boston Symphony Orchestra properly plays his compositions at its home concerts. Here in New York there is less excuse for performing them, especially just now, when Dr. Muck is to leave us so soon. There is music by Mozart, by Beethoven, by Schubert, by Mendelssohn (to go no further) that Dr. Muck has not led here and that one would like to hear played under his direction by the remarkable band from Boston. The Chadwick suite is, to be sure, sufficiently agreeable music, well orchestrated. Of the four movements "A Vagrom Ballad" is the most original, "Noël" the most pleasing (in a conventional way). "Hobgoblin" is a rather laborious scherzo.

A soloist, especially a singer, often embarrasses the maker of a programme. The Marschner aria, which Mr. Van Rooy elected to sing, is as dead as the man that wrote it. Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger" belongs in the opera, not in a concert. As it happened, Mr. Van Rooy sang the Marschner aria in particularly good voice. Seldom in recent years have his tones been so pure, so resonant, so truly musical. In the "Meistersinger" excerpt he was his more familiar self, forcing the vitality out of his big voice.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was the number that was chosen rightly and played gloriously (though, of course, the performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was admirable). The doctors may disagree about Strauss's other tone poems (even the "Tod und Verklärung," and the "Don Juan"), but hardly about "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Here is music genuinely humorous, splendidly delineative, of absorbing interest, programme music that tells its story so clearly that the casual listener can follow it without burdensome attention to a long-winded programme. The performance was marvellous alike in vigorous buoyancy and in exquisite finish of detail. Dr. Muck outdid himself as a conductor, and the orchestra has never played with a virtuosity more dazzling. No wonder the conductor signalled his men to rise and take the applause that greeted the masterly performance.

SUN,

From

New York City.

Address

Date

THE CONCERTS OF ONE DAY

BOSTON AND NEW YORK SYMPHONY PLAYERS.

Novelties by George Chadwick and Richard Wagner Presented The Latter's "Christopher Columbus" Overture Heard for the First Time in This City.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon provided the downtrodden American composer with an opportunity for interpretation by Dr. Karl Muck. The first number on the programme was a symphonic suite entitled "Symphonic Sketches," by George W. Chadwick, and a very pleasing composition it proved to be. There are four movements called "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad." They were written at different times, from 1895 to 1903, but they assemble well under an elastic title and provide the variety of manner and mood necessary for four movements.

The first movement is built up in a way not far from that of a symphony, but with a rather larger leaning upon the cantabile theme. The melodic material is suave, vocal and altogether charming, especially that of the second theme, which has the simplicity and sweetness of an old song. The admirable orchestration intensifies the interest of the music.

The second movement has still more of the character of folk music, and it is indeed a captivating piece of composition. The third movement is in the scherzo manner and it is refreshing in its brightness and piquancy, while the fourth is so full of humor and happy fancy that it leaves the hearer with the feeling of having been a merry wayfarer along sunny roads and in the sprightliest of company. The musicianship of the composition is none the less excellent for being unobtrusive. Some day perhaps some one will explain just what jest the composer had in his mind when he threw in a fragment of Bach's G minor fugue rattled off by a xylophone.

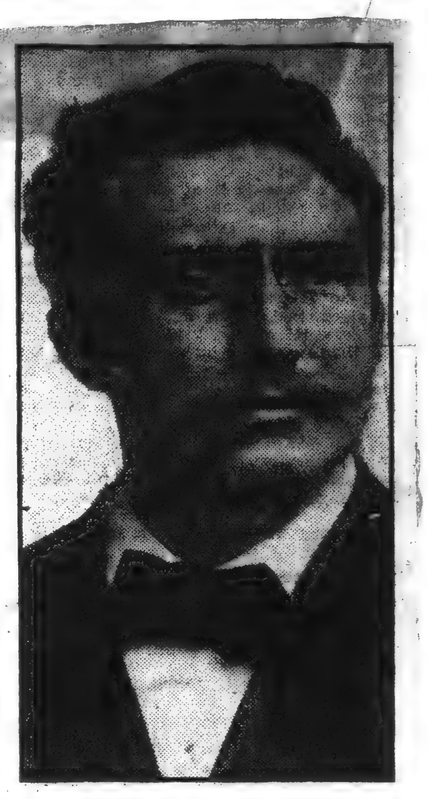
The middle number was Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," which was played with such clarity, such brilliancy, such splendid treatment of the development and the climaxes as to leave one in a state of perfect satisfaction. The soloist of the entertainment was Anton Van Rooy of the Metropolitan Opera House. He sang "An jenen Tag" from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and the last remarks of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISE

New York City.

FEB 21 1908

hed:



Copyright by A. Dupont.

ANTON VAN ROOY.

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

DR. MUCK opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night with Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by J. A. Hiller. This work was performed for the first time anywhere at Cologne, the 15th of last October. Philadelphia heard it the 20th of December, thanks to Carl Pohlig and the Philadelphia Orchestra. It was played last week in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It bears the hundredth opus number of its author, who is not yet thirty-five years old.

Though still a young man, Reger has already to his credit an imposing array of compositions. A year or two ago he was reported as about to rewrite Bach's more important organ pieces. Some slight paralytic strokes are said to have interfered with this modest proposal for the betterment of music. But perhaps Dr. Muck had it in mind when he chose to end the concert last night the overture from Bach's D major suite. Between the pieces by Reger and Bach the greatest of violin concertos—Beethoven's—was played to the delight of the audience by one of the greatest of violinists—Fritz Kreisler.

The learned Reger has taken an innocent tune from an eighteenth century operetta, led it through the mazes of eleven intricate variations, and dismissed it in a fugue which is a veritable orgy of counterpoint. The process lasts forty minutes. At the close of the number last night the enthusiasm was of a spontaneity that seldom greets new orchestral music by anyone. In spite of the length of the variations, in spite of the lack of sensuous beauty in the orchestration, in spite of the frequent exhibition of learning for learning's sake, the work made a profound impression. Opinions no doubt differ as to the relative merits of the eleven variations. The second, allegretto con grazia in A major, is of indisputable charm. Exceedingly interesting are the seventh, with its tarantella rhythm, and the eighth in the nature of an intermezzo. The eleventh is also likely to excite admiration. As for the fugue, it is of irresistible sweep and fire, and the final climax is one of the most exciting in orchestral music. Even if one refuses to admire the work in its entirety at a first hearing, it is unquestionably the most important novelty that Dr. Muck has introduced this year, and it makes for the higher fame of Max Reger.

After the variations and fugue Mr. Kreisler gave an absorbing performance of Beethoven's violin concerto. Seldom, if ever, has Mr. Kreisler played here so well as last night. His tone was of wonderful beauty and his playing was remarkable alike in technique, in musicianship, in appreciation of the emotional content of Beethoven's music. It was a great performance of a great concerto, and it was rewarded by the rapt attention of the audience and tumultuous applause.

The concert closed with a fine performance of the noble overture to Bach's concerto in D major.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

FEB 23 1908

te

Boston Men Play Chadwick Suite.

Chadwick's suite for orchestra, "Symphonic Sketches," opened yesterday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. The programme announced that this was the first performance of the work "at these concerts," and it is probable the suite never had been heard in its entirety here.

On the whole these symphonic sketches made an unexpectedly good impression, though the movements are of uneven merit. When Chadwick indulges in the sentimental, as he does in the second movement, "Noel," named after his son, who was born on Christmas Day, he is not as satisfying as in his humorous outbursts. There is a sort of rough-and-ready Americanism in the opening movement, "Jubilee," though here the composer indulges also in whining. There is wit and cleverness in the third movement, "Hobgoblin." But in the finale, "A Vagrom Ballad," Chadwick has composed something that has real worth and originality.

Here we find true humor, a rare thing in music, expressed with irresistible jovialty and bonhomie. One of the most delightful episodes in this musical delineation of tramp life is that which depicts the advent of Colonel R. E. Morse, when the music suggests with laughably mournful effect the wail of woe at the "thirty days" to come. Excellent music this, and musicianly.

The soloist of the concert, Anton Van Rooy, was heard in Marschner's aria, "An jenem Tag," from "Hans Heiling," and Hans Sachs's closing speech from "Die Meistersinger." We have heard the great baritone in better voice; the Marschner aria is an extremely exacting one vocally. But seldom has Van Rooy sung with greater dramatic force and vigor, with a finer grasp of the poetic meaning and emotional substance. It was an unusual pleasure to hear the whole closing speech of Hans Sachs from Van Rooy. In the operatic version used in the Metropolitan it always is curtailed.

Muck, who is reputed to be no great admirer of Strauss, showed his musical liberality by giving an admirable performance of that composer's "Till Eulenspiegel." It was not the most vivacious, reckless and piquant interpretation of this work we have heard, but the conductor worked up toward the close one of those overpowering climaxes of which he appears to be a past master. That was enough to compensate for any loss of Mephistophelian humor.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CITY

FOUR OPERAS AND TWO GOOD CONCERTS

Big Audiences at Metropolitan and Manhattan — Boston and N. Y. Symphony Players Applauded.

Yesterday's music was varied and multifarious. At the Manhattan Opera House "Siberia" was repeated in the evening, with M. Bassi and Mme. Agostinelli in the cast.

In the afternoon "Pelleas et Melisande" drew a ten thousand dollar house and the work left the profoundest impression on the big audience. M. Campanini conducted.

At the Metropolitan there was a holiday audience in the afternoon for "The Flying Dutchman," with M. Goritz, M. Burgstaller and Mlle. Bella Alten in the cast. M. Hertz conducted.

In the evening "La Boheme," with Mlle. Lina Cavalieri as Mimi, Mlle. Felia Dereyne as Musette and M. Bonci as Rodolfo, was given, with M. Ferrari in the conductor's chair.

In the evening, in Carnegie Hall, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society gave their annual Wagner concert and produced the novelty "Christopher Columbus," an overture by Wagner.

In the afternoon at the same place the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, played a bright symphony of Chadwick's and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks."

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

Dr. Muck and American Composers.

Mr. W. E. Walter writes from Boston regarding Dr. Muck that since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way, by placing many of their works on his programmes in Boston and elsewhere. Last year there appeared works by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Paine, and Strube. This year he has already played works by Chadwick, Loeffler, and MacDowell, and in the near future more will be played. So far, there have appeared on his programmes in Boston Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," MacDowell's "Sylvan Suite" and second pianoforte concerto, and Schelling's "Spe Fantastique." In the near future he is to play Converse's "Jeanne d'Arc"; MacDowell's "Indian Suite," which, by the way, he had on his programmes a year ago; a new symphony by Henry K. Hadley; two new pieces for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music. Certainly American composers have nothing to complain of in their treatment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[153]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date FEB 23 1908

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The climax in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was reached in Richard Strauss's scintillant "Till Eulenspiegel," which may be set down not only as one of the most perfect examples of musical humor ever written, but as all in all, the most homogeneous, fascinating, persuasive and perfect emanation from the composer's brain. Its whimsical humor was fairly infectious yesterday, Dr. Muck and his musicians playing it with flawless technical finesse and an insinuating tonal charm that gave exquisite pleasure. The conductor insisted upon the players rising to take their share of the plaudits which the work called forth.

The concert began with a suite of pieces in a pleasant vein by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The pieces, contrasted in mood like the movements of the conventional symphony, bore titles, thus: I "Jubilee," II "Noël," III "Hobgoblin," and IV "A Vagrom Ballad." To each the composer gave also a poetical motto, the first and last of a jocular, devil-may-care character for which the music was a capital translation in tones, though in the "Vagrom Ballad" the humorous fancy of the composer went considerably further than that of the poet, who, when giving voice to the feelings of the tramp of the newspaper wits certainly never dreamed of inspiring his hero with memories of Bach. Nevertheless the introduction of the beginning of the subject of the G minor organ fugue on the xylophone in the midst of the merry rout of the other instruments was deliciously humorous. The finest impression was made by the first movement which began with a brilliant outburst not unlike the opening of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and swung into the pleasing lilt of an American-Scotch-Irish folk-tune with refreshing nonchalance and abandon. No contemner of tunes is Mr. Chadwick, who let loose amazing skill and ingenuity in embellishing his material and keeping it far from the commonplace. The native tone sounded through the other pieces as well, but the "Noël" seemed scarcely well intituled. It sang less of snows and the nativity than it did of departure from a sunny home. The pieces gave real pleasure and were warmly applauded.

Mr. Van Rooy provided the solo numbers of the programme, singing the air, "An jenem Tag" from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and the closing address of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and singing them in a manner worthy of the splendid accompaniment.

EVENING WORLD,

s New York City.

FEB 4 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AMERICAN COMPOSITION.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with such sonority, brilliancy and finish that the audience was aroused to exceptional applause, and Dr. Muck made all the men rise in recognition of it. George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," which got a first hearing here, made an excellent impression. The American composer's suite proved full of good musical material admirably worked out. With the exception of the "Noel," all were more or less humorous. The last, "A Tale of Tramps and Railroad Ties," is exceptionally breezy, descriptive and not without a touch of seriousness. Van Rooy sang an air from "Hans Weiling," and Hans Sachs's speech from the last act of "Die Meistersinger" with fine expression, although he forced his voice a bit.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

s New York City.

FEB 3 [illegible]

SYMPHONIC FEAST IN TWO COURSES

New Yorkers yesterday had the unusual privilege of being able to enjoy not only four performances of opera, but also two symphony concerts.

The Boston Symphony Society gave another musical feast at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, with a programme including the interesting symphonic sketches of Chadwick, the performance of which by so admirable an orchestra as Dr. Muck's was of itself a compliment to American art; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a selection from "Die Meistersinger," with Anton Van Rooy as soloist.

EVENING POST.

ss New York City.

[illegible] 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra needs a new conductor. How about Landon Ronald? That English musician conducted a symphony in Berlin, the other day and here are some of the verdicts: Wrote the Berliner Morgenpost: "Mr. Ronald's magnificent interpretation of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor ranks him among our greatest conductors, like Weingartner, Mahler, and Nikisch." According to Die Zeit the performance of the same symphony "completely overshadowed the best rendering under Nikisch, the established interpreter of the composer." "Never have I heard a better rendering of this composition," said the critic of the Volkszeitung. "A quite ideal interpretation," was the verdict of Deutsche Worte, while other judgments seem to have been equally enthusiastic in tone.

---

n STAATS ZEITUNG,

ress New York City.

Bostoner in Brooklyn. Auch mit dem gestrigen, dem vierten in der diesjährigen Serie der „Jästituts"-Konzerte errang das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester und dessen genialer Leiter Dr. Karl Muck einen großen Erfolg. Der Baptist Temple war bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt mit Zuhörern, deren Beifall sich von Nummer zu Nummer steigerte. Mit dem Orchester theilte sich der Violinist Fritz Kreisler, der Lalos Spanische Symphonie meisterhaft zu Gehör brachte, in die Ehren des Abends. Die Kapelle spielte Piecen von MacDowell, dem kürzlich verstorbenen Komponisten, sowie von Bizet und Goldmark.

EVENING SUN,

ess New York City.

FEB 22 1908

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra walks out of Carnegie Hall late this afternoon, the New York Symphony Orchestra will walk in. Walter Damrosch's Wagner programme of to-night and to-morrow afternoon remains as announced last week. Nordica's name, omitted to-day, still leads the Beethoven cycle on March 1.

Sousa's Band at the Hippodrome to-morrow night will have three soloists, Lucy Allen, soprano; Jeannette Powers, violin, and Joseph Norrito, clarinet. There are nine numbers on the bill, including three by Mr. Sousa, and among these his latest march, "Powhatan's Daughter."

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 23 1908

Crochets and Quavers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Brooklyn last Friday afternoon at the Baptist Temple, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist. Next Thursday evening Mme. Gadski will give a song recital in the same place.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

s New York City.

FEB 23 1908

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Muck has paid tribute to American musicians in a most substantial way by placing many of their works on his programme in Boston and elsewhere. At one of his March concerts in New York he will give a programme made up entirely of American music.

EVENING SUN,

m New York City.

ress FEB 25 1908

e

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Troy, N. Y. When they read how everything from ice to automobiles grounded there, the Athenians of the Hub of the Universe said, "We'll show it's easy." Which same they did.

POST

ASHINGTON, D. C

MAR 1- 1908

The last opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck's direction will be given at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon. Immediately after the Washington concert Dr. Muck will leave for Berlin, where it is likely he will remain indefinitely.

N. Y. Eve. Sun - Feb. 24

MAX REGER'S CACOPHONY OPENS IN A WHIRLWIND FINISH.

MacDowell Day Sees the Men of Boston Take the Plunge by Tube to Brooklyn with Stop Watch in Hand, While the People's Symphony Concerts Cherish MacDowell Memory Here—Manhattan Opera Has a Day of Rest and Miss Garden's Compliments to All—Mr. Conried Tells of Historic Pageant for His Opera Benefit—Caruso and Tetrazzini Rivals Again To-night.

Max Reger, the Bach of Bavaria, the flaming youth who first saw light on March 19, 1873, in a town of the fire-bringers well called Brand, and who was saved from the burning of Parisian Debussy or Münchener Strauss by retiring, like the classic Goethe, to old Cantor Bach's own Leipsic, has at last had his day in New York. Right on the heels of a poet's quaint melodrama, there came the hundredth opus of this equally extraordinary man and ardent suitor of old modes. No other man living, it is admitted to-day, could have composed that splendid fugue which wound up a very bad forty minutes of "variations" in Carnegie Hall last night, and which not only held half a tardy audience standing all that time, but also brought Karl Muck and the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra upstanding amid a riot of cheers at the whirlwind finish.

Yes, the musical heavens are hung with fiddles yet. The public has heard nothing since "Meistersinger" to compare with the Reger fugue. Possibly those second and eighth and especially eleventh variations deserved their honorable mention. But variation as an art form is dead and dryas-dust. It is not better, but worse, when done by Bach and Beethoven, Handel and Haydn, than it is by Elgar, D'Indy and the boys. It was only worth while last night as the structure on which that soaring fugue was to be reared. When the basses took and held the foundation tone or organ point, when the two fugal themes were tossed and flung to the skies on a maze of strings, and when that original "merry theme" of an old man Hiller's opera literally blew the heads off all the trombones in one glad sweet song, it was no wonder the impossible happened.

So Dr. Muck's first and only great novelty here set our steadiest audience into riot. If another analogy to current opera events was desired, here was also an enterprise promoted by one man alone. Major Higginson of Boston does not blow his own horn. A nation deafened by more screaming aspirants for fame only hears indirectly, once in a while, how the capitalist who paid his $20,000 a year for this Boston Orchestra during a score of years is able to send it rejoicing on the road to the tune of a quarter million of gross receipts each year.

Fritz Kreisler's own fugue, in his own first cadenza to the Beethoven violin concerto, had another riot last evening. As his double-stopping digits played tag with old Beethoven themes up and down that $15,000 Strad, he set even the stern Boston fiddlers smiling. An imported violin star was the greatest novelty to the virtuoso band. The programme was over-long, but a real Bach suite after Reger was cleverly thought of and gloriously played.

After rehearsing with Van Rooy this morning for to-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée, the Bostonians grasped their music luggage and stop-watches firmly in hand and took their first plunge by tube to Brooklyn. Manager Comee, who went ahead, telephoned them that they could do it in sixteen minutes straight. They used to allow an hour.

MacDowell's "Autumn" suite, leads the Brooklyn programme. His "Indian" suite, in part, was also played at the Cooper Union last night, and will be repeated to-night in Carnegie Hall, as a last tribute of the People's Symphony concerts of this town.

Dr. Muck, it is announced, on his farewell trip to New York next month, will play one all-American programme.

OMEIKE" NEW YORK

PUBLIC.

The First, Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LEDGER

om PA

ddress

te FEB 23 1908

DR. MUCK AND AMERICANS.

Since he became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Doctor Muck has evidenced his admiration of American composers and his desire to give them a fighting chance in a substantial way by placing many of their works on his programmes. Last year the Boston Orchestra played music by Brockway, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Payne and Strube. This year Doctor Muck has already played Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," Loeffler's "Pagen Poem," MacDowell's "Syivan Suite" and his second piano concerto, together with Schelling's "Suite Fantastiques." In the near future Doctor Muck announces the Jeanne d'Arc music by Converse, a repetition of MacDowell's "Indian Suite," from the programmes of the previous season; a new symphony by Henry Hadley, and violin and orchestra numbers by Gustav Strube. One of the March concerts in New York will be devoted to a programme, made up entirely of the music of our native composers.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

From

Address New York City.

Date FEB 20 1908

[illegible] tor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, and one of the most prominent of the "star conductors" of Europe, we learn through private sources that he has not yet made any arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of that organization for next season. [illegible] been busy with Mengelberg's name as one of the most probable successor of Dr. Muck, though some insist that Nikisch has been secured, and the management of the Boston orchestra itself denies that any one has as yet been decided on. Meantime there are those who believe that the next conductor will be an obscure young man who is unknown in America and who will achieve fame, if fame he achieves, through his work with this orchestra, as Gericke, Nikisch and Paur did before him. It will be remembered that Dr. Muck is the only conductor of great previous reputation who has undertaken the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mengelberg is not unknown in New York. Two seasons ago he conducted a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic Society, at which he presented as the pièce de résistance Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben," with notable success. Since his visit to America Mengelberg's fame has increased steadily. Not long ago he enjoyed the unique distinction of conducting in rapid succession a concert each for the Colonne Orchestra and the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris. Besides the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, he regularly conducts an orchestra at Frankfort-on-the-Main. When in this country Mengelberg went to Boston to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he afterward publicly ranked it with the two or three foremost orchestras of Europe. In private conversation he did not hesitate to say that he personally had never heard an orchestra so good.

[illegible] newspaper clipping bureau in the Wor m [illegible]

ress [illegible]

e [illegible] 20 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Appreciative Audience Hears Excellent Program at Lyric.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Lyric under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist. The following was the program:

Beethoven—
Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherd's song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—
Concerto in E minor for Violin, Op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.

Richard Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

To make the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony almost a revelation after the many years during which it has been played requires an orchestra of the finest material, a number of instrumental soloists who are practically perfect on their instruments, and a director of the highest musical intelligence. All these were present in the Boston Symphony performance last evening, and Beethoven's beautiful work was faithfully set out.

The Pastoral Symphony has not been regarded as Beethoven's greatest work, but, like his one opera, "Fidelio," it is his one work entirely of its own kind. It is program music that is not ashamed of itself, and therefore makes no apologies to the public. In the fifth symphony Beethoven had let nature speak for herself in her tragic mood—that of unconquerable destiny. But in the sixth he permits nature to tell her happy story in the forests and by the brookside, in the merry-makings of the peasants and in the gladness of all human gratitude.

With any second-class conductor the ruin of the sixth symphony is a forgone conclusion; but with a great conductor like Dr. Muck it is an unsurpassed work of art, in which nature's own moods are presented audibly in musical notes. The entire audience last evening manifested its delight in comprehending the great masterpiece as the listeners never did before.

Mr. Kreisler's success in the Mendelssohn violin-concerto was fully expected and was complete. He was recalled [illegible] a dozen times, but the Boston Orchestra very properly does not allow encores. The concert closed with the Richard Strauss tone-picture of "Till Eulenspiegel and his Merry Pranks." The entire performance was one of the best by this unrivaled organization.

---

rom HERALD

[illegible] ddress [illegible]

ate FEB 23 1908

The last concert by the [illegible] phony Orchestra will be [illegible] New National [illegible] 27, at 4:30 [illegible]

[154]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The climax in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was reached in Richard Strauss's scintillant "Till Eulenspiegel," which may be set down not only as one of the most perfect examples of musical humor ever written, but as, all in all, the most homogeneous, fascinating, persuasive and perfect emanation from the composer's brain. Its whimsical humor was fairly infectious yesterday, Dr. Muck and his musicians playing it with flawless technical finesse and an insinuating tonal charm that gave exquisite pleasure. The conductor insisted upon the players rising to take their share of the plaudits which the work called forth.

The concert began with a suite of pieces in a pleasant vein by George W. Chadwick, entitled "Symphonic Sketches." The pieces, contrasted in mood like the movements of the conventional symphony, bore titles, thus: I "Jubilee," II "Noël," III "Hobgoblin," and IV "A Vagrom Ballad." To each the composer gave also a poetical motto, the first and last of a jocular, devil-may-care character for which the music was a capital translation in tones, though in the "Vagrom Ballad" the humorous fancy of the composer went considerably further than that of the poet, who, when giving voice to the feelings of the tramp of the newspaper wits certainly never dreamed of inspiring his hero with memories of Bach. Nevertheless the introduction of the beginning of the subject of the G minor organ fugue on the xylophone in the midst of the merry rout of the other instruments was deliciously humorous. The finest impression was made by the first movement which began with a brilliant outburst not unlike the opening of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture and swung into the pleasing lilt of an American-Scotch-Irish folk-tune with refreshing nonchalance and abandon. No contemner of tunes is Mr. Chadwick, who let loose amazing skill and ingenuity in embellishing his material and keeping it far from the commonplace. The native tone sounded through the other pieces as well, but the "Noël" seemed scarcely well intituled. It sang less of snows and the nativity than it did of departure from a sunny home. The pieces gave real pleasure and were warmly applauded.

Mr. Van Rooy provided the solo numbers of the programme, singing the air, "An jenem Tag" from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and the closing address of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and singing them in a manner worthy of the splendid accompaniment.

EVENING WORLD,

s New York City.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS AMERICAN COMPOSITION.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon with such sonority, brilliancy and finish that the audience was aroused to exceptional applause, and Dr. Muck made all the men rise in recognition of it. George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," "Jubilee," "Noel," "Hobgoblin" and "A Vagrom Ballad," which got a first hearing here, made an excellent impression. The American composer's suite proved full of good musical material admirably worked out. With the exception of the "Noel," all were more or less humorous. The last, "A Tale of Tramps and Railroad Ties," is exceptionally breezy, descriptive and not without a touch of seriousness. Van Rooy sang an air from "Hans Welling," and Hans Sachs's speech from the last act of "Die Meistersinger" with fine expression, although he forced his voce a bit.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

s New York City.

SYMPHONIC FEAST IN TWO COURSES

New Yorkers yesterday had the unusual privilege of being able to enjoy not only four performances of opera, but also two symphony concerts.

The Boston Symphony Society gave another musical feast at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, with a programme including the interesting symphonic sketches of Chadwick, the performance of which by so admirable an orchestra as Dr. Muck's was of itself a compliment to American art; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and a selection from "Die Meistersinger," with Anton Van Rooy as soloist.

EVENING POST.

ss New York City.

